When they were arrived at Rome, the Embassadors of the allies had audience given them before those that were sent from King Philip. Most of their speeches were spent in railing against the King; but in this one point they most of all moved the Senate to give ear unto them, namely, when they described by demonstration (as in a map) the situation of those countries as well by land as sea, that all men might plainly see, that if the King might hold in his hands the City Demetrius in Thessaly, Chalcis in Euboea, and Corinth in Achaea, Greece could not possibly be at liberty, considering that Philip himself was wont to term them (no less than tauntingly) The shackles and fetters of Greece. After them were the Kings Embassadors permitted to enter into the Senat-house: and having begun to make a long Oration, their speech was cut off with this one brief and short interrogatory, Whether Philip would quit those three Cities aforesaid, or no? Whereunto they made this answer, That they had no express warrant in their comminution touching that matter by name. So the Kings Embassadors were sent away without conclusion of any peace: and Quintus had full authority to determine of war or peace at his pleasure. Who seeing plainly by this, that the Senate was not weary of war, and being himself more desirous of victory than peace, he would never after grant Philip any more parleys, but gave him to understand, that he would admit no other embassage from him, but that which should bring him news of his departure quite out of Greece.

Philip seeing no other way now but that he must needs fight and trie the issue by a main battle, and that he was to gather his forces together from all parts, being perplexed most of all for the Cities of Achaea (a country far remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth; he thought it best policy to make it over (as it were upon guilt) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, upon condition, That if he obtained the victory, Nabis should deliver it up unto him again: but if it ought should come to him but well then Nabis himself to have and hold it as his own, unto Philip, Governor of Corinth and Argi, he dispatched his letters, That he should himself in person commune with the tyrant above-named about it. Pholetes, besides that he came now with a present, added moreover of his own head (for the better assurance and pawn of amity between the tyrant and the King) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Nabis his sons. The tyrant refused at the first to accept of that City, unless he were sent for, by a decree of the Argives themselves to come for to aid the City. But afterwards when he heard say, That in a frequent assembly there, they not only rejected him, but also detested and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an execrable abomination: supposing now that he had a good occasion and quarrel offered to make a spoil of them, he willed Pholetes to deliver the City unto him when he would. So the tyrant was received into the Town in the night, without the privy and knowledge of any person: and by break of day he feit upon all the higher places. The gates were shut, and few of the principal heads in the beginning of the tumult made shift to escape. Those that were absent had their houses ranstaked and their goods pillaged: as many as were present, had all their gold and silver taken from them: besides, great sums of money were impofed upon them to be paid. They that made speed and were not long about it, but tendered ready coin, were let go without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but such as were suspected either to hide or keep ought back, were mangled and tortured like bondslaves. After this, he assembled the people together and published two Laws: the one, for crofting all debt-books and cancelling obligations: the other, for division of Lands among the people by the poll: two fire-brands to serve their turn that look for change and alteration in a State: enough to set on fire the Commons against the Nobles and chief of a City.
When the City of Argos was thus brought in subjection under Nabis, the tyrant never remembering all his hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, sent ambassadors to Livius unto Quinius, like-wise to Aesclom: warning them that Argos was in his hands and in his devotion; and if Quinius would repair thither to partake with him, it doubted not but they two should agree well enough in every point. Quinius granted to come thither to the end, that by this means he might distract Philip of that garrison: and he sent likewise to Aesclom, willing him that he would depart from Argos and meet him at Sicyon: himself loosed from Antiochia, and with ten Galleyes called Quinquetermes; which (as hap was) L. Quinius his brother some days before had put to sea out of the wintring harbor of Corinth, creole over to Sicyon. Now was Aesclom there already, who making remonstrance unto Quinius, that he became a tyrant to come unto a Roman General and not a Roman General to go unto a tyrant, induced Quinius to condescend unto his opinion, and not to enter the City of Argos. Not far from the City there is a place called Mycenae, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quinius came to the place, accompanied with his brother and certain Colonels. Aesclom was guarded with his Princely and Royal train, Neostratus the Precor of the Acharians repaired thither, attended with some few auxiliary foot-soldiers, and there they found the tyrant expecting their coming with all his forces. And armed as he was, with his guards likewise armed he advanced himself into the midst (well neer) of the plain that lay between, Quinius unarmed came forward with his brother and two Colonels. King Aesclom like-wise between the Precor of the Acharians on the one hand, and a chiefe of his on the other, both unarmed. The tyrant began the speach with an excuse, that being in arms and attended with a guard of armed men, he presented himself to a partie seeing the General of the Romans and King Aesclom unarmed: and said that he did not in fear of them but of certain exiled persons of the Argives. After this, when they came to treat of touching the conditions and covenants for the contract of amity, Quinius the General demanded two things the one. That Nabis would make an end of warring with the Achaes on the other. That he would send with him certain aids against Philip. And wisely to lend in our grant; and in lieu of peace he was content there should be a truce, until the war with Philip was dispatched. Also about Arges King Attalus to enter into some question saying, That having the City tres-horribly betrayed unto him, by Philip, he now held it by force of arms but he answered again, That he was sent for by the Argives themselves to protect them. Then the King required that the Argives might be assembled together, that he might know the truth. The tyrant made no denial therefore. The King replied again that the Argives should be free, and at their liberty to speak, and to effect the garrisons yet to be removed out of the City, and no Lacedemonians intermeddling among them, that he would make them speak their minds, but the tyrant flatly denied to withdraw from them the guards: whereupon the Argives fell into so great a passion, to no conclusion, and the conference brake up after that the tyrant had given the Roman General 60000 Deniers, and a truce made for the term of four months, between Neostratus the Precor of the Acharians, and Nabis the tyrant of the Laedemonians. From hence Quinius departed to Corinth and approached the gate with a Regiment of Cretians, that it might appear to Philetas the King. Captain there that the tyrant was revolted from Philip. Philetas also entered into a partie with the Roman General and when he was exhorted by him to depart out of hand and yield the City, he returned such an answer unto him that he deemed rather to defer, than to deny the thing. From Corinth Quinius crossed the Sea to Antiochia, from whence he sent his brother to found the nation of the Achaesians. And Aesclom departed directly from Argos to Sicyon. Where the City not only exalted the ancient honours of the King, with the addition of new, but also the King over and besides that he had purchased for them in time past the great land of Apollo, with a great sum of money, be sure he would not learn now also to pass by this friend. City allied unto him, without some royal bounty and munificence, he gave freely unto them and tenants of silver, and 30000 Medimmin of corn: and so returned to his ships at Cenebra. Nabis also having strengthened the garrison in Argos, returned to Lacedemon: and after himself had loosed the men of their mony and goods he sent his wife thither to do the like by the women. Who ending for the honourable & N. worshipful dames of the City inviting them one by one to their house, and otherwheres many together at once such as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatening got from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end stript off their apparel also, and all the jewels and ornaments that they wore.

A conful having forced Lemos the head City of Acaarnia, received the Acaarnians upon their submission and surrender. C. Sempronius Tudicinus the Pretor was slain, and his army defeated by the Celtiberians. Atallus being fallen suddenly sick, was removed from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this life. Peace was granted to Philip upon his surety, and liberty restored to Greece, L. Furius and C. Claudius Marcellus, the two Conuls, finished the Boeotians and Thracesians in Gaul. Marcellus triumphed. Annual being prattled in Altrock to raise war, but to no effect, was therapeuton acceded unto the Romans, by letter sent from the principal of the adverse faction: but for fear of the Romans, who had dispatched their Embassadors to the Carthaginians seats about him, he fled unto Antochius King of Syria, who also prepared then to make war upon the Romans.

B. The beginning is not extant in the Latin.

adjoining in those quarters to Acaarnia. There was a freight paid or gullet there, half a mile aloft in length, but not half a mile in breadth: at the end of this freight standeth the City Lemos planted against an hill that turneth to the East, and looketh toward Acaarnia. The baie Town is built upon a plain reaching along the sea that divideth Lencanas from Acaarnia. Whereupon the City, as well on the land side, as by sea, is easy to be forced. For the foords of the water reseem a standing lake rather than a sea, and the whole soil is a light earth, running east and west to be wrought into. So that in many places on one the walls either undermined or shaken with the rain, came tumbling down. But as the Town it fell was insufficient, so the hearts of the Townsmen were inflamed. For night and day they gave not over, to repair the cracks of the shaken walls, to fill up the open breaches and ruins to make head inutility, and skirmish with the enemy, and rather to defend the walls by force of arms, than to save themselves by strength of their walls. And Jurely a longer siege they would have made of it than the Romans hoped but that certain banished perions, Italians born, dwelling in Lemos let in and received armed solderiers on the Castile side. Howbeit the Lencadians embattel'd themselves in their market place, encountered them as they ran down from the higher ground with a great cry and noise, and maintained battle with them for a long time. In this mean while, the walls in diverse places were scale'd with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heaps of stones that lay at the breaches, entered the Town. And now by this time the Lieutenants in person, with many companies environed them as they sought some thin in the midst, others shun'd away their weapons, and yeelded to the conqueror. After few days, upon the news of the field fought at Cynocephale, all the States of Acaarnia came in, and submitted themselves to the Lictor.

At the same time, whiles fortune turn'd thus about, and bare down a side all at once, the Rhodians also sent out Paonfratius their Pretor with 300 footmen of Achæans about 1900 soldieris well armed, gathered out of all sorts of auxiliaries, to regain and reconquest from Philip the country of Peræas, lying in the main and firm land, which had been holden sometime, and possesse'd by their ancenours. And these soldieris were compounded and mixed of French, Nufeas, Puteus, Thaïans, and Areas of Affrikos, and Laodiacanes of Asia. With these forces Paonfratius encamp'd in the territory of Stratonicea, and there he seiz'd of a commodious place, and very good for his purpose, as unwares to the Kings company that had holden the same. Thither came 3000 and to aid them in very great numbers, a Regiment of 1000 foot and 100 horse of Achæans, levied for that purpose, and were commanded by Theoxenus, Democrates a captain under the King, willing to recover the said hold again, first pitch'd his tent hard against the enemies' camp. But afterwards he removed to another fort in the territory like wise of Stratonicea, which they call Affragon: and having rais'd together all the garrisons, did stirr up divers places, and lent for the auxiliary bands all of Thessalius, even from Stratonicea, he took his way and march'd toward Alabard, where the enemies were. The Rhodians like wise for their part were ready for battle, and after they were encamp'd of both sides near together immediately they entred into the field to fight it out. Dimosthenes placed in the right point 500 Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the left, in the main battalions, he belterow'd all tho' that he had gather'd together out of the garrisons belonging to the forts above said, who for the most part were Carians, the points he flank'd round about with his cors of Horse. The Rhodian cohort was march'd in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candiots and Phocians kept the right point, the hired soldiers (and they were a power of elect soldiers) stood in the left, in the midst were the aidis (a mixture of many nations) the cavalry and all the light armed soldiers that were, compos'd the corners like wings. All that day the two armys stood only upon the bank of a brook which ran between them with a small and shallow water: and after some loose shot discharged, they retir'd into their tents. The next day they were ranged in like order, and struck a battle exceeding the proportion of their number; for on each side there were not above three thousand foot, and upon a hundred horse: but they were even

G matched not in number only and armour, but also in equal courage and hope alike. The Achæi first pitch'd over the laid brook, and charg'd upon the Agrians: afterwards the whole armay ran as one would lay, over the River. The fight continued long doubtful. The Achæi being of themselves in number a thousand, disterd some four hundred of the other, and forced them to retreat, and afterwards the entire right point of the battalions began to shrink and give ground. As for the Macedonians, so long as their battalions called Phalans kept their array and stood close together, could not possibly be miss'd or removed; but after their left side was laid naked, and they began began to reach out on all hands their long pikes against the enemy, charging them across upon the flanks, they were presently troubled; and first they put themselves in disarray, afterwards they turned their backs, and laid of all flung their weapons from them, and ran away for life; until they were come to Bargis, Thither also was done the war. The Rhodians having followed the chase as long as they had any day to see, retired into their camp. And for certain it is known, if in this train of victory they had presently made speed to Stratonicea, they might have been masters of the Town, and never drawn word for it: but whiles they spent time in recovering the burrough Towns and forts of Peræa, they let this opportunity flip out of their hands, and lost it for ever. For in the mean space, they that lay in garrison and held Stratonicea, were encouraged, and took better heart, done also anon with those forces of his that remained, put himself within the walls. Then was the Tower besieged and assailed, all in vain, neither could it be forced and won but by Antiochus, a certain time after. Thus went the affairs in Thessalon, in Achaia, and in Asia, much about one and the fel%t-name.

Philip being advertised that the Dardanians were entered within the confines of his realm, and bade the whole country of Macedonia, albeit he saw that almost in all parts of the world unhappy fortune still followed and courted both him and his wherefore they were: yet esteeming it more grievous and heavy than death itself to be disfaced of the possession of Macedonia also, he made a levy in great haste out of all his cities of six thousand foot, and 300 horses; with which power of Macedonians, he suddenly surprised the enemy (unprovided and not aware of his coming) about Stobi in Pelagonia. Great numbers of men were slain in conflict, but more in the fields, such as were disbanded, and ranged abroad for greediness of booty and pillage. But as many as could make means to lie more readily and easily away, never fownd out the trial of a battle, but returned home into their country. Having thus put life as it were again into his men by this one expedition and exploit (a matter of no consequence to the total adventure of his whole estate) he retired himself to Thessalonica.

The Punick war was not achieved and brought to an end so happily and in so good a time for the Romans (who otherwife should have wanried at once both against the Carthaginians and Philip) but it tell out as well and in as a season, that Philip was now vanquished; just against the time that Antiochus in Syria prepared to levy war against them. For besides that the service was much more easily managed against them single and apart, than it would have been if they had banded both at once, and brought their forces together, I chance also that Spain about the very same instant brake out into tumultuous insurrection.

Antiochus being returned to Antioch there to winter, after he had the summer before brought under his subjection all the Cities belonging to Ptolemaus, within the country of Coat-Syria, was yet never the more at quiet, and mindful of peace afterwards. For when he had assembled a puissant power both of land and also of sea, made and purposed to employ the whole strength of his realm, he sent afore by land in the beginning of the spring, his two sons Ardaus and Hasdrubal with a mighty army, commanding them to attend him at Sardis: himself in person set forth a Voyage by Sea, with a fleet of a hundred sail of covert ships with decks and hatches, besides two hundred lighter Vessels, as Galions and Brigantins, purposing at one time to assay all the Cities in Cicilia and Caria, coasting along the Sea side; which were within the Dominion of Ptolemaus and withal to aid Philip as well with shipping as soldiers, for as yet Philip was not utterly subdued, nor the war with him brought to a final end. Many brave and worthy expostures enterprised the Rhodians both by Sea and Land, in their loyalty and faithfulness to the Romans, and for the safeguard and defence of all the Greekish Nation. But no one thing shewed their magnificence more than this, that being nothing terrified at that time with such a World of wars threatened against them, they sent Embassadors to the King to let him understand, that if he failed forward and played not his Armado, they would encounter him at the Bay of Nepheus (which is a promontory or Cape of Cicilia, renowned for the ancient league of the Athenians.) And this did they, not upon any hatred they bare to his person, but to impeach him only for coming to join with Philip; whereby to hinder the Romans in their good course of setting Greece at liberty.

At the same time Antiochus was busied in the siege and assault of Coraxenium, against which he had placed all ordnance and engines of battery: for he was already master of the Cities of Iphyrivm, Soloi, Abprimus and Carina, and having doubled the point of a promontory or cape or forland also of Cicilia he had won likewise the City of Selinus. All these, and many other forts of that coast being yielded unto him by composition, either for fear or willingly, without any assault, only Coraxenium that their gates against him, and laid his progress beyond his expectation.

There the Embassadors of the Rhodians had audience. And albeit that embassage was such as might have set a King into a fit of choler and chafed his blood, yet he tempered his anger, and made answer that he would send his Embassadors to Rhodes, and give them in charge to renew the ancient rights and privileges as well of his own as of his ancestors with that City and State, and to will them not to stand in fear of the Kings coming, for that neither they nor any allies of theirs should sustain harm or damage by him. For it was no part of his meaning to infringe and break the amity which he had with the Romans, as it may appear as well by his late embassage sent unto them, as also by the honorable decrees and answers made by the Senat and sent unto him. For it fortuned that even then the Embassadors of King Antiochus were returned from Rome, having had a friendly audience there, and a gracious dispatch, according as the time required:

* Ptolemaus, and Crispina.
* Rhodians, or Rhobal.
* The consul, or Bo-Callalter.
* Torcanians, and Finicia.

* Scandolara.
* S. Thesdera, Cusc, or Charachifera.
* Statemara. or Sibera.

A quired: for as yet the issue of the war against Philip was uncertain. While the Kings Embassadors delivered their points in the assembly of the Rhodians, there arrived a post with news, that the war was ended by means of a victory achieved by the Romans against Philip at Croesusphate. These tidings being once heard, the Rhodians put all fear now of Philip were of advice to meet Antiochus at sea with their navy. For they had a second care besides which they neglected not, to maintain the liberty of those allied Cities pertaining to King Priam, against which war was menace from Antiochus. Some of them concurred with sending side unto them, and others by fore-cast and giving them warning of the disengagements and enterprizes of their enemies: whereby they were a caution, that the Conatii, Mysics, they of Helicarnassus and Samos enjoyed still their entire freedom. But needless is it for me, to relate all the occurrences and affairs that passed in these parts, considering how little have enough to do, and hardly be able to jet down and go through with those that properly concern the Roman war. At the same time also King Attalus was brought back from Thessalonica, and there departed this world in the sixteenth year of his age; when had reigned forty four. This man was beholden to Fortune for nothing else but riches, that might commend him to the hope of a kingdom. He employed the same with such wisdom and magnificence, that first in his own conceit, and afterwards in the judgment of others, he was not thought unworthy to be a King. Afterwards when he had vanquished in one battell the Gauls; (a nation at that time newly arrived in Asia, and therefore the more dread and terrible) he took upon him to be styled King, and ever after carried a mind answerable to the grandeur and Majesty of that name. His own subjects he governed with singular justice. To his allies he showed himself most fair and faithful. His friends he used with all kindnels and bounty. A wife and four children he had living when himself died; and left his kingdom so fair and well settled, that the possession thereof continued firm to the third digest and generation after him.

Whiles things stood thus in Asia, Greece, and Macedonia, and the war with Philip speedily ended, or at least wise peace not fully concluded, there arose a mighty war in the Province of Spain beyond the river Iberus. M. Hebrons at that time was governor there, who by his letters advertised the Senate, that Cotta and Lufrinius, two Princes in those parts, were gone out, and had taken arms; that with Cotta there banded seventeene towns, and with Lufrinius the strong and pleasant Cities Cordo and Bardo: that the whole sea coast, which hitherto by open rebellion showed not their rebellious hearts, would doubtles upon the commotion of those their neighbours, make like a an intestine particular with them. After these letters were read by M. Sergius the Praetor, who had the jurisdiction between Citizens and aliens, the LL. of the Senate ordained, that after the election of new Praetors was past, he to whole lot the government of Spain fell, should propose unto the Senate in all convenient speed as touching the war in Spain.

About that very time the Conulis repaired to Rome (from their Provinces) who held an assembly of the Senate in the Temple of Bellona: and when they demanded triumph in consideration of their good service, and happy exploits in war achieved: C. Atius Laboe and C. Rufinius, Tribunes of the Commons required, That the Conulis should speak severally by themselves concerning their obtaining triumph: for ifser them they would not joyfully to propound that thing in the house, to the end, that equal and imblamable honour should not be conferred upon persons of unlike quality, worth, and defect. And when Minutihs inferred again and said, That the Province of Italy fell unto them both in one comission, and Cornelius secured him withall averring, That he and his companion in government had managed all their affairs with one mind by common counsel and advice; that the Boians who passed over the river Po against him for to fascour the Julianians and Cenomans, were forced to turn back again to defend their own, by reason that the other Conuli his College made such waile and pillage in their fields and villages. The Tribunes concurred that Cornelius indeed had achieved to worthy exploits in war, that there was no more doubt to be made of his triumph, than of sending praise and thanks to the immortal gods: but neither he nor any other Citizen food ever at any time in such grace, favour, and credit, that having obtained the honour of a triumph for himself, he should impart that glory unto his College and fellow; we were to himselfe as to crave it. As for Q. Minutius (lay they) he made some flight skirmishes with the Ligurians not worth the talking of: many in France he left a good number of his foellards. And with that they named T. Juventius and Cneus the brother of Laboe, two Colounets of Tribunies of the camp, who were slain in an unfortniate battell, with many a brave and hardy man besides, as well Citizens as allies. And to conclude, there were some few towns and villages colourably yielded and rendred up for the time, without any assurance and security. These janglings and debates between the Conulis and the Tribunes continued for two days: but in the end, the Conuli being overcome with the importunity of the Tribunes, were content to propose the matter distinctly by themselves. And with the general voice and accord of all, a triumph was decreed for Q. Cornelius. The Placentins also and men of Cremona, were a great caule that this Conuli found more favours by reason that they gave thanks, and reported on his behalf, that they were delivered by his good means from the siege, yes, and most of them recovered from servitude out of the hands of their enemies. Q. Minutihs having only calt a profit and made an affay of propounding his cause to the Senate, seeing them wholly bandied and set against him, said aloud, That in maintenance of Conultar authority, and by venue of that place, ye, and according to the good examples of divers noble and renowned personages he would triumph, and ask them no leave, in the mount Albin. But Cn. Cornelius whiles he was still in office triumphed over the Inhabitants and Cenomans. He carried in pomp before him a number of military engravings: he carried great store of French spoil and pillage to part in a pageant upon chariots taken from the enemy. Many Noblemen of France were led in a show before his own triumphal chariot: among whom (as some write) was Amilcar General of the Carthaginians. But above all others, the goodliest light was, a number of Colonizers and inhabitants of Cremona and Piacenza, who with bones or caps of liberty on their heads followed his chariot. He bare in triumph 235,700 Sesterces 7500 Bigats of silver coin, He divided among his horsemens seventy Alies apiece to every horsemans he gave double, and to each Centurion tributae so much. Q. Minnurus likewise triumphed in mount Albion over the Ligurians and the Boians in Gaul. The honoour of this triumph as it was lost, in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his acts, as also because all men knew full well, that the charges were not out of the common Cheif or Cam-an of the City: 10 for number of engravings, of chariots and spoils gained from the enemies, it was in manner equal, and comparable to the other. And of money he brought well-near as much as Cor- mius: for of bigat coins he had in prey 25,000 Alies, of silver coin in Bigat pieces 53,300. To common soldiers or footmen, to Centurions and horsemans he gave as much as his College. After this triumph there was a general assembly held for the election of Magistrats: wherein were created Conuls, L. Fabius Pauperus, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after these Prators were chosen, Q. Fabius Buteo, T. Sempronius Langus, Q. Minnurus Thamos, M. Acnthus Gabrio, L. Apulius Flbas and C. Laelius.

In the end of that former year, letters came from T. Quinctius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battle, ranged with King Philip within Thracia, where the army of the enemies was defeated and put to rout. Thse letters were first read in the Senate by Sergius the Prator, and then by order from the LL, in the publick assembly of the people. For this happy success, it was ordained. That there should be solemn processions for five days. Shortly after there arrived Embassadors both from T. Quinctius, and also from the King. The Macedonian Embassadors were brought without the City to the place of an ancient called Fulia palatia, where they were appointed their lodging rich presents were given them, and allowed they were the charges for themselves and their train. In the temple of Bello the Senate was assembled, where there passed not many words by reason that the Macedonians promised. That the King should perform whatsoever the L. Senat would let down. So (according to the ancient custom and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegates, by whose advice and counsell T. Quinctius the General, was to present and tender unto Philip, particular and conditions of peace: provided, that in the said number of Delegates, P. Sul panicked and P. Valerius should be comprised by name; who when they were Conuls governed the Province of Macedon. The same day, the Collins demanded and made suit, That the number of their Colonizers or inhabitants might be augmented: whereupon a new order was granted. That there should be a thousand new enrolled to the former: with this proviso, that in this number none of them should be matriculated, who after the Conulship of P. Sul panicked and P. Vembius had been enemies to the people of Rome. The Roman games and plays were that year exhibited as well in the Circus as upon the stage in the Theatre, by the Ediles Curule L. Cornelius Scipio and Cn. M. Manlius Vulso: who, as they were set out with more splendour and magnificence than ever before, so they were beheld with more joy contentment; and pleasure in regard that all things fell out to the advantage in the wars: and they were renewed and represented all three over. As for the plays called Phebe: they were set forth no less than seven times one after another. Acnthus Gabrio and C. Laelius exhibited those pastimes: who allo of their silver that arose of mines and fortiesses, carried three cast images of brais to be made, and erected them to the honour of Ce- res Liber and * Liber.

Now when L. Fabius and M. Claudius Marcellus were entered into their Magistracy, and after question made concerning their Provinces, the Senate passed a decree. That both of them joyfully should govern Italy: they requested that they might call lots for Macedon and Italy together, N. Marcellus more desirous of the town of the Province of Macedon, alleged, that the peace was not found but commiserable, pretended, and deceitfully; and that the King would take arms and war against the army were withdrawn from thence: by which words he put the LL, of the Senat into a deep study and inquiry, what to do or to think of it. And haply the Conuls had obtained their request, but that Q. Marinus Rex, and C. Atinus Labeos, two Tribunes of the Commons, protestated, that they would oppose themselves and crost it by their negative voice, unless they might still propose unto the people to know, Whether their will and pleasure was to entertain peace with King Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capitol before the people, was granted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirty, every one gave their affirmative voice, Hoi sophas! I.e. So be it as ye demanded.] And to the end, that all men might have more cause to rejoice that peace was confirmed with Macedon, there came heavy news out of Spain: and letters were divulged abroad containing thus much, That C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Vice-Prator in the hither Province of Spain, was vanquished in battle, that his army was dis- confused and put to flight, and divers men of name and mark slain, That Tuditanus himself was car- ried forth of the conflict grievously wounded, and soon after died. The Province of Italy was al- lured for both the Collins with those two legions which the former Collins had in charge, and A order granted, that they should levy and enroll four new legions, whereof two should be sent whether it pleased the Senate to appoint, And T. Quintius Flamininus was commanded to rule his Province still with the same army, and his Communion of longer government was renewed. After this, the Praetors call for the parting of their Provinces, T. Aulus Fullo obtained the jurisdiction of the Citizens of Rome, and M. Actius Glabrus was Chief Justice between Citizens and forraiers. Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of the baie or farther Spain, and Q. Minucius Thermus of the higher or nearer Spain, T. Licinius Sicilius, and Sardinia to T. Sempronius Longus. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fabius Buteo, and Q. Minucius, to whom the rule of the Provinces in Spain belongeth, the Consuls should out of those four legions which they had enrolled, deliver one legion special, which they thought good, and of allies and of the Latin nation, four thousand footmen besides, and three hundred horsemen to either of them. And these Praetors were enjoyed to go to their charges with all speed possible.

The war in Spain began afresh, in the fifth after that the former together with the Punick war was ended, but before that these Praetors went forth to this war: (which may be counted as it were now, in regard that the Spaniards now first, and never before, was reviled in their own proper name, without either leader or army of Corinose) and before that the Consuls themselves departed out of the City, order was given, that according to the old custom they should provide for the providions tokens that were reported, L. Julius, as he rode on her back into the Sabinus country, was both himself and his horse dead with lightning. The temple of Ferona in the territory of Capena, was likewise smitten and blasted from heaven. At the Temple of Mars, the iron heads of two spear were sent to burn on a light fire. A Woof expressed to enter into the City at the gate Esquilina and ran through the most populous part thereof as far as unto the market place; and so forward to the Tufican street, and from thence through the Melius, and paffed forth again at the gate Capena untouched; and in manner without taking any harm.

These prodigious signs were purged by the sacrifices of greater beasts. At the same time Cr. Cornelius Lentulus, who had governed the Province of high Spain before T. Quinctius, entered the City by order from the Senate in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pomp 1515 pound weight of gold: of silver likewise in bullion 2000 pound weight: and in coin 34550 deniers. L. Scribonius from the nearer Spain, brought into the city 5000 pound weight of silver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtain a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and spoiles D won from the enemies, hecaused two arches to be erected in the beast market, even before the Temple of Fortune, and the goddesses Minerva and one besides in the grand Cirque or show-place.

And upon these arches he set up gilded Statues. These were all the affairs, to speak of, that passed this winter-feast.

There winterted at that time in Athens Quintus, and among many other letters that came unto him with their petitions, the Boetians exhibited a request, and obtained the fame, to wit, that as many of their nation as had served in the wars under Philip, might be restored and sent home again unto them: which was easily granted by Quinctius, not so much, for that he thought them worthy of that favour, but because he was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Roman name, now especially that he had some doubt of King Astroclus. They were not delivered to soon, but seen it was, how little the Boetians would be beholding to him for it. For they sent presently unto Philip, and gave him thanks for the rendering of those men, as if they had been delivered by him, and not by Quintius and the Romans. And in their next assembly generally for their solemn election, they chose one Baccilas for their Baccilas, or Lord governour of Baccilas for no other reason, but because he had been the Colonell of those Boetians that bare arms for the King; but they passed by Zeroppas, Piffroensus, and others, that had persuaded to make a league with the Romans, this wrought discontentment in their petitions for the present, and fear for the time to come. For thus they reasoned with themselves, if they would do thus while the Roman army lay encamped near to their gates, what should become of them when the Romans were departed into Italy, and whiles Philip was near at hand to affist those that sided with him, and to annoy those of the adverse part and faction? Therefore they composed and concluded in the end to make away Baccilas the head of the Kings bend, whiles the Roman forces were at hand. And so chusing a convenient and fit opportunity for their purpose, at what time as he returned home ward drunk from a publick solemn feast, accompanied with certain pleasant and effeminate persons who to make sport and mirth had been at that great feast; he was overtarped and beft with fix armed men whereof three were Italians, and three Etilians, and so murdured. His train that attended him ran away, and railed hte and cry, and called for help. Much trouble and hurly-burly there was throughout the City, much running to and fro with torch-light. But they that did the deed were escaped out at the next gate. In the morning betimes the people in great number assembled in the Theatre, being called together by the voice of the common Beadle, as if the murderers had been detected. Openly it was in every mans mouth, that he was killed by his own retinue, even those filthy wanton persons that he had about him: but secretly in their minds they deemed Zeroppas the author of the murder. For the present it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his train, and that they should be examined. Whiles search was made for them, Zeroppas came forth into the assembly, with the like intent to aver all suspicion of crime from himself, saying, that men were much deceived to think that so horrible and strange a murder was committed by such weaklings & persons as they were.
This he argued and discoursed by many likelihoods and probabilities to the same effect; by which he means some were very persuaded, that if himself had been guilty of the fact, he would never have offered and pretended himself in the face of the assembly, or broached any words at all of the murder, especially when no man urged him thereto. Others there were again, who made no doubt but by this impudent fiction, his drift was to prevent an accusation, and to turn away all suspicion from himself. The innocent and guiltless creatures within a while after being examined upon the rack and tortured, knowing what was the general opinion and conceit of men, made their tale for to bolt out and reveal the fact; and so they named Zеноppus and Пiσδραυας for the principals, without any preumption or light given how they should seem to come to the knowledge of anything. Howbeit Zenoppus accompanied with one Στρατονιακι fled by night to Тαμαγα, testing the remorse and prick of his own conscience more than the appealing and in formation of those persons who neither were party nor privy to any thing. But Pisdras making no regard of their accusers, remained still at Θήβαι, Now had Zenoppus one bondslave, (who hand in hand was in all this action, and had been a courier between) whom Pisdras feared that he would betray him, and by that very fear cauht him to open and declare the whole matter. He dispatched therefore his letters unto Zenoppus, advising him to rid that flait from out the way, who was privy to their dealing; advertising him, that in his conceit he was not so meet to conceal the thing now done, as he was a fit instrument at the time to execute the same. The bearer of these letters he straightly charged to deliver them unto Zenoppus immediately with all speed. But he, because he could not spy a convenient time to meet with him himself, gave the letters to the very same slave, whom he supposed to be most fit and truly to his Master: adding moreover, and saying, That they came from Pisdras unto Zenoppus, and imported matter of great consequence. The bond slave promised to deliver them incontinently; but being touched in conscience, he was so bold as to break them open; and when he had read them through, he fled back in great fear to Θήβαι (where he bewrayed Pisdras). Zenoppus troubled in spirit for the flight of his bond man, retired himself to Αθήναι, supposing it a place of more security to live in, as a banished man. As for Pisdras, after he had been divers times examined upon the rack, was put to death in the end. This murder wondrously estranged the Thebans and Βοιωτιοι, and let their hearts against the Romans: insomuch as they hated and detested them to death. Taking great indignation that Zenoppus (a principal and chief personage of their nation) had committed so foul and hainous a fact. To rebel in open terms, they had neither force sufficient to maintain them, nor a principal head to direct and lead them. Whereupon they fell to that which is next cousin to plain war, even to the robbing and pillaging by the high ways side, in each fort, as they surprized as well some soldiers who lodged near unto them, and were their guests, as others that wandered and ranged abroad from the garrisons in winter time, and travelled about their affairs, who otherwheres were caught up by the way, and came short home. Some passengers were killed in the port-rode-waies, by those that lay in wait for them in notorious thievish corners: others were trained and led deceitfully through by-lanes into defect places, there to take up their innes and lodging, and then were murdered. At length they paid these pranks not only of malice unto them but also for greedy desire of booty and spoil, by reason that commonly these waiting men went about their trade and merchandize, and therefore had some charge about them, and carried silver in their belts. Now when as at first there were come out of the way, and every day more than other many men missing, and no man knew what was become of them, all Αρχαῖα began to have an ill name, and the soldiers were more afraid to travel there, than in the enemies country. Then Κοπαῖς sent certain Embassadors to all the Cities for to make complaint of these robberies and enormities. Many footmen there were found dead about the mead or lake * Copais, where their carcases were raked forth of the mud and mire, and drawn out of the standing water, tied and fastned as they were to heavy stones or some great vessels, that by their poise they might be plunged, and sink to the bottom. Many such like outrages were found to have been committed at Αρεσπεδω and Κόρονας, Κυκλάντιοι at the first demanded to have the offenders delivered unto him; and for five hundred soldiers (for so many were caught up by the way and murdered) he enjoined the Βοιωτιοι to make payment of five hundred talents of silver. But the Cities would do neither the one nor the other: only they paid with bare words, and excused themselves in that nothing had been done by publice warrant or counsell from the State. Whereupon the Embassadors were sent to Αθήναι, and into Αχαια, to make protestation unto their allies, that they would pursue the Βοιωτιοι with open war, upon good ground and just cause offered. And so after he had given commandment unto Π. Κλεονις to go unto Αρεσπεδω with one part of his forces, himself with the other set him down about Κόρονας, and placed siege unto it. But first the territory was laid waste, all the way as the two armies marched from Ελαίνα in divers quarters. The Βοιωτιοι plagued with these lofes and calamities, seeing nothing but fear and flight in every place, sent their Embassadors unto him: but when they could not be admitted into the camp, the Αχαιαns and the Αθηναῖοι were so lain to come with them. The Αχαιαns were of greater credit, to entreat in their behalf: for unless they might obtain pardon and peace for the Βοιωτιοι, they determined also to enter into the quarter, and to make war themselves. By whole mediation the Βοιωτιοι had access unto the Roman General, and audience granted. Who after they were enjoined to deliver up the offenders and molefactors to Justice, and to pay thirty talents for amends and satisfaction, obtained peace: and so the siege was raised.
After some few days, the ten Delegates or Committees from Rome, were arrived, by whose advice and counsell peace was artificed and capitulated with King Philip, upon these conditions: *In primis, That all the Greek Cities, as well in Europe as in Asia, should enjoy their liberty, and live under their own laws. Item, That Philip should withdraw his garrisons out of all as many of them as had been in subjection under him. Item, That he do the like by those which were in Asia to wit, Euromus, Pedasos, Brygylus, Iasius, Myrina, Abydus, Thessalonica, and Perinthus, all which the Romans required be left. As concerning the liberty and freedom of the Greeks, it was commanded, That Quintus should write his letters to Prusias, the King of Bithynia, giving him an understanding of the advice and pleasure of the Senate, and the ten Delegates aforesaid, Item, That Philip render all the prisoners and fugitive traitors to the Romans and yield up all the covered ships with Batches: and over and besides, one huge royal Galliace or Argolick, which by reason of the exceeding bigness was unwieldy and of little use, and was directed with sixteen banks of oars on a side, Item, That he should not have above five hundred men in arms, nor one Elephant at all, Item, That he should not war (but by leave and permission of the Senate) without the marches of Macedonia. Item, That he pay unto the people of Rome a thousand talents, the one half in hand, and the other at ten payments, within the term of ten years. Valerius Antias writeth moreover, that there was imposed upon him a tribute of four thousand pound weight of silver yearly, for ten years: and besides, twenty thousand pound weight presently, the same author fath that expressly it was capitulated, that Philip should not war at all with Eumenes the son of Attalus, who was newly come to the crown. For the assurance of these covenants, there were received hostages, and among them Demetrius King Philip his son, Valerius Antias hath written moreover, that the Island of Lecina, and certain Elephants were given in pure gift to Attalus in his absence: and that upon the Rhodians was bestowed Stratonicus, a City in Caria, with other Cities also which Philip had poftified. To conclude, that the Athenians received of free gift their Isles following to wit, Paros, Imbrus, Delos, and Sceira.

When all the States of Greece approved and thought well of this peace, only the Acullians secretly muttered & found fault with this order set down by ten Delegates above aforesaid; giving out, that they were but bare letters and vain words, shadowed with a counterfeit appearance of liberty. For to what end, they should some Cities be delivered to the Romans, and those not named? or others again be named, and yet order taken, that they without delivery should be free? but only for this purpose, that those Cities which are in Asia should be set free, because they bear off and therefore in more safety; but those that are in Greece, being not precisely named, should be seised upon by them to wit, Corinth, Chalcis, and Oreum, with Etruria, and Demetrias. And to this truth, this finding fault of theirs was not altogether frivolous, and without occasion taken: for some doubt there was of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: because in the order and act of the Senate, by virtue whereof those ten Delegates aforesaid were sent from the City, all other Cities of Asia and of Greece were doubled in plain terms freed: but as touching the three before named, the Delegates had in commission to take order, as they should declare it, and with the good of the Common-wealth, according to their own judgment and discretion, and the truth that was committed unto them. For well they witt that King Antiochus would pass over into Europe, so Efoon it ever he could bring his affairs about to his mind, and unwilling they were on any hand, that these Cities to commodious for his designs, should lie open and ready to his hand for to seize upon at his pleasure. So Quintus together with the ten Delegates failed from Elia into Antioch, and from thence to Corinth, where they held their Council and consulted of their affairs, Quinctus would very often lay unto them, That all Greece might be delivered and set at liberty, if they could restrain the tongues of the Acullians: if they were willing that their good affection should be deemed sincere, and the majority of the Roman name maintained among all; finally, if they would pretend and make it known abroad, that they were passed the less to set Greece free, and not after they had taken off the feignity of Philip to translate it unto themselves. The other again condemned nothing as touching the liberty of those Cities: howbeit, they made remonstrance, that it was the safer course for them, to remain awhile under the protection and safeguard of the Romans than that instead of Philip they should receive Antiochus for their Lord. In conclusion declared it was. That Corinth should be rendered to the Achæans, but yet so, that there should be a Roman garrison in the highest quarter of the City called Aeromantia, Item, That Chalcis and Demetrias should be retained still, untill such time as they were no more in fear and doubt of Antiochus.

Now approached the ordinary solemnity of the Ithmian games, unto which at all times usually there was great recourse of people, as well in regard of the natural disposition of that nation (devisers to see in what sports and pastimes, wherein was represented the trial of maisters in all kind of arts, in all feats either of mere strength, or agility and nimbleness of the body) as also in regard of the commodious feast of the place: whereunto from all parts of Greece they repaired thither by two divers and fainflessfeas. But being amused in expectation to know what the estate of Greeks, and what their own particular condition would be hereafter, divers men not only desired secretly with themselves, but also gave out and whispered in their speech and talk, Well, the Romans were set to behold this solemnity: and the publicke Crier with a trumpeter went forth into the midst of the Cirque or thrw-place, from whence the manner was to proclaim the sports and games aforesaid in a solemn set form of words: and after he had by sound of trumpets... made silence, he pronounced with a loud voice in this manner, "Be it known unto all men, that the H "Senat of Rome, and T. Quintius the General of their army, having vanquished King Philip and "the Macedonians, do ordain, that the Corinthians, the Phocensians, and the Locrenians, be all "free, and delivereth from all taxes whatsoever, and to live according to their own laws, Item, That "the Ille Eulaces, the Magneiases, Thesaliaces, Perrhbaniansez, Acheiines, and Phthiotcs do enjoy the "like freedom and immunity, And consequently he deceased all the nations which had been in "subjection to Philip. Upon this proclamation of the beard there was such joy, that men were not able to conceive and comprehend it. Every man could hardly believe that he had heard the thing which he so wished and desired afores to hear: one looked upon another wondering at the matter, as if it had been a vain vision or illusion of some dream; and well they trusted not their own ears in hearing that which particularly concerned every one, but enquired of them that ftood next unto them. The Crier was called back again: such a desire had each one not only to hear the glad tidings, but also to behold the happy messenger of this their liberty: and no remedy there was, but once again he must publish and pronounce the same. Now when their joy was once confirmed, they let up such a shout, and followed it so with clapping of hands, redoubling the fame (so often, as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleasing and welcome unto a multitude than is liberty. After this, the games were performed in such haste, that neither the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye busied to behold the fight thereof; so wholly had that one joy possessed them and forestalled the fense of all other pleasures and delights. But when the pageanes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman General, in such fort, that his person was in danger of the multitude, crowding too hard upon him alone, for K "desire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to cast garlands of flowers and la-"belis of fountain colours upon him: but being a man fat upon thence and thirty years of age, both
"the vigour of youth, and also the joy that he took for the accomplishment of so glorious an act, "afforded him strength enough to abide the pref of the people. This gladness of all men shewed it "felt not only for the present, but continued also for many days space, entertained not only in "thankful minds, but expressed also in joyful discourses: namely, "That there was one nation yet in "the world, which at their proper cost and charges, with their own pain and peril made war for "the freedom of others: who afforded this favour and pleasure not to the neighbours and bor"ders only, but to those that were joyed near to them in the continent and lamb land, but pas-
"fed over the seas to the end, that throughout the whole world there should be no unjust and I "tyrannical government, but in all places, right, reason, and law, might prevail most and carry "greatest sway. Lo, how by the only voice of one beard all the Cities of Greece and Asia are let
"free. To conccive and enterprize to great a thing proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart:
"but to effect the fame is a singular vertue and rare felicity.

This done, Quintius and the ten Delegates gave audience to the embassadors of Kings and "Princes, Nations and States, And first of all others were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called "in: who used the same speech in manner that they had at Rome, vantage great words without "any ground and subsistance of credit. But answcr was returned unto them, not covertly by way of circumstance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot and things did not doubtfull) but openly in plain terms. Imprimis, That Antiochus must quit and abandon all the Cities of Asia, which belong-g at any time either to King Philip or King Peloponnesus, Item, That he meddle not with any tree City or State, and especially with those of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to pass over himself, or to send any forces into Europe. After the Kings Embassadors were "licensed to depart, all the nations and states had a general election and meeting together, which "was the sooner dispatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegates all the Cities and States were pronounced by name, Unto the Oretians (a people in Macedon) for that they revolted first from the Kings their own lands and privileges were restored. The Magnesians, the Perrhban-is and Dolopian were likewise declared free. Unto the people of Thebaid over and above the grant of their liberty, the Phthiotian Achaeans were annexed, excepting the City of Thebek in Phthia and Pharsalus. As for the Arelians who required, that according to covenant Pharsalis N and Leucus should be rended unto them, they were put over unto the Senat. But they awarded them the Phocenses and Locrenses, with other apperences adjoyned before veritude of the decree, Corinth, Tebyphia, and Heraea (which also is a City of Peloponnesus) were rended unto the "Achaens. Moreover, these ten Delegates gave Ooreae and Eretria unto Emonese the son of Atta-"lus but by reason that Quintius would not agree thereto, the matter was referred over to the Se-
"nat for to be decided: and the Senat granted freedom unto these Cities, together with Corinthus.
"Unto Plestros were freely given Linguas and Parthumus, which were two nations in Illyricum, and had been both subject to Philip. It was ordained also, that Antiochus should hold thoese Casteis still, which during the wars he had won from Philip. When the assembly was dissolved, the ten Delegates having divided between themselves their several charges, departed every man to concerning some smaller matters, and withall demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to their counsel not only profitable unto himself but also necessary? The King made answer again and said, That he would not only give him the hearing, but also yield him thanks besides,

The three and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A in case he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon he prevailed him earnestly, that forasmuch as he had obtained peace already he should send his Embassadors to Rome to crave league alio and amnesty; to the end, that if Antiochus began to fight, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for some occasions and opportunities to make war. [This conference and communication with Philip was at Tempe in Thessaly.] And when he answered, That he would immediately dispatch his Embassadors Cornelius came to Thebes, where a solemn Diet and assembly of all Greece was wont to be held upon certain fast days, and thither refract great numbers of people, which meeting is called Pylenem: where he advised the Eotolians especially to receive constant and faithful in the amity of the people of Rome. Some of the principal Eotolians seemed to complain between whiles, that the Romans were not so well affected to their nation after victory, as they were in time of the war; but others, more sharply blamed and reproached them, yea, and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have been vanquished no, nor the Romans ever able so much as to pass over into Greece, without the help of the Eotolians. Cornelius forbade to make answer again to those points, for fear of further wrangling and altercation; and promised, that if they sent to Rome they should obtain anything that was real. Whereupon by his advice and approbation there were decreed Embassadors. This was the issue and end of the war with Philip.

While these affairs thus palled in Greece, Macedonia, and Asia, all the Grecian manner was gone out and riven up in arms by occasion of a conspiracy of bondslaves. For to enquire into their troubles and to repel the fame, there was sent M. Acilius Praetor [who had the civil jurisdiction between Citizens and aliens] with one of the two legions of Roman Citizens. Some of them, who were already assembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight; of whom many were slain and many taken prisoners. Others he scourged and round trunfled up, hanging them on gybsters, even as many as were the principal and chief of the conspiracy: and others there were, whom he sent home again to their Masters.

Now the Conuls were gone into their Provinces, Marcellus so soon as he was entered into the marches of the Boians, and had over-wearied his fojourners with marching all day long, fate him down upon a certain rising of a hill, and there as he was encamping himself and his men, Coriolanus a Prince or great Lord of the Boians, with a mighty power essayed and charged him, and flew upon three thousand of his men. In which sudden and tumultuous skirmish, certain brave men of mark were slain; among whom were T. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Junius Silanus two Colonels of the allies; also A. Ocius and P. Claudius two Knight Marshals or Tribunes of the second legion. Howbeit the Romans strongly fortified their tents and defended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their forlorn victory had long essayed to no effect. And in the same standing camp he continued certain days, whiles he cured his fojourners of their wounds, and recovered their hearts after to great a fright. The Boians as they are a nation that of all things cannot endure any tedious delay of time dispersed themselves into their towns and forts. Then Marcellus presently crossed the Po, and led his army into the territory of Conus, where the Infubrians lay encamped after they had solicited and confud the allies of Conus to take arms. The legions made no more ado, but gave them battall in the very way: and at the first encounter the enemies charged them so hotly that they forced the forefront of the battall to give ground. Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing left being once discovered they should be repulsed and discomfited, he made a cohort of Matians to make head; and at once set forth all the troops of the Latin Cavalry against them. Their first and second charge both, mightily impasted and quailed the enemy, advancing forward swiftly and pestling upon them in great fury: whereby the rest of the Roman army taking heart again and being encouraged at the first received them manfully and made resistance only, but after wards followed fiercely upon them: insomuch as the Gauls were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backs, took them to their heels, and ran away by heaps, Velarius Antonius writeth, that in this battall there were forty thousand men slain and above five hundred and seven military ensigns taken, with 432 chariots besides many chains of gold, whereof Claudius presented one (very massive above the rest and of great weight) unto Jupiter, which was hung up within the Temple in the Capitol, as he writeth. The same day was the Camp of the Gauls forced and ravished, and the town of Conus also within few days taken by assault. Upon this there were eight and twenty boroughs or forts that fell away and revolted to the Conuls, but the Historiographers agree not upon this. Whether the Conuls led his forces against the Infubrians first, or the Boians; and whether he raised out the dishonour of a former soil and defeat by a fortunate victory in this battall; or contrariwise, after a prosperous right achieved before Conus, he blotted and defaced the fame with a flambeul overthrow received at this hand.

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Purpurio the other Conul, marched into the Boian Country through the tribe Soppusia. And when he was approached near to a Cattle called Matians, he feared lest he should be enclosed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligurians: whereupon he retired with his forces the same way that he came, and fetched a great compass about through the open country in safety and security, he came at length to his Colleague, who having joined both their powers together, first ranged over the Boians territories, wasting and spoiling until they came as far as Felina. This Town with other strong burroughs and forts, and in a manner all the Boians yielded themselves, gave only their youth, who were up.

up in arms to pill and spoil, and were at that time retired unto the forrests and glins out of the H way. After this the army marched toward the Ligurians. The Boians making full account to assail the Roman army at unawares, which marched without good regard of themselaves, and not close together (for that their enemies seemed to be far off) followed after through the blind and convert forrests. But when they saw that they could not overtake them, they suddenly all at once pas-shed over the Po in small boathoms and pumps, and after they had spoiled and pill'd the Levians and Lubians, as they returned from thence with a booty raised out of the country, they chanced in the umm' roll frontities of Liguria, to light upon the army of the Romans in their march, Sooner and with more exaggers fell they to fight, than if they had appointed both time and place, and been prepared aforesaid to strike a battell. There it well appeared, of what force anger is to prick on and sharpen mens spirits to conflict, For the Romans more greedy of murder and bloodshed, I than of victory, fought so, as they scarce left the enemies one messenger to carry the news of their unhappy overthrow, In regard of these exploits, upon the ComiiIs letters brought to Rome, ordained it was, that there should be a solemn process and thanksgiving to the gods for these three daies.
Shortly after Marcellus came to Rome, unto whom was granted a triumph with great content of the L.L. of the Senate; and whiles he was in his Magnificity he triumphed over the Inhabitants and Comians, leaving for his Colleague good hope likewise of a triumph, because himself to say truth Jin that nation fought but unfortunately, whereas his Colleague sped well enough, and had a lucky hand, Much more of the enemies was carried in a pomp upon the Chariots that were taken and won from them, Many ensigns and banners were born in a show, besides in money, to the value of 365000 drachms of bronz coin; and 234000 bigge pieces of silver. The footmen had 800 stles K given them spacious, every horseman and centurion had trisco as much.

The same year King Antiocbus, whiles he kept his winter at Ephesus, affaid to reduce all the Cities and States of Asia unto the ancient form of government and subjection, afirming himself, that the revt would not be hard to be subdued and brought under, because the towns were either situate upon plains or nothing well fortified with walls, and not furnished with men and municions. As for * Smyrna and * Lamphacus, they stood upon their freedom, and challenged it. Doubted it was, and great danger, that if he should let them go clear away fo, some Cities in * Esody and Ionia would take after Smyrna, and others in Hellefons follow the example of Lamphacus, Therefore both themself went from Ephesus to lay siege unto Smyrna, and gave commandment, That the forces which were at Abdyus (leaving only a small garrison behind 8) should be lead to the siege and affault of Lamphacus. And yet he threatened and terrifed them not so much with forces and violence, but affaid them rather by fair means, sending to them his Embassadors, fo as, partly by flattering and gente words wherewith he entreated them, and partly by mild reproof for their rashness and obstinacy, he endeavoured to put them in some hope, that shortly they should have whatsoever they desired: and then, both they themselves, and all others should evidence see, that they had obtained their liberty by the especial grace and favour of the King, and not usurped and gained it by occasion of some advantage and opporunity. To this they anfwered again, That Antiocbus sought neither to marvell, nor be offended and displeased at them, if they could not we endorse the hope which they had of freedom thus to be deferred from time to time. Then he departing from Ephesus in the beginning of the spring failed unto Hellefons with his fleet. His land forces he transported over to * Maditos a City in Chersohnesfand joined them to his strength by fea. And because they shut the gates upon him, he environed the town with armed men, and when he was at the point to give the affault, and to bend his engines of batter at against the walls it was surrendered into his hands. Upon the like fear the Inhabitants alfo of other Cities in Chersonneus yielded themselves. After this he came to * Lysmachia with his whole power, as well of land-fouldiers as sea-servitors. And finding it abandoned, ruinat, and lying (as if it were ) along, (for but few years before the Thrascians had forced sacked, and burnt it) he had great desire to rear and set upright again that noble and famous City, seated in good and commodious a place. And therefore he took great care, and employed all his endeavours to re-edifie the walls, to re-build the edifices, to redeem and ronisom the Lysmachians that were in supremacy, ry, to seek out all those that were defivered over Hellefons and Chersonneus, and gather them together, yea and to enroll new inhabitants upon hope of gain and profit, and by all means possible fo to se and people the City again. And withall, because he would eafe them of the fear they had of the Thrascians, he went in perfon with the one half of his land-forces to waste and spoil the confines of Thrace, the other part with all the sea-fouldiers and mariners he left hard at work about the repairing of the City.

About this time as L. Cornelius (being fent by the Senate to compose the controversies and variance between the two Kings, Antiocbus and Ptolemy) abode at Seleymbria: fo of the ten Committers abovesaid, P. Lentulus departed from Baregyle, P. Villius and L. Terentius from Thaflus, and arrived all three at Selymbria: where L. Cornelius likewise met them from Seleymbria: and O only afterwards divers amiable kindnesse and loving entertainments mutually. But when they entered once to part of their Commission that they had in charge, and of the present State of Asia, then there was fretting and fumming and their bIoud up. The Roman Agents fluck not to tell him to his face, that all that he had done, since he took the sea and departed with his fleet out of Syria A was displeasent unto the Senat, saying, "That they thought it meet, that all the Cities should be appealed into King Pidomus, which had been under his dominion. For as touching those towns, which sometime Philip had been possetled of, and which Antiochus had surprized and feised upon, taking his time and vantage, when Philip was employed another way in the Roman wars, it was no reason, nor thing tolerable, that the Romans should for so many years, price, by land and sea endure to great toil, and hazard such perils, and suffer Antiochus in the end to go away with the fruit and reward of all the service, But let the care, that the Romans would have no knowledge of his coming into Asia, as a matter imperinent to them: for they disemble so, that now he is come over into Europ with all his forces both for land and sea, and little wanchest of making open war upon the Romans? Mary, as for him, he will not let to deny that he levies any war, although he were arrived and landed in Italy, To these challenges the King made answer, and said, That he saw well enough and knew before that the Romans were inquiet, and curious enough to search what King Antiochus ought to do, but they never once thought of their own selves, how far they should by right proceed, as well by land as by sea, as for Asia, it appertained not at all to the people of Rome, neither had they more reason to enquire what Antiochus did in Asia, than Antiochus to search into the actions of the people of Rome in Italy. As concerning Pidomus from whom they complain, that he had taken certain Cities; they did them understand, that there was animity between him and Pidomus, and they were now in terms of knitting themselves shortly in nearer bonds of alliance and amity. Neither sought he the poil of Philip, and to enrich himself by his adversity and misfortune for settled other into Europe against the Romans." But when he had vanquished one, all else he had by right and law of war, became the possessions of Seleucus, and to conjonquently as he took it, appertained unto him. And during the time, that his successors and predecessors, were cut and troubled with other affairs, first Pidomus caught at some things, and Philip after another, and to between them, was swayed and forced upon other mens possessions, and namely, of certain places near and hard by in Tarsus, which without all controversy belonged unto Lycaonia, and forc'd the poor subjects to his ancient State, was thither come, and now was in hand to re-edit Lycaonia, anew lately destroyed by the violence of the Thracians, to the end that Seleucus his son might hold it as the royal seat of his kingdom, Thus as they continued arguing and debating for certain dates, there ran a rumor, but without any certain author, that King Pidomus was dead: whereupon they could grow to the conclusion of all their pastimes; yet they made blambe on both sides, that they heard nothing thereof. And as well L.Cornelius, who was sent in Embassage to both the Kings, Antiochus and Pidomus, requeste to some small time to confer with Pidomus, to the end that himself might be arrived in Egypt, before any alteration were made in the new possession of that kingdom; as also Antiochus made reckoning, that Egypt would be his if this good occasion then were prevented in him. Therefore having dismissed the Romans, and left his son Seleucus behind him, with all the hand forces, for to finish the building again of Lycaonia, which he had begun, himself with all his fleet failed to Ephesus; and having left his Embassadors to Quintus to treat soberly about a league and amity he coasted along Asia, and so arrived "Lyctis. And when he heard for certain at "Paxea that Pidomus was yet living, he gave to his purpose of falling into Egypt, but nevertheless he shaf his course & set sail for Cypurs; and when he had doubled the point of Chelidion, he said awhile in "Pamphylia about the river "Euphrates, by occasion of a mutiny among the men, & one or two, from thence he weighed anchor, and when he was failed as far as a place called "The hale of the river "Sirus there stole a guilt and fearful tempest, wherein he had like to have been cast away and drowned with all his fleet. Many of his ships were run aground, & many of them swallowed up of the sea, so as there eschewed not one of them by swimming to land. A number of men there perished, not of base men: officer, and unknown common soldiers but also of his near: and special friends. Having rallied the dipterely ballasts of this shipwreck, seeing there had been no means & was not able to reach and gain Cypurs, he returned again to Seleucus, with an arm of a thing fit prudent nor so well furnished, as when he set out in his voyage. There he commanded his ships to be haled ashore, and laid up in their docks (for winter now approached) & himself took his journey to Antiochus, there to lye all that winter time, And in their terms flood the affairs of the Kings, At Rome, there were first instilled in this year three Triumphs called Ephesius, to wit. C. Licinius Lucullus to C. Romuleius (who was the man that put up the bill for their creation) and P. Porcius Lcean. And by a law in that behalf ordained, thec Triumphs were allowed as well as a Bishop, the long embroidered robe of purple. But in this year great debate & variance was between the Quoaters or Treasurers of the City Q. Fabius Labor & L. Annius of the one side, and all the Priests on the other side. These treasurers were at some fault for mony, because they were minded, and appointed to make the last payment unto certain private persons, for the loan-toller which G. had disbursed for the wars; these monies the Treasurers demanded of the Augurs and Bishops to furnish out the said payment; for that during the wars, they only had not been contributers in any levy. The Priests appealed to the Tribunes, and called for their lawful favour: but all was in vain, and so they were forced to satishe all the arrears for the years past, wherein they had paid nothing. This year there died two Bishops, and new were installed in their rooms, M. Meculceianus the Consul entered in place of T. Sempronius Tuditanus, who deceased Praetor in Spain, and L. Fatherus instead of M. Cornelius Gethbati. Q. Fabius Maximus also an Angur died a very young young man before he had born any office of State: but for that year there was not substituted a H ew Augur in his room.

After this, M. Marcellus the Conful held the solemn assembly for the election of Conuls. And Conuls were created L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cat. Then were the Prators chosen, and P. Porcius Leccus. The Ediles of the chair M. Fulvius Nabores, and C. Flaminius divided among the people 100,000 modii of wheat, at two asis a Modius. This flore of corn had the Sicilians brought to Rome for the honour of C. Flaminius and his father. And Flaminius was content that his companion in office should reap a full part of the thanks for this gratuity. The games called Roman were exhibited in most fumptuous manner, and thrice represented all over again. The Ediles of the Commons Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, and C. Sempronius, who also was the high Parist-Priest, and Superintendent, called Carus Maxi called in question many of the City Ballists that gathered their rents for pariares, judicially to answer upon their accounts before the people. Three of them were condemned, and of their silver raised upon their fines, they built the Temple of Fa-mus in the isleland. The Plebeian plaies were renewed for two dates, and a solemn publick feast was celebrated in regard of them.

The same day that L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius entered their office, they proposed unto the Senate concerning the government of the Provinces. And order was given by the I. I. of the Council, that forasmuch as the war increased in Spain, as required not only a Conuliar army, but a Conul also for the Leader: the Conuls should either agree between themselves for the government of the two Provinces, to wit, the hither Spain, and Italy, or else to call lots therefore: K that he whole hap it was to rule Spain, should have with him two legions, five thousand Latinie allies, and five hundred horse; and likewise to have the conduct of a fleet of twenty galleys of war: that the other Conul should levy and enroll two legions; which were thought sufficient to defend and keep France in obedience, considering the courages of the Infrubians and Boirs were well cooled and abated the last year. Case by lot had the charge of Spain, and Valerius of Italy.
Then the Prators call lots for their Provinces, To C. Fabricius Lucanus fell the jurisdiction over the Citizens of Rome, to C. Atinius Libeci over the strangers, C. Manlius Volfus governed Sicily, and Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spain. M. Porcius Leccus was assigned to rule Pife, to the end he might be upon the back of the Ligurians, and P. Manlius was appointed as an auxiliary and coadjutor to the Conul in the higher Spain. As for T. Quintus, his Conulship was renewed for L one year longer, in regard that not only Antiochus and the Attolans, but also Nabia the Lacedemonian Tyrant, were doubted and suspected not to stand fiand found to the Romans: and for him were set out two legions: and if need were of any supply to make up the companies thereof, the Conuls were enjoined to enroll new soldiers, and to lend them over into Macedon. Alto Appius Claudius had a warrant to take up 5000 foot, and two hundred horse, over and above that legion which Q. Fabius had. The like number of fresh horse and foot was appointed for P. Manlius to be sent into the higher Spain: and the same legion was granted unto him, which was command-used by Minatius the Prator. Moreover, P. Porcius Leccus was to have the leading of two hundred lorumur, and fifty horse, drawn out of the Royals army, for to lie in Hinturis about Pife. Laik of all, in Sardinia, P. Sempronius Longus continued still in place of command. Thus the Provinces M being distributed, the Conuls before they departed out of the City, by advice and counsel of the Bishops performed the solemnity of the sacred Spring which was vowed before by the Prator C.
Cornius Mammius, according to the mind of the Senate and the good liking of the people, in the year when Cn. Serenius and Cn. Flaminius were Conuls: and so it was celebrated one and twenty years after it was first vowed. Much about this time was C. Claudius Pulcher, the son of Appius, elected Augur, and invested in that Sacerdotal dignity, in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who died the year before.

When men began now to marvell that there was so little account made of the war began already in Spain, there were letters brought from Q. Minatius with news, that he had fought a fortunate battle before the town of Turbo, with Budares and Befades, two Spanish Generals and great N commanders: that he had slain twelve thousand enemies, taken Budares the General himself pri-itioner: and that the reft were dissolved and put to flight. Upon the reading of these letters, les fear there was of Spain, from whence they looked for great wars.

After the return of the ten Delegates or Commissioners above said, all the care was, and no talk else but about Antiochus and his affairs. Threfe men, after they had declared first how their proceeding went with King Philip, and upon what conditions they had grained peace, informed and gave them to understand, that there was as great a war behind from Antiochus: that he had passed over the seas into Europe with a mighty Armado, and as populous an army for land service, and had not been averted another way by a vain hope to invade and seize upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vaine brut and rumor of Procyon his death, all Greece would have been aston on a flight fire, and up in arms. For the very Attolans themselves, a nation naturally of an unquiet spirit, and incendiaries besides against the Romans, would not have fit still and been in rest. Moreover, there was another malady and mischief as dangerous, jetted as it were within the ribs & in the very celt of Greece: to wit, Nabia, the tyrant at this present of the Lacedemonians only, but shortly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece. who for vairce and cruelty is equal and all the famous and noted tyrants that ever were: and if he be interfered to
The haply behoved caterpillar, judge was inline, great and be the primary and made an edimate and made an edimate, and who made report of all things not by hearsay, but upon their own knowledge, were of advice and resolved to have a good eye and regard with all speed into Antiochus, considering the King was palled already into Syria, whatsoever the occasion was. But as touching the Tyrrant, after they had disputed and debated the matter long time, whether they had sufficient cause already to determine upon some small conclusion, or had had rather unto the will, done and judgment of T. Quinctius the managing of those affairs, therein to proceed, and do according as he should deem it good and expedient for the Common-wealth: in fine, they permitted him to use his own discretion concerning the Macedonian Tyrrant: supposing that the matter was not of such weight and consequence as to concern the main state of the self-publike to materially, whether it were hardened or protruded; but rather it believed them to be advised and consider well, what Amnial and the Carthaginians would do, if ha'pily the war with Amnial be begun and once afoot. They [at Carthage] that faded with the adverse faction of Amnial, had sent divers and sundry letters unto the principal LL. at Rome, every one privately to his friends to this effect, that there palled messengers and letters to Amnial to Antiochus, and that there were Embassadors again that secretly came from the King to him. And like as there be some beatis for wild and savage as never can be tamed, so the courage and spirit of the King was such, as might not possibly be dulced or appeased. For he daily complained that the City languished and grew feeble with idleness, and by sitting still and doing nothing, was overgrown as it were with moss, and unpolish'd it was to raise and stir it up but with sound of corn and weapons. These ad-daemptions carried likelihood of truth and good credit with them, in regard of the late war, so fresh in memory, which had done much, and managed to the last. Oftentimes, he had provoked by a sight of his, many great and mighty personages, who left their houses against him. But the order and degree of Judges: that they had his envoy and foreign authority to the realm in this respect, principally for that the same Judges, were perpetual. The goods, the honour and reputation, yes, and the life of every man lay in their hands, and that displeased one of that bench, war due to have all the rest enemies and to be upon him; and there never wanted one promoter or other to carry tales and give information to these Judges against a man, if they saw them inflicted once and bent against one. During the time of this impetuous and tyrannical rule of theirs, (for as their power was exceeding all measure, so they bare themselves therein as outrageously beyond the limits of civility) it was Amnial's hap to be Praetor: and by virtue of his place he sent for one of the treasurers to come before him: but he made no reckoning of his authority, and resolved to obey: for the said treasurer was one of the contrary side: and because from the degrees of those treasurers they mounted profectly into the highest order of the Judges, therefore he carried with him an haughty mind already, in regard of the high room that he was shortly steep into. Amnial you may be sure took this as a great disgrace and indignity to his person, and therefore he sent a purveyance or warrant, to attach the body of the Treasurer aforesaid: and pretendingly calling the people to a general assembl: he commanded him there to be presented: where he accused and blamed the pey him; not more than the whole order and degree of the Judges: through whole litter pride and exorbitant power, both laws and Magistrates were nothing regarded but trodden under foot. And perceiving that these words of his tickled the itching ears of the people, considering also that their proud demeanor prejudiced the liberty of the nearest persons: immediately he published a law, and got it enacted. That those Judges should be chosen every year and that even therefore one and the same man might not be a Judge two years together. But look how much than he had at the Commons hands for this act. For many he offended many of the great men and principals of the City. Another thing besides he did, whereby he hurted to himself the ill will of some private persons, in rending the common good of the self-publike. The fines and revenues of the State, partly, through negligence went to decay, and partly, were flushed out in dividends between some certain of the head Citizens and Magistrates: and more than that, the money which by way of tribute was to be paid yearly unto the Romans, was too short and not to be found: and it appeared, that a fore ley would be imposed upon private persons thence to make their payments out of their own purses. Amnial after he had call up the books, and made an estimate and just abstract how much the rents and revenues of the City amounted unto as well from customs by sea as land, and to what use they were employed: and perceiving thereby what was devis'd in the ordinary charges of the State, and what went a wrong way, and was cavilled at by these thieves to their own selves, he pronounced aloud in open audience of the whole assembly. That the arrears should be gathered up and brought into the common Chett: and to private persons might be discharged and called of their impositions of tribute, and the Common-wealth would be rich enough and able to perform and furnish the monies due to the people of Rome. And as he thus said, so he was as good as his word: and executed it accordingly. Then there carousers, who for certain years lived by robbery of the common treasures and laden upon the limits of the City, faced (nightly) against Amnial, as if he had done them them great wrong in taking their own goods from them, and not proceeded in justice to red out of their hands their fntain substances: am great malice and bitterness ceaFd not to provoke against Ambulce the Romans, who were ready enough of themselves to pick some quarrel to him, to seek occasion of hatred, and to find an hole in his coat. Septo Africanus for a long time gave the deafe upon them, and disliked the course: for he supposed it was not for the honour and majefty of the people of Rome to subcribe unto those expectations charged upon Ambulce, to entertain the fright and hatred of men; and to interest and inflame publice authority within the pri-tal factions of the Carthaginians; and not to be content to have vanquished Ambulce in war, unless they also took upon them the permons of accurers, and preferred a flanderous libel & bill of indictment, and swore thereto Billia vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senate there might charge Ambulce categor-ically, with plotting and practing with Antiochus for to wage war against them. And these three were addressed to this Embathe, C. Sercellus, M. Claudius Marsullius, and Q. Terentius Cade, who being arrived there, caufed it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their coming, and all by induction from the adversaries of Ambulce, that their errand was to compose and end the debates between Massinissa, King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleved for truth. But Ambulce found them fright and smite this juftling, and was not ignorant that he was only a man that the Romans shot at, and howsoever peace was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endless and inexpiable war with him alone with him. Whereupon he resolved to frame himself to give place to the time, and yield unto fortune, and being furnished achofand with all things requisite to take his flight, when he had of K purpose all the day long threwd himself in the public place of assembly very formally, to turn by all intimation of his intended resolution, so soon as it began to be dark night, in his Citizens gown as he went a day, and attended in the Hall, he gave him forth forth to the City gate, accompanied only with two persons, and these not privy at all to his purpose and device. And having found his horses ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode apace that night until he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Voca: and by the next morning, he passe between Acri: and Thapsus, and recovered a tower or fort of his own; where he was imbarred in a ship ready riged and appointed with full and ou to take sea and way. Thus departed Ambulce out of Affricke, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kindred. And the same day he fell with the island Cernea: where the Carthaginians found in the roce certain hulks charged with mercantile: and when at his coming a shore out of his ship, there came many running toward him for to salute and welcome him thiler, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer, that he went upon an Embaffege to Tyrs: but fearing left any of their ships should discharger that night, and make report at Thapsus or Acri: that he was seen in Cernea: he caufed a beall to be killed for such; and invited the Masters of the ships and all the Merchants to supper; and there with commanded all the foes and cross-sail yards to be had out of the veils to make thereof a large pavilion, that they might fit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midsummer. And as the time and such provision as they had, would give leaves, he fet out on a feast and banket: he farred for no wine, and continued the merriment far within night. Then M Ambulce, so soon as he could elupe his time for to deceive those that were in the harbor, weighed anchor. The rest were sail abroad: and when the next day they awoke and roused themselves, with their drunken and drowsy souls (and far forth day it was, and late ere they awoke) they were fain to spend some hours in fitting their oars again in their right places, and the tacking of the ships in good order.

In this while, at Carthage the ordinary multitude that used to frequent the house of Ambulce repaired as their manner was to his gate-honie: and when it was voted abroad, that he was not to be found, all the company gathered together in the market place, seeking and enquiring for the principal and chief personage of their City. Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled: ot-ther said plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the filthhood and villany of the N Romans: and this they stuck not to avouch. There might a man have seen rudy and divers ourences (as it was commonly in Cities where there is hiding and parts-taking) as each one is affected to his own priity and faction. At last, news came that he was slain at Cernea. The Roman Embassadors having upon audience given, declared in the Senate of Carthage, that the LL. of their Senate had certain intelligence, that both aforetime King Philip was by Ambulce especially polllicited and set on to make war with the people of Rome: and also now there hath been letters and messengers with credence from him to King Antiochus: and that he would never rest until he had set all the world together in arms: and therefore if the Carthaginians were desirous to content and satisfy the Romans, they should not suffer these parts of his to escape unpunished: then the Carthaginians made answer, and said, That nothing of all this passed by publice council or consent or allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to do whatsoever the Romans thought to be reason.

Ambulce this while had a boen voyage, and with a merry gale of wind arrived at Tyrs: where he was received of the Tyrians, the first founders of Carthage, as if he had been in another country of his own; received he was, I say, and entertained with all kind of honour; becomine a man lo famous and renowned. After he had journeied there some few daies, he failed to Antioch where understanding that the King himself was already departed from thence, he repaired to his son, and conferred with him, as he was letting out an yearly solemnity of games and pageantry near Dyropolis, and being courteously also by him intreated, he made no stay, but to ship-board and Sea again. And at Ephesus overtook the King, whom he found floating and wavering still in his mind, and unprepared what to do as touching the Roman war. But this coming of Annibals, was no small point to turn the balance, and to move him to enter into the enterprise thereto. The Actolians likewise at the same time were enraged and alienated in affection from the Roman league and society, whose Embassadors demanding to have Plancium and Bocca again, with other Cities, according to the tenor and form of the first league, the Senate turned over and referred to Quinctius.

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the four and thirtieth Book.

H. Law Oppia p. ... and by force of arms (beginning first to war in Empire) brought the cities province Spain on this side thence to quittance. T. Quinctius Flaminius led against the Lacedemonians and Nabs their tyrants, in which he was fortunately, and so proceeded, as he made out thereof, granted them place to his own good liking and pleasure, delivered Argos, and set it free, which was before subject to the tyrant. The Senate then, and never before, bethought on their games and amusements for the people, apart from the rest of the people. Which to bring about Secillus Pactus and L. Coruncius Cæcrops set in four and thirty days of the year, to the general content and satisfaction of the Commons. More colonies were planted with Roman ensign. M. Pollius Cato crowned over Spain. The wars also of which fortunately were achieved at country, the Bois and the other Infidels are here recorded. T. Quinctius Flaminius, who had vanquished Philip King of the Macedonians and Nabiss tyrants of the Lacedemonians sea, and freed all Grec from their oppression, for these many and noble exploits, rode in triumph three days together. The Carthaginian Embassadors brought word, that Annibal who was invited into Antiochus, banded with him and combined to make war, Annibal had besides advised by means of one Ariosto Tyrannus (sent as a courier with credence only and no letters, to Carthage) for to move and follow the Carthaginians to rebellion.

Between the troublesome cares of great wars which either were not fully ended, or at hand ready to begin, there happened an occurrence, which in itself being but a small matter to speak of, and of little regard; considering the fides and part-taking about it, grew to a mighty head and contention in the City. M. Fundaminius and L. Valerius Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a bill into the people touching the abrogation of the Law Oppia. For C. Oppius, after time, when the Punic war was at the hottest, and whiles S. Fabius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, had pronounced a statute, by virtue whereof, no woman of what degree soever might either have in ornaments and jewells aboveth an ounce weight of gold, nor wear any habiliments wrought of undyed colours, nor yet ride in Coaches within the City of Rome, or any other Town nor more than half a mile from then. Unless it were upon occasion of some sollemn feast or publick festival. Now V. J. Junius Brutus, and P. Junius Brutus, both Tribunes likewise of the Commons, stood in defence and maintenance of the said law Oppia, and affirmed plainly they would not suffer it to be abridged. Many a nobleman was seen in this quarrel: some spoke for the law and others gain aid it. The Capitol was full of people, either taking part and favouring the cause, or else opposing them. And urging the contrary. The very dames of the City themselves could neither by persuasion and advice, nor by any reverent and womanly regard, nor yet by the express and absolute commandment of their husbands be kept withines doors; but do what they could they helped all the streets of the City, befecked and kept all the waies into the common place, before and entering their husband; as they passed by and went down thither to permit and give their consent, that feeling the good effect of the Common-weal now flourishing, and the private wealth of every man increased daily, their wives also and matrons might be allowed to have their ancient ornaments and gay attire again. The number of these women grew every day more then other for now they flocked also out of the Towns, Villages and other places of resort in the country and flewed themselves at Rome. In so much as they took heart at length, and were fobold as to encounter the Consuls, the Pretors, and other Magistrates, requesting and beleeching their favour, to stand with them, and forward the cause. But as for one of the Consuls, Marcus Porcius Cato by name, they could not with all their prayers entreat him to encline unto their suit: who in the maintenance of the said law, and that it might not be revoked, made in the frequent assembly of the people to this effect, "My Masters and citizens of Rome, If every one of us had fully resolved and purposed with himself to hold his own, and keep the rightful authority and preeminence that he hath over his own wife, less ado and trouble we should have had with them all together at this day. Now having given them the head at home so much, that the curfiness and thwartness of women hath conquored our liberty and freehold there; behold, here also in publick place it is troden down and trampled underfoot: and because we were not able every man to rule his own in several, now we stand in fear and dread them all in general. Certainly, I my self thought ever until now, that it was but a fein'd fable and devised tale that went of a certain "land, wherein by a conspiracy of women, all the men were murdered every one, and that it utterly made way and rooted out. But well I see now, but they creatures never so weak, so fally and lesele, let them once have their meetings, their conveiencies and secret confequences, they will work mischief in the highest degree, and be as dangerous as any other. And surely for mine own part, I cannot resolve in mine own confequence and determine whether of the twain be worse: the thing I mean in itself, or the precedent example and confequences thereof, considering the manner how it is handled. Of which two, the one toucheth us that are Consuls and the reft of the magistrates the other concerneth you rather my masters and citizens of Rome. As for the matter in question, and propased unto you, whether it be good and expedient for the weal-publick or no, that refleth in you to determine and judge, who are to give your voices and suffrages. But this feditious insurrection here, of women be it of themselves, or procured by your motion and infligation, M. Fundamin & L. Valerius, no doubt it argeth and implith a great defect in the Magistrates, and I wot not whether it will be a fouler blot and dishonour to you that are Tribunes, than to us Consuls. Yours will the blame be if ye have brought women now to ruffle and stir up tributious seditions: and ours the blame if we needs must admit and accept of laws whether we will or no. For fear of com partion and separation of our women, as sometimes we were forced to do by the departure and insurrection of our Commons, I assure you for mine own self. when I passed ere whilst in to this common-place through the pref and thorofe of these women, I was abashed & could not chafe but blush, And had I not been more refractive of the reputation, the honour and reverence of some in particular than of them all together, because it should not be thought & said, that they had been checked and taken up by the Consuls: I would have faid unto them, What new fashion is this good wives to run gadding abroad into the open streets, to beftir the paffages, and to afffront, yea, and hang upon other women husbands as ye do? What? could ye not every one at home have dealt with your own good-men in the caufe, and travailed their help? or can ye speak fair and better utter, can ye be more pleasant and affable abroad in the Town, than within your houses? or make love to other men, rather than to your owne husbands? And yet to speak rightly, if wives were of that modesty and womanly carriage, as to keep themselves within the compass and bounds of their owne liberty, and pass no farther: it were not befitting you I wot, so much as at home to trouble your selves about our laws here, nor to bury your brains, to know either what new Statutes passed, or what old were called. Our ancestors in old time would not, that women in any wise should dispose so much as of their owne private matters without the advice and direction of a Goove nor Overleeer: and therefore in great widome they ordained, that they should be ordered and ruled by their parents, by their brethren by their husbands. But we (and God will) can abide them to intermeddle in state matters, to govern the weal-publick, to converse with us in the common place, in publicke assemblies and courts of parliament. For what else do they now in the streets, in the coxes waies & at all avances, but some of them give their voyces that the bills of the Tribunes may pass and others advice and be of opinion, that the law Oppia may be repealed: Let this outrageous & unreasonable nature of theirs have the head; let those unruly creatures and untamed animals have their will and bridle them not. Then how of themselves they will keep a mean andmeasure in their licentiousnes, unles ye curb them & hold them in, Tuttis, this is the least matter of all that displeaseth their women there are a 1000 things besides that they think hardly of, and are discontented to be held unto by old customes and positive laws, Liberty in all thingmys to speake more truly, a loose and disloate licentiousnes, is the very thing they long after and desire. For go they away cleeer with this once, what is it that they will not attemp and give the ventour for? Do but run through and count the laws provided in this behalf for women, whereby our fore-fathers and predecessors have kept down and remaid their disorderly appetites, and with which they have fought to subject them to their husbands: yet, hardly can ye with the help of them all, keep them in awe and tied fast, but break out they will and have their owne waies. What then? how and if ye suffer them to catch this and that, and tother thing to it? if I lay, ye let them wret from you one thing after another, until at length they be check-mates with their husbands, think ye that ever shall be able to support and endure them? Begin they once to be equals they will soon be superior and make them your fellows, and strait-ways they will be your masters. But alas, we lay too hardly to their charge. The thing that they stand upon is no more but this: That no new Act & statute pases against them for no equal and reasonable thing do they refuse: their desire and prayer is only that.
that they might not be wronged. No, no, it is clean contrary. That law which ye have received and admitted, that which by your suffrages you first granted, that which by the practice exercis'd so many years you have allowed and approved; they would have you to revoke and abolish: which is as much to say, as by annulling that one, to bring all, and diminishing the authority and virtue of the rest. No law is there so well devised, that is good and commodious and agreeable unto all. This only is intended principally to be considered, that it may be profitable to the molt part, and serve in general. For it as each person shall find an act prejudicial, hurtful, and offensive to himself, he may be allowed by and by to undo and demolish the fame to what end should all the people assembly together to the making of those statutes, which they anon against whom they were enacted may abolish & overthrow? But glad would I know the great occasion and cause for which our dames in such trouble and uprore run out into the streets, and have much ado to forbear the common place and to mount up into the Refect to make an occasion to this audience? Is it for this to redeem out of the hands of Abuses, their fathers, their husbands, their children and brethren, whom be keepeth prisoners? Nay, that calamity is far enough off at this day, and far may it ever be I pray God from our City and Common-weal. And yet when the time was of that hard fortune and calamity, you would not hearken to their piece, and kind prayers in that behalf. But it may well be that it is neither natural love and kind affection nor careen regard of their dear friends but mere touch of confidence and sense of religion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation, And ready they are, it may be, to receive and entertain dame Cibele or Iduna, coming from Pergamus out of Phrygia. What honest colour and show so much as in word only can be pretended to bear out and cover this mutinous sedition of women? Many this (say they) that we may glitter in our golden jewels, and thine in purp-to be seen a far off: that as well on world-days as holy-days, we may be let up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the City, as it were in triumph, for the conquist and victory of a law by us repealed and disanulled: for winning from you, and wringing out of your hands, mangles your beards, the liberty of your voices and suffrages: to the end that we might not be timed and gaged in our excelle expenses, in our diffolute profation, in costly vices and superfluities. Many a time ye have heard me complain of the wafiful and lumpsirous bravery of women: and as often have ye known me to inveigh against the lavish spending of men, not private persons only but magistrates also in higher place: and how this City of ours is fick as it were at one time of two contrary discontents and maladies, to wit pinchining atvarice, and imperious prodigality, two plagues I say, that have been the bane and overthrow of all great Monarchies and flourishing empires. These pestilent mischiefs I dread to much the more, as our Greece and common-weal encroacheth to the better: growth wealthy every day more than other; and as our dominion extended still farther and farther. And now that we are come over unto Greece and Asia provinces full of all enticing pleasures and alluring delights of the world, nor that we are come to finger and handle the rich treasures of mighty Monarchies. I fear me that even these things have rather captivated us than we them. The goodly images, statues and pictures that came from Scythe fortress (trust me truly) dangerous to this City, and threaten no les than to many enigmas of the field displayed against it. And I hear say already. that there are many, and too many of the city, that prattle and have in admiration the beautiful ornaments of Carthage & Athens, and begin to make a form and game of the images of the Roman Gods made of potteries earthly only, laughing much at them where they leave them standing forth of the walls. Well, for my part I had rather have these gods so propice and favorable to us as they be than such as theore: and for I hope they will ever be so, if we can suffer still in their usual trines and places accustomed. No longer ago than in our fathers days, King Persius sent his Embassador Cynes of purposes, and allay'd by rich and goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but also of our women. There was no law Oppi as then in force to bridge and keep down the costly pomp and bravely of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands. And what think ye was the cause? even the same and no other, for which our ancestors in times past, never forsook their trunes and remedies: even feast and desires and enormous lots had need to bud forth spring before the laws, which should repress and cut them down. What caused the law Licinia to be made, concerning 500 acres of ground, forbidding that no man should posses above, but the exceeding courtesies of men, teaching till and laying land to land? What brought in the law Cistus, of touching gifts and presents but this that the Commons began already to be visaul as it were and tributarries to the Senat. No marvel therefore it is, nor strange it may be seen, that neither the law Oppi nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeasurable expences of women, was required and thought needful in those dates: when gold, when purple freely terrified and offered unto them was refused. If now at this day Cynes was come, and went with rich gifts round about in the City, he should find receivers enough of women standing in every street ready for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I cannot devise what the cane and reason should be of many lustful desires and appetites that reign in this age. For say that if one of you were kept short and debauched of that which another might lawfully have: for adventure there might rise in your hearts (through infirmity) some flame and abatement in nature, or else difference, pleasure and discontentment in reason: so being all as ye are brought within one compass of furn-.

"nature and apparel, and no ods at all between you, what need any one of you to fear, left the H e should be looked into, marked or observed, more than another, I mutt needs say, the fame that followeth, and attendeth upon their negligence or poverty, is woful of all others: but the law quit-eth and freeth you of both, when you want but that only which by law ye may not have, and no man shall reproach you therefore, Yes, man, sooth some rich and weighty, this same ease and quality of differention at all among you, of all things I can not abide: why may it not accordingly and therewith he been raised in purpose, and adorned with gold? And why is not the poor estate of others known, but lieth hidden under this pretext of cloak of a law, so as they may be thought yet, (were it not for the law) that much and such things they would have where as indeed they are not able to maintain and bear it out? Would ye (in faith) my matters and citizens of Rome, have your wives to strive thus, that the richer must desire to have that, which no other I can reach unto: and the poor again, because by that means they would not be defiled, over-shrinethem to go above their calling and ability? Certainly I dare avow, if they begin once to shame at that which is not shame-worthy, they will not abash any thing, be it never so shameful. Have it the will out of her own, so long as it is tallow and when all is gone to her husbands purtle she will go, Alas poor man and woman begins is that husband as well he that is increated by his wife, to stretch his purpose, as he that is not, when he shall see another man to give her that, which he would not allow himself. And even now ye see how openly in the street (un-shame-faced as they be) they are in hand with other women husbands yeas, & that which more is, they keep an interesting for to call the law & for the favour of their voices only, For of some they have got the good wills no doubt already, whilst themselves will not be intreated, but draw K miserly upon them, whereby they are, and upon their children, We let the law once cease to let down a gage and proportion of thy wives expenses, and never think to have remedy, and to lay the same of thy self with all that can do, be not deceived, firs, to think that the world will be ever again at the same pass, as it was before this, law took pace. And as it is a bitter conic and leste dangerous to let a naughty and obstinate person alone, that he not called into question at all; than after he is once accustomed to utter him to be quit, and go away unpunished; even fo this excessive impiety would have been the more intolerable, if it had not been medled & tempered with, althan it will be now upon the very binding and tiding thereof, much like a wild and savage beast let loose after it, hath been tven up a bore and to made more fell and angry. To conclude thereof this opinion am I, that no hand of law Oppo be repealed so & I pray all the L Gods to vouchsafe for to bless, and turn to good whatever do or go about. When he had thus said, those Tribunes also of the Common, who openly promised and protected to oppose themselves, and to cross the revolting of this law, and spake as followeth. If private men had kept death and advanced forward either to approve and perivide, or to reject & disallow that which u- was proposed I may tell all without opening my mouth would have attended your will & expected the delivery of your satisfaction, as thinking it had been sufficiently debated and discussed already whatsoever might be said for both parties, But now fith that the Conful M. Purcus Lass, a man of great reputation & gravity not only by his counselle and authority (which alone without any word at all spoken hath been important enough & effectual,) but also in a long premeditated Oration framed with much study and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed against our proposed ordinance, I must of necessity answer him again as bitely as I can. Which over and besides hath spent more words in reproving and challenging ther & names of the City, that he hath belaboured reason to the purpose in disallowing our new law & all cly of this intent that he might leave it doubtful whether the women had done that which he blamed them for, as induced by their own motives or seduced by us and by our suspicions. As for me, the protection specially of the case I will take in hand, and not bufy and trouble my head in defence of our provisions, against whom the Conful hath rather glanced and girded at by way of big words then charged indeed by sublound refon It hath plente them to all this, in an assembly and mutinous meeting, yeas and otherwises he ter-meth it. An insurrection and celeration of women because the wives in open place intreated you nto repeal that law, now in time of peace, in the furnishing and belief of the Common well; which during those troubles, the dates of war, had been enstated against the wives, I was full well that both these words and other besides are very significant thought our and words for the purpose, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all knew that. Lass is in an Orator not only grave and earnest, but otherwises also fell, string and bitter how ever other wise by natural disposition he be of a mild spirit and courteous enough. But to the point. What new & strange thing is this that our wives have done coming abroad and assembling themselves in companies, ought a matter that so much concerneth and importeth themselves? What were they neces sary for now abroad in open streets? I will take the point. Of a return over your own O book of Originals against your self. Listen and mark, how often they have done the impleible, and always truly for the common good and benefit of the State. And first and foremost, in the very beginning and infancy of this City, even in the reign of K. Romulus, when the Capitol was taken and held by the Sabines, when in the midst of the Common pace they were ranged in battle array and ready to fight a bloody field, was not the quarrel ended and the conflict stayed by names and wives that ran in & put themselves between the two armies? After the KK, were driven driven out and expelled. What hapned then? When the legions of the Volsciians under the conduct of C. Marius, incamped within 5 miles of Rome, were they not the matrons of the City that turned back this army, which doubtless would have forced our City & put it to ranck? And is not this likewise true, that when the Gauls were posed of Rome and matters thereof, the dames of the City and none but they, even by the consent of all men, came forth into the open streets, made a contribution, and laid down that gold which paid for the ranck and redemption of the City? No longer than in the last Punic war (because I will not stand to much upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not only when the City was at a fault for money, the widows supplied the want of the common treausre; but also at what time as we were driven to seek for new Gods, and to fend for them afar off to succour us in our extremities: all the wives & matrons of the City went to the Sea side forte to receive the goddes Mother Idea.
The occasiones (yes. yes.) are different, and the case is not alike. Neither is it any purpose or any part of my meaning, to compare causes, and to prove they are all one. This I fland upon, and fale it sufficient to strike and clear the women for bringing up no strange novelty, in that they shewed themselves in open place. To proceed therefore: seeing that no man made any wonder then, of that which women did in undertaking the affairs that concerned all alike as well men as women: marvail we now that they do the lemmable, in a cause that properly and peculiarly pertained to themselves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith we are too coy and queamish of our hearing, and our ears over nice and delicate, if when matter disdains not to hear the prayers of their servants and slaves, we ftrive to give ear to the requits of ladies and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in question, in regard whereas the Coniel his Oration compiled in two points. For first, he took it for ill that any law at all once enabled should be revoked: and secondly, he stood upon this that above all others the law devised and made for reprefenting the superfuous ornamentes and attire of women should remain in force for ever. So it should seem, that the first part (a common defense) if it were, of all the laws) was a speech befitting the place and person of a Coniel: but the other against the exceeding pomp of women, more properly became a man (as himself) of most severe life and precise carriage. And therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, lest we should lead you into some errors, if we lay not down and shew plainly the vanity and defect both in the one and in the other. For as I contes, that of those laws which are devised and established not for a time and by occasion of some particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a City, none ought to be abolished: unless it be so that by use and experience the same be shewed not to be needful, or by some change of the State become needles and superfuous: to see evidently that those furritus and ordinances which are imposed to be kept and observe, are mortal (if I may to say) and mutable with the tides. And oftentimes we fee that war disclaimeth those laws which peace proclaimeth; and peace pulleth down that which was set up: like as in the government and rule of a ship, one thing is requist in fair weather and calm Seamanother in storm and troublesome tempests. These things thus being in nature divers and divers, let us consider I pray you, of whether fort this law that now we are in hand to revoke, What is it one of the ancient and royal laws made by the Kings and equal in time with the foundation of our City? or (that which is the next in time and authority) was it set down and written in the twelve Tables by the Decemvirs, created of purpose to devise and make laws? Is it of that nature without which as our ancestors were of opinion, that the honesty and honour of manners could not be preferred: so we are to fear likewise left by the repealing thereof, we overthrow the mode-ity, chastity, and integrity of married women? Why who kneweth not that this is a new law of 20 years standing and continuance and no more, made whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius were Coniel? And seeing that without that lives lived so many years before in good name and fame, and in passing good order: tell me what danger can ensue, and why we need to fear it if be annulled, they should break out to all loosefons and disorder. Mary! if this law had been made at first, to gage the wantonnes of women, believe me then it were greatly to be doubted, that the putting down thereof would stir them up again to their former outrage. But to what end it was devised, the time it fell is able to shew and telisfie. Annul'd being in re,c., had won a vi-tory at Canna; he was now master of Tarreton, Lord of Arpi, and possesed of Capua; every hour in looked when he would march forward and advance his enions against Rome: our allilies were revoluted and gone: soldiers we had no more of our own to supply and make up the decayt bands: no mariners and Sea liftitors we could find for the maintenance of our Arm-ado: all our treasure in the City Chamber was spent and consumed. Driven we were to this exigence as to take up bondslaves for to serve in wars, and to buy them of their matrons for day, yea, and to make payment of their price after the war was ended. For want of money also the Purbutans and Farmers of our domain and publick profits, undertook to serve the army with our own proper and private charges; and a rate and proportion was set down according to our revenues and worth in the fabley book, what number every one should be charged with.
All the gold and silver that we had in private we brought forth in common, and the Senators themselves led the way first, and gave good example. The widows and orphans children brought in their hocks of money to the City Chamber. Straight order was given, that

we should not have in our houses either of gold or silver, wrought in plate or otherwise above that much, nor of silver and brass in coin and current money beyond a certain proportion limited. At such a time, our dames (belike) were set upon their bravery, pruning, trimming, and sticking themselves, in such sort, as the law Oppia must needs be devised, there was no other remedy to keep down their excessive pride and superfluous expense in their attire and ornaments: even then, I say, when by occasion that the solemn feast and sacrifice of Ceres was discontinuited, by reason of the general mourning and heavy cheer of all the wives of the City, the Senate was fain to take order, that they should finish and end their sorrowful mourning within thirty days. Who is so blind that feeth not, how in regard only of the poverty and extremity of calamity, and because all the monies of private persons should be converted into a common stock, and for a publick use, this law was last framed, drawn, and set down, so long only to stand in strength and vertue, as the cause of penning and writing it should endure and continue? For otherwise, if such acts and decrees of the Senate, if such orders and ordinances of the Commons, respective unto that present time, should be in force, and observed forever: Why make we payment of the loan money unto private men? Why do we fet and to form let our commodities, our customs and revenues of the City unto farmers for ready rent? Why put we forth our publick works for present money paid down upon the nail? Wherefore buy we not slaves to serve in our wars? Lastly, why we not put to find mariners and oarsmen, at our own proper charges, as then we did? All other elites and degrees, all men else, of what calling forever, feel a great change in the lare of the City, from who we to weal, from adversity to prosperity; and shall we everills the good thereof, and not once salt nor enjoy the fruits of peace, and publick repose and tranquility? Shall we that are men be in purple and scarlet? shall we wear our embroidered gowns and robes when we are Magistrates? shall we put on our rich amercs and copes, when we exercise the function and ministrations of the high Priests? shall our children go in their idle garments, purled aore with purple? shall we permit and privilege the head Officers and Magistrates in our Colonies and Borough Towns? Nay, shall we suffer here at Rome the Masters and Constables of every parish, the mayor and bafett officers of all other to wear embroidered gowns, fludded with purple; and not only so, forsoe grace and credit themselves, with these goodly ornaments and badges of worship and honour during their life, but also after their death, the fame to be burned and buried with them? And shall we debar and forbind our women only to use purple and scarlet in their apparel? And when you the husband may have purple and scarlet, carpets, curtains, points, and foot-cloths, what reason is there to deny your wife, the mistress of the house, a gown or mantle of the fame? And shall your horse be trapped and barbed more richly, and better set out with his caparison than your wife arrayed in her apparel? But in truth, for purple and scarlet, which is the worst for the wearing, and wasteth bare, means I see some reason, such as it is (although it be very hard) of sparing and restraints: purple for gold wherein little or nothing is lost, but the fashion and workmanship, which signifies, what miterly is this to make spare of it, and to deny it them? Nay, I dare assert and abide by it, there is great benefit and use thereof in time of extremity; and it may help at a pinch both in publick affairs, and in private occasions, as ye have found by good experience: But Catara said moreover, There would be no emulation and envy between this good wife and that; neither one nor other were allowed that liberty of apparel and ornaments. True it is, but indeed there of they all are mightily discontented and grieved at the heart in the mean while, disdaining to see the wives of their allies of the Latine name and Nation, permitted to wear those ornaments which they are forbidden to have, to see them, I say, all gorgeously let out with spangles and jewels of gold, clad in their purple and scarlet clothes riding in their coaches all over their cities, whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were feasted in their Towns, and not in this their own City of Rome. This indignity were enough to wound the hearts of men, and make them blee: what hurt doth it then, think you, to silly women, whose small matters, God wot, are wont to trouble? As poor souls: no magistracy and place of government in State, no facetious dignities in the Church, no triumphs no ornaments and titles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no spoils and prizes gotten in war, can fall to their shares. Neatness and fineness, gay garments trim attire and gorgeous habiliments, are the honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they set their hearts, on it they make their joy, and therefore well have our ancestors called all furniture for the decking of women Mundus Malichris. What lay they off in time of sorrow and mourning, but their gold and purple? what put they on and resume again when their mourning is past, but their gold and purple? what hang they on them besides in time of publick joy and solemn processions but their better apparel their richest attire & most costly ornaments? But peradventure ye have once repealed the law Oppia. it will not be in your power to over-rule them, if haply you should forbid them to wear any thing that now the law restrained them of. And perhaps some shall have more ado with their daughters, their wives, and sisters, and find them less tasteful and pliable unto their minds than now they are. Never fear that: women cannot shake off their obedience, so long as their Governors (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other things they abhor and cannot brook to bear their own liberty, when it cometh by the death either of husband or parents: Widows and Orphans lie; they may not abide. Be sure therefore, they had rather have their ornaments and attire to be at the disposition of your felves, than of the law. And therefore, to speak a truth, you must in equity and reason protect and defend them in kindness, and not oppress them with hardnes and bondagae: delight ye must to call their fathers and husbands, rather than their Lords and Maiters. It pleased the Consil tothwise to give them hard words and odious terms, calling this their meeting, A mutiny of women, and a very inmotion and departure of theirs: and danger there is no doubt, left being upone they will seize upon the mount Sacer, as sometimes the Commons did in their furious anger or else poffefs themselves of the Aventine, and there encamp and keep an hold. Well, this weak and veedle sex, born to bear, mutt suffer and endure whatsoever ye shall ordain and let them against them, But take this withall at the looe for a final conclusion that the greater power and authority ye have over them, the more discretion and moderation ye ought to use in that concernag ye of yours. After debate of words passed in this wise, in favor and discretion of the law, the day following the women flocked in greater multitudes into the open streets, and banding themselves together, as it were, in one troop, they beat the doors and houses of the Exar, who by inspecting themselves, had binded and crofled the bill preferred by their fellow Tribuns: and never gave they The law Oopia over to keep this fur, until those Tribuns flaked in their opposition for to inhibit the fame. While it regaled, done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and abolith that law. Thus twenty years after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and annulled.

M. Porcius Catn after the abrogation of the law Oopia, presently departed with a fleet of five and twenty Gallies, whereof five were lent out by Allies, and arrived in the Port of Land, to which place he commanded his forces to assemble: and after by venue of an edifices also along C the sea-coast, he had gathered together vessels of all sorts as he pleased from. Lust and promised that they should all follow after him to the Port of Pyreneus, from whence he proposid to lefe forth against the enemy, with an Armado of many Gll, and well appointed. Who having an passed beyond the mountains of Longania, and the Gulf of Gulf, arrived and met all together at a place and appointed. From thence they came against Rhoda, where they extrud the spanish garrifon that held the forrefts. From Rhoda with a good gate of wind. They landed to Emporia, Where, all the whole army, excepting the mariners, were let a land. At the land that appro were two Towns, separate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by Greeks, who came from Phocca, from whence the Malliains also are descended: the others poisfoled be Spaniards. But the Greeks Town leith out into the Sea, to as the whole, compare the wall is not half a mile about: but the Spanish Town leathed farther into the Land, and divided from the Sea, is defended with a wall three miles in circuit. A third sort of it inhabited were joymed unto them by Cesar for the Emperor of famous memory, after he had receivd Pompey's children. And at this day they are confudled and mingled one with another, and become one entire body, by reason that first the Spaniards, and afterward the Greeks went in, as the recogni-nizes of the City of Rome. A man might well marvail seeing open the sea, and all side to the main Sea, how exposed they are on the other side to the danger of the Spanish, a nation so fierce and warlike, what thing it was to guard and proteced them: Discipline it was, en-erected government, and nothing else which maintained and preserved them in that weaknes: it establishment: discipline I say, which is ever bell intertained of them, who live in tenter of the migrans: and one round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is paffing strong and exceeding well fortifed, having but one gate in all that side: which ordinarily is allways warded by one of the Magistrats, in the night one third part usually of the citizen kept watch upon the walls. And this watch they maintained not for outome and fashion nor by vesture of any law, but they performed it with as great care, yes, and went the round and law to the sentinels with as much diliga-cence, as the enemies were hard at gages. A Spaniard came not within the City's neither went they forth themselves, unleaff it were upon just occasion. But on the Sea side the lane was open for any man at his pleasure, by that gate which turneth toward the Spanish Town they never used to go forth but in great number even a third part weener of the Townsmen, and those who the night before had watched upon the walls. And this cause induced them to go abroad, for that the Spaniards being no men at Sea gladly would traffick and trade with them: willingly buying of them their orange merchandize from forces parts brought in by ships: and venturing upon them again their Land commodities and fruits arising of the main. The desire of this mutual commerce and necesary intercourse was the cause, that the Spanish Town was open to the Greeks. And in greater tidest and securit they were also, by reason that they were shadowed under the wing of the Roman armie, which they intertained with as great loyalty as the Malliains although they were nothing to mighty and prudent. And even at this time they received the Consil and his army with great concienc and liberalitie. Catn sojourned there some few days whiles he was adverst by hicide where his enemies abode, and what their forces were: and because he would not be idle whiles he tayed there, he bestowed all that time in training and exercising his soldiees. It happned to be that season of the year, when the Spaniards had their corn within their granges ready for the threshing floor, whereupon he forbid the cornvivors to provide grain, and sent them home to Rome. Way, which he shall feed and maintain it fell. Being departed from Emporia he walked and burnt the territory of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he came, and put them in exceeding fright.

At the same time, as M. Helius departed out of the farther Province of Spul, with great garrison soldiars delivered unto him by the Pretor, he was encounterd by a great army of the

Celtiberians, before the Town Iliturgum, Valerint writeth, that they were 20000 strong: that if 12000 of them were slain, the Town Iliturgum won again: and all above 14 years of age put to the sword. From thence Helvius marched to the camp of Caesar: and because the country was clear from enemies, he sent back the garrison into the nearer Spain, and took his journey to Rome, where he entered the City Octavia in petty triumph, for the happy success achieved in his affairs. He brought into the treasury, of silver in bullion or ingots, 14732 pounds weight: of silver coin 17923 bigate peces: and of Orcean silver 120338 pound weight. The cause why the Senate denied him full triumph, was this, that he waited under the conduct and name of another, and not in his own province, but it was two years before he returned, by reason that the year between he was played there, lying sick of a long and grievous diseasę, and put over his government to Qu. Minucius his successor. Whereupon Helvius likewise entered the City of Rome in that manner of triumph, two months only before his successor Q. Minucius triumphed. He likewise brought into the Chamber of the City 34800 pound weight of silver in mals: of bigats in coin 78000: of Orcean silver 278000 pound.

All this while the Consul lay encamped in Spain not far from Emporia. Thither repaired unto him from Borsigates a Prince of the Ilergetes, three Embassadors, whereof his son was one: complaining that their forts were assailed by force of arms, and they had no other hope to make resistance, unless they might have a guard of Roman soldiers to defend them, 5000 fay they will be sufficient: for never would the enemies abide by it if it were a power came against them. The Consul answered them and said, that he had a feeling and compassion of the peril or fear (whether it was) wherein they stood: howbeit, he was not at that time furnished with such forces, that he K might lately spare so many out of his main army, whereby to dismember the same and to enwrap his forces, considering a mighty host of his enemies was not far off, with whom he looked every day, and he knew not how soon, to join battail in open field with banners displayed. The Embassadors hearing this, fell down prostrate at the Consul's feet, and shed tears, humbly beseeching him not to forsake them in this picturesque. "For whether (say they) shall we go if we be repulsed from the Romans? No allies we have besides, nor other hope in all the world. This danger we might have avoided were it well we would have been taken and difloyal; if we would have bandied and rebelled with other Spaniards: but no menaces, nor terror preferred unto us, could drive us to renounce our fealty, hoping always that we should have help and succour enough from the Romans: but now it no help, if no relief come from thence: if we be denied at the L Consul hard: heaven and earth call to witness, that we must be forced full against our wills, and upon mere necessity, to revolt from the Romans, for fear we drink of the same cup that the Saguntins have done afore us: and choose we will to die with the rest of the Spaniards for company, rather than perish alone by our les. So for that day they were dismissed without another answer. But all the next following, the Consul was much distracted in mind, and careful in both respects. Unwilling he was to set off his allies and see them delitiate: and as unwilling again to break his army: considering that in doing, he might either delay the opportunity of giving battle or endanger himself in the very instant of conflict. But at length he resolved in no wise to diminish his own forces, doubting left in the mean while he should receive some dishonor at the enemies hand. As for his associates, he thought it best to interest them with good hopes, for want of better helps; considering that occasions and especially in war, outward semblances and vain flames, are held and taken for truth and substanse, and serve the turn well enough: and when a man is strongly persuaded that he hath aid and succour, the very truth and confidence thereof hath minified hearts to give the venture of some exploit and preferred him as well as the thing itself. The next morrow he delivered this answer unto the Embassadors, That albeit he feared to abate his own strength, in leaving other men's turn with any part of his forces, yet he had at this present more regard of their occasions and dangerous estate than of his own. Whereupon he gave commandment, that a third part of all his bands and companies should have warning to bake and dress viands with all speed, to be below and lay in the ships: and strictly he charged, that they should be rigged and ready appointed against the third day: and whilest within, two of the Embassadors to report to much to Borsigates and the Ilergetes. As for the young Prince his son, he detained still with him, used him graciously, and beloved favours and rich gifts upon him bounteously. The Embassadors took not their leave nor departed, before they saw the fouldiers embarked: and thus by making relation hereof, as a thing asssured and past all peradventure, they filled the heads not of their own friends only, but also of the enemies with the brutish of Roman aids coming near at hand. The Consul now, when he had set this countenance of the matter, and made sufficient semblance to serve his purpose, gave order that the fouldiers should be disbarred again & set a land: and himself seeing now that the time of the year approached commodious for action and execution of martial affairs, dislodged and removed his standing winter camp within a mile of Emporia. From whence (as any occasions and opportunities were preferred) he led forth his fouldiers a foraging and plundering into the enemies land, sometimel one way and sometimel another, leaving always a competent guard to defend the camp. Ordinarily their manner was to press out by night, to the intent that both they might go on till further from their leaguer. And so surprize the enemies at unaswers and unprovided: by which means not only his new & raw fouldiers were exercised, but also many of his enemies were caught up and came short home: whereupon they durst no more peep out of their forts & holds of defence. Now after he had made sufficient proof A proof of the hearts as well of his own men as of his enemies, he commanded all the Marshals, Colonels, Horse-men, and Centurions, to assemble before him: and unto them he made this speech, "The time (quoth he) is now come, that you to often have waited for; in which you may the full your venture and valour. Your service hitherto hath been more like the manner of for-ragers than warriors: but now shall ye come to a main battall, and as enemies, fight hand to hand with professed enemies. From henceforth you may if you will not wait their fields only and put their territory, but ramack the pillegage of rich and wealthy cities. Our fathers before us and ancestors in times past, when as in Spain there were both Generals and armies of Car-thaginians, having themselves no leaders and commanders, no loundiers and forces there, yet would they need have this article among others, capitulated in the accord and composition with the Spaniards. That the River of Iterus should limit their Seigniory and dominion. Now at this day, when two Pretors and a Consul, when three entire Roman armies have the go-vernment and charge of Spain now, I hay, after ten years space almost, wherein no Carthaginians have set foot and been seen in all these quarters of both provinces, we have lost our seg-ondy on this side Iterus. This must ye recover and win again by force of arms, by monhood and valour; yennull I say, compel this nation, more rath and inconsiderate in rebelling than con-tant and relolute in maintaining war, for to receive once more the yoke of sujection, which they have shaken from off their necks. Having exchorted and encouraged them in this manner, he gave them to understand, that he would let forward in the night and lead against the enemies camp. And so he let them depart to refresh their bodies. At midnight, after he had devoutly taken with him the signs and approbations of the birds for his better speed, he put himself in his journey; and because he might be dezier of some place to his liking before the enemies should defray him he let a compa's in his march, and led his loundiers clean beyond their camp. And having by day light let his companies in battall array, he sent out three cohorts, even close to the rampier and trench of the enemy. The barbarrons people wondering to see the Romans shew themselves behind at their back, ran to and fro to take arms. Mean while, the Consul held his men with stouf and such like speeches: 'My loundiers (quoth he) there is no other hope now left, but in mere strength and valour, and I of very purpose have wrought it. Between us and our camp the enemies are encamped all: behind at our back we have our enemies Land. The bravest cowards are ever last, namely, to build and ground our hope purely upon vertue. D) And herewithal he gave order, that the cohorts asoreaid should retire or purpose to train forth the barbarrons people, by making leembiance of retreat and flight. And so set it out in very deed as he thought and supposed: for they imagining that the Romans for very fear were retir'd, fill'd forth by heaps out of the gate, and bended with armed men all the ground, that lay between their own camp and the enemies battall. And whiles they made great holl to embattell themselves, the Consul, who was already arranged in battell array, and in all respects well appointed, charged upon them before they were marshalled and fet in order. First he put forth the corners and wings of horsemen from both points and flanks of the battall: but they of the right side were straightways repelled, and by their hasty and feardly retreating, caused the fort men also to be mightily afraid. Which the Consul perceiving, he commanded two elect cohorts of footmen to wheel about the right flank of the enemies, and to shew themselves at their backes before the other companies of footmen, and charged one another. This did exacter or afforded the enemies, but lest all upright again and recover'd the battall of the Romans which through the fear of the Cavalry began to shrunk and go down. Howbeit the horsemen and footmen both of the right point, were too troubled and too far out of order, that the Consul was forced to pluck some of them back with his own hand, and turn them with their faces against the enemy. Thus all the while that the footfalled the skirmish was doubtful: so now the Romans in the skirmish had much ado to make head and stand to in the right side, whereas the light and light first began. But on the left and alllfront the barbarrons had the worst: and with great horror they looked behind and saw their enemies how they played upon their backs and relied not. After they had done with flinging their iron darts and lancing their fiery javelins, they drew their swords and herewith begin the conflict afresh. They were not wounded now from a fire off by blind chance and haphazard, they knew not from whence; but foot to foot they flank, and hand to hand they coped and let drive one at another: no hope at all was now but to trust in pure strength and main force. The Consul seeing his men wearied, encouraged and releaved them by sending for to relieve and maintain the fight, certain cohorts out of the rearward. This new battallion well in heart, and with fresh weapons charged the enemies tired and tried: and being engag'd in point'd wite like a quoyt or wedge at the first hot on fire brake their errands and bringing one disorder'd, put them to flight, and in flattering wite they ran as fast as their legs would carry them to their camp. Cose seeing them flee on all hands, mounted on horseback and rode himself to the second legion, which was in the rearward for supply and commanded to advance the standards and enignes before him to march space, and to approach the camp of the enemies for to give an assult. If the elipted any one to step out of his rank he would ride before and rap him with his light javelin that he had in his hand: commanding the Marshals and Captains to chastise him for it. Now was the enemies camp at the point to be assualt, and the Romans were with stones, pikes, speches and all kind of weapons set back and driven from the trench. But when this fifth legion approached nearer, then the assailants were more encouraged, and also the the enemies fought more lustily in defence of their rampiers. The Consil called his eye all about him, to see how to break in at some place or other where least resistance might be made: and seeing the guard thin about the left gate, thither he conducted the Principals and the Hаllаtі of the second legion: but the corps de guard which guarded that gate, was not able to endure their violent charge. The rest on the other side, seeing the enemies within the rampier, abandoned the camp, and flung away their ensigns and weapons. The soldiers of the second legion followed the chaise and killed them as they ran away, while the other ranfacked and piled their tents. Vаlеriаns Аnnіs wrote, that there were 60000 fell that day upon the edge of the world. Cesar himself (that never loved to make the leaf of his own praise worthy evil faith, there were many slain: but (leteth not down what number. He is thought to have performed that day three preces of service worthy of great praise and commendation: first, in that he set a compais with his army far from his ships, far from his camp, and gave battle in the middle of the enemies, where his men could repose no hope at all but in their own virtue and valour: secondly, for sending those cohosts behind the enemies to charge upon their backs: and thirdly, for that he called the second legion to march a great pace under their colours displicated, ranged as they were and ordered in battle array, for to approach and affait the gates of the enemies camp, whiles all the rest were disbanded and spread all abroad to purse the enemies in chaise.

After this victory achieved, he sat not still in reit and repose, but having founded the retreat and brought his own fouldiers loden with pilage into the camp, he allowed them some few hours for their night sleep, and led them forth into the territory of the enemy to forrage and spoil: which was as effectual to enforce the Spanish Empitians, and all their neighbour bordeis to yield subjection, as the unhappy battle fought the day before. Many also of other Cities, which were retired to Empire for refuge, tendered themselves to his devotion: whom he entertained all with gracious words, and when he had made them good cheer, beastowing wine and cates plentifully upon them, he lent them home to their own houses. Then immediately he dislodged and removed his camp. And all the way as he marched with his army there referred Embassiators from divers States that yielded themselves unto him. By that time that he was come as far as Varion, all Spain on this side iberus, was wholly subdued: and the barbarous people brought in as presents unto the Consil, all the captives and prisoners, as well Romans as Allies, and namely, Latins, who by many and fundry hands had been taken in Spain. The bruit went commonly abroad that the Consil would lead his power into Turdœnіa. There was a false alarm likewise given, and spoken it was, That he would visit the mountainers that lay out of the way. Upon this vain and headless rumour, there were seven forts belonging to the State of the Bergians that revolted from him: but the Consil led his army against them, and without any memorable battle reduced them under obedience. And the Consil his back was no sooner turned, and he went to Tarcon, but they rebelled again, even before he was departed from thence in any other expedition. Suhdied they were the second time, but they found not the like as our as before, to have pardon: for they were all fold like flames in open market, under the gandal, because they should not thus every while trouble the peace.

In this meantime P. Manlius the Factor, after he had received the old army at the hands of Q. Minus whom he succeeded, and joined there to the other army of old fouldiers belonging to Appius Claudius, and which were come out of the farther Spain, he made an expedition into Turdœnіа. Now these Turdetsians of all other Spaniards are accounted to be the worst fouldiers, howbeit, in confidence of their great numbers and multitudes they came forward and encountered the Roman forces. But the men of arms had no sooner charged them, but presently, they were disarranged. As for the footmen, they fought in manner not at all. The old approved fouldiers, who knew the enemies very well, and were exercised in feats of arms, made a quick dispath of this skirmish, and soon put all paff peradventure. Howbeit, the war was not so ended, nor determined in one battel. The Turdets levied and waged 1000 Cethribers, and so maintained war afield with forraim mercenary forces.

The Consil being already with the Rebellion of the Turdetsians, and supposing that other N Cities would do the like, upon any good occasion and opportunity, disturbed all the Spaniards on this side iberus of their armor and munition, Which they took for such an indignity that many of them for very melancholy killed themselves: a martial and warlike nation, that thought they were as good be out of the world as turned out of their arms, and reckoned no lie, without their weapons, The Consil having intelligence hereof, commanded the Senators of all those Cities to repair into him: and when they were assembled together, he used this speech unto them. cе It concerneth you (saith he) no less than us, to give over this rebelling and warring. For never yet to this day have ye entered into the action, but with more loss and damage of Spaniards, than till and travel of the Roman army. To prevent this mischief that it should not happen, I implore you in one good way, it is, to contrive and work it, that ye might not possibly be able to rebel. Then this I would fain be, if it please your excellency and concern of all other. Affiet me I pray you herein with your good counsel. I assure you I will not be directed by any advice more willingly, than by that which you and your selves shall give me. When they held their tongues, and would not speak a word, he said unto them again, that he was content they should pause upon the matter, and consult thereof a few days. When they were called again and kept silence in this second meeting and conference as well as in the former he made no more ado, but in one day raised the walls of all their Cities, which A which done, he went forward against those that hitherto were not come in, not yielded obedience: and into what quarters sooner he came, he received all the States one after another, there bordering and adjoining, into his protection save only Segesta, a wealthy City and of importance, the which he forced with maestets and rolling pavilions, and such like fabrics. More difficulty in subduing these enemies he found, than others afore who first came into Spain in this regard, for that in times past the Spaniards at the beginning revolted unto them, as being weary of the tedious yoke of subjection under the lordly government and tyranny of the Carthaginians.

But Carthage had more ado with them now, in that out of liberty and freedom, which they had usurped and been used to, he was to engage them (as it were) bond, and to bring them again to servitude. Besides, he found all out of frame and order, whiles some of them were up in arms, others were forced by fierce to revolt, as not able to have held out long unless they had been reduced and incouraged in time. But of this nature and courageous mind was the Conslul, that he would himself in person be present and manage all affairs, as well those of smallest moment, as also those of greatest weight and consequence: and not only devise and give direction whatever was best to be done, but would himself set to his hand, and execute most of the exploits and effect them fully. There was not one amongst all that he commanded with more severity and rigour, than his own left. In this, being near in spare feeding, in much watching, in painful travel, he tried to terrify and ouce the meanest common soldiers, and no privilege challenged he, no advantage bought he to himself in his whole army above others, but only honour and sovereign command.

The Pretor P. Mutilius had the more trouble in his war-service, e. g. on account of the Celtiberians, whom (as it hath been said before) the enemies had levied and hived with their mony, and therefore the Conslul being sent unto by the Pretor his letters, led his legions aloft that he might arrive, (now the Celtiberians and Turditi were severally encamped apart one from the other) the Romans fell presently to maintain light skirmishes with the Turditi, and ever and anon charged their corps de guard, and how rashly and inconsiderably ever they began the game, yet they ever went away victors. As for the Celtiberians, the Conslul sent certain Tribuns or Knight Matills unto them to entice, giving them in charge to make them an offer and tender unto them the choice of three conditions. First, if they could be content to arrange themselves to serve under the Romans, and to receive at their hands double wages so that they bargained for with the Turditi; Secondly, whether they would be willing to go their waies home under safe conduct and publick security, besides that their riding with the Roman enemies should not be laid to their charge, nor bring them within the compass of any danger. Thirdly, if they had more mind to war, then that they should let down some time and place, when and where they might come to an issue, and trie it out in a set battall. The Celtiberians required to take a day for to consider better upon their points. So they assembled together in counsel, with great trouble and confusion, by reason that some Turditi were truth in amongst them; upon which occasion, they might worse grow to any conclusion. Now albeit uncertain it was, whether there would be any war or peace with the Celtiberians, yet the Romans gathered their provision out of the territory and burthous of their enemies, like as in time of peace: yea, and more than that, they entred oftentimes within their fortifications and defences, as if there had been some common traffick and commerce agreed between them, by way of private truce. The Conslul seeing he could not draw the enemy to a battall, sent led certain companies lightly appointed with banners displayed, to raise hostes in one quarter of the country, which as yet was free, and not tainted of the wars; but afterwards hearing that all the bag and baggage and other cargio of the Celtiberians was left as Segesta, he sent forward thither to give an assault to the Town. But seeing that nothing would move and stir them, he paid not only his own loundiers their wages, but also the Pretor's army their dues, and leaving the main host in the Pretor his camp, himself returned to the River Ebro, accompanied only with seven cohorts. With their forces, as small as they were, he went certain Towns, and thence revolted unto him the Sedetans, Anietans, and Sueftetans. The Lactetans (a Nation living out of the way after a savage manner within the wilds and woods) kept still in arms, not only upon a natural and inbred wildness, but also upon a guilty conscience, in that whilsts the Conslul and his army was employed in the Turditi war, they had made tuddish roads and in unions into the lands of their Allies, and pitifullly waited the same. And therefore the Conslul advanced forward to assault their Town, and led against it not only his own cohorts and bands, but also the youth of his Allies, who had good cause to be angry, and to oppose themselves unto them. The Town which they inhabited, lay out in length, but was nothing to wide and large in breadth: and within one half mile or les, he pitched down his ensigns, and planted himself. There he left behind a guard of choice companies, and frethly did he himself not to stir out of that place, before he came unto them himself. The rest of his forces he led about unto the farther side beyond the Town. Of all the aid-loudiers that he had about him, the greatest number were the youth of the Sueftetans, and thence he commanded to approach the wall for to give an assault. The Lactetans, when they took knowledge of their armor and colours calling to mind how often they had overthrown them at their pleasure, and wasted their lands without check or empasschment, how many and fundry times they had in ranged baddly distinguished & put them to flight, all at once set open the gates, and fallied out upon them. The Sueftetans were so little able to maintain the forcible charge of their onsets, that they hardly could abide their very floor: and first cry, The Conslul now, that is come to pass, indeed which he suspected would be...
be for rode a gallop upon the spur to those said cohorts of his own that were left on the other side under the Town, and taking them with him in great haste, whiles all the Townsmen were spread abroad in following the chase after the Suenetians, led them into the Town at a pace where there was no noise, no stirring, and not a man to be seen: and made himself matter of all, before the Lacedeumans were returned back: but within a while he received them to mercy upon their submission: who, poor men, had nothing to yield and lose but their bare armor and weapons. Immediately he followed the train of this victory, and led his forces against the high and strong Town of Vergrum. This was a receptacle and place of fire receive for certain Rovers and Theevies, who from thence used to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that Province. The principal and chief person of Vergrum quit the place, and betook himself unto the Consul, and began to excite as well himself as the Townsmen: saying, that the government of the Town I and the (late thereof) lay not in their hands. For why these robbers after they were once received in among them, seized themselves wholly of that strength, and had all at their command. The Consul willed him to go home again, and to devise and forge some likely and probable cause why he had been absent and one of the way: with this charge and direction, that when he saw him approach under the walls, and the robbers aforefoold wholly snuffed and occupied in defence thereof, then he should remember to join with the rest of his part and faction, and be poffessed of the fortresses and hold of the Town. This put he in practice and execution accordingly. So whiles the Romans of one side seized the walls, and they on the other side had taken the fortresses, these barbarians were suddenly at once surpris'd with a two-fold fear before and behind. The Consul when he had gotten the place into his own hands, gave order, that all those who were gotten into the Caflle and held it, should remain free, themselves and all their kindred, and likewise enjoy their goods. The rest of the Vergrumans he commanded the Treasurer to fell and make many of them. As for the Rovers, they suffered according to their defects. After he had met the Provinct in quict, he laid great tributes and imposts upon the mires of iron and silver: which being once ordained and established, the whole province grew in wealth and riches, every day more than other. For these his exploits achieved in Spain, the LL. of the Senate decreed, that there should be a solemn procession at Rome, to endure for three days.

The same winter, L. Valerius Flaccus the other Consul, fought in France a fet field with the power of the Boians, near the forest of Litania, and won the victory. And by report, there were eight thousand Gauls there slain: the rest abandoned the war and flipp every one into their own L. Hamlets and Villages. The rest of the winter the Consul kept his army at Placentia and Cremona about the Po, and repaired in those Cities whatsoever had been daediaed and demolished during the wars.

The affairs in Italy and Spain standing in these terms: when T. Quinctius had so paffed the winter in Greece, the setting aside the Aetolians (who neither had been renounced according to the hope that they conceived of the victory, nor yet could long time like of repose) all Greece throughout in general enjoying the blessing of peace and liberty, flourished and maintained their state exceeding well, admiring no less the temperance, justice, and moderation of the Roman General after victory, than his valour and prowess in war: there was an Act of the Senate of Rome brought and presented unto him, importuning this much, That war was determined against Nabis, the tyrant of the Lacedeumans. Which when Quinctius had read, he published and proclaimed a general Diet or Council at Corinath against a certain day: when and where all the States associats should assemble by their delegates and Embassadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of Princes and great personages, in such sort, that the very Aetolians also were not absent, Quinctius called unto them this or the like speech. T. The Romans & Greeks have forsworn against King Philip, ye well know; and as with one mind and common counsel they have done, so either of them had several quarters unto him, and private causes and occasions by themselves to take arms. For Philip had broken the league and amity with us Romans, one while by sending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies; otherwhiles by affailing our allies in the fea ports: and to you wards he hath to demeann himself, that albeit we could not forget and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injures that ye have received at his hands, minster sufficient cause unto us to war against him for your sake. As for this dayes conflagration, it relish wholly in your selves. For, this I propound unto you, Whether your will is to suffer Argos (which as ye know your selves Nabis the tyrant holdeth) to remain still under him in obedience; or whether you think it meet and right that a most noble and ancient City as it is, nestled in the very heart of Greece, should be reduced unto liberty, and enjoy the same condition and state wherein other Cities of Peloponnesus and Greece do stand. This conciliacon I say, as you well see, entirely toucheth you and your good, and concerneth us Romans no farther than thus, that by the vertuice of that one only City, we can not have the full and entire glory of setting Greece wholly in liberty. But if you regard not the state of O that City, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for fear the contagion of this mischiefbred farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in good worth, and will not let you down and teach you what to do. Only 1 require your advice in this point, minding to relieve upon that which the Major part of you shall carry by voices. After the Roman General had ended his speech, all the rest began to deliver their opinions. And when the denoted delegate or agent for the Athenians had magnified and extoll'd as highly as possibly he could, the good
A good demersit of the Romans towards Greece, yielding them great thanks, that upon their request they had granted them aid against Philip, and without any petition at all, offered their help and succour against Nabir the tyrant; and seemed therewith to be offended and displeased at some, who nevertheless in their talk and speeches found fault and carped at these forgreat favours and debts: yea, and spake badly of future events, whereas it behoved them rather to acknowledge and confess how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romans for good turns past: it well appeared that he pointed out directly the Eotolians, and girded at them. Whereupon Alexander, a principal and chief man of their nation, inveighed still against the Athenians, who having been in times past the head Captains and maintainers of freedom, betrayed now the common cause, for love of their own private flatteries. Moreover, he complained that the Achaean, who first served Philip in his wars, and at the last (when they saw him down the wind and fortune to frown upon him) fell away like disloyal traitors & professed themselves of Corinth to their own behoof, preaching also to compass and gain unto them the City of Argos. As for the Eotolians, the first and principal enemies of Philip, and allavies and allies to the Romans, howsoever they had expressly and precisely covenanted in the league, to enjoy their towns and territories, after Philip was vanquished, were notwithstanding put besides Echium and Pharsalus. He charged the Romans with fraud and deceit, pretending an outward shew, a vain tinct and colour of liberty, held the Cities of Calchis and Demetrias with strong garrisons: and yet when Philip made some stay and halting to withdraw and void from thence his armed guards, they were ever wont to object and say, that Greece would not be in freedom, so long as

C Calchis-Demetrias and Corinth were in his hand: and finally he alluded against them, that under pretence of Argos and Nabir, they ought occasion to remain still in Greece and keep their armies there. Let them (quoth he) transport their legions once into Italy, the Eotolians would then undertake and promise, that Nabir should remove his garrisons out of Argos, upon composition and with good will, or else they would compel him by force and arms, to be over-ruled by the prudence of all Greece united together in one general consent. By this vain babble of his, he rouled Aristoemn at first, the Praetor of the Achaean, who spake in this wise. Never will Jupiter Ope Max, quoth he, and Queen Jove the Patrooncrs of Argos, suffer that City to be the recompence or prize between the Lacedemonian Tyrant, and their pilling and theiving Eotolians: to be brought to this hard point and their terms of extremity, as to sustain more misery and calamities,

D ty when it is recovered by us, than when it was won and taken by him. O Quintus, it is not the feaying between us and them that can defend us from these robberies. What will then become of us, in case they should make themselves a fort and Castle of strength in the midst of Peloponnesus? Nought have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their shape and visage. For look into their manners, their fashions and behaviour, they are more rude and cruel than any barbarians, nay, they are more savage than the most wild and ravenous beasts that be. We believe you therefore, O Romans, both to recover Argos out of the hands of Nabir, and also to establish the State of Greece in such fort, that ye leave these parts also safe and secure enough from the robberies and theiving hostility of these Eotolians. The Roman General Quintus, seeing them all five to blame and rebuke the Eotolians, said, that he would have answered

E them himself, but that he perceived them all so hateful,ly bent against them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appeased, than farther provoked. And therefore holding himself satisfied and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romans and Eotolians, he said, that he would demand what their pleasure was to advise, concerning the war against Nabir; unless he rendred Argos to the Achaean? And when they all were of one mind to make war, he exhorted them to send aids proportionably to the power and strength of each State and City, To the Eotolians he sent an Embassador, more to discourse and lay open their intention (as it fell out accordingly) than upon any hope he had to obtain ought at their hands. Unto the Provost Marshals of the camp, he gave commandment to send for the army from Etalias.

F About this time, when the Embassadors of King Antiochus came unto him to treat about alliance and league, he answered, That he could say nothing to them nor determine of that point in the absence of those Delegates above said: and therefore they were to repair unto the Senate of Rome. Then, himself in person prepared to make an expedition and voyage against Argos, with those forces which were brought from Etalias. And when he was about Cleone, Aristobulus the Praetor, with 10,000 foot of Achaean, and 1,000 horse met him in the way: and not far from thence they joyned both their forces and encamped together. The next day after they came down into the Plain of Arogo, and chose a place to fortifie and lye in leaguer about four miles from Argo. Now was Pythogoras the Captain of the Lacedemonian garrison, who had both married the tyrant his daughter, and was his wives brother besides. This Pythogoras against the coming of the Romans, had fortified with strong guards both the Castles (for two there are within Argos) and other places, which either had easy access or were suspected, But as he was employed in their provisions and preparations, he could not dispute and hide the fear which this arrival and appearance of the Romans strike into him: and besides this fear from without, there happened also an intestine mutiny within. There was one Damocles an Argeian. (a young Gentleman of more spirit and courage than wisdom and discretion) who at the first by intercepting a mutual and reciprocal oath, had conferred with certain persons of good sufficiency, about expelling the garrison; but whiles he studied to strengthen the conspiracy and his own side, he was not well assured. affured of their fidelity, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. As he talked upon a time with his complices the captain of the garrison went for him by one of his guards; whereupon he perceived that his compot was revealed: he exhorted therefore the conspirators that were in the way to take arms with him, rather than to die by torture upon the rack: and for with some few about him he marched forward into the market-place, crying often aloud. That as many as loved the safety of the Common-weal should follow him as their head and maintainer of their liberty; but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part; for no hope saw they of any succour at all near at hand: so far off were they from making good account of a sure gaud of defence. And as he spoke those words, the Lacedamonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellows. After this were others also apprehended; the most part of them were slain, and some few cast into prison. A great number the next following I slew down the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romans. Thee affured the Romans, that if their army had been near the gates the communions and conspiracy thereof would have taken effect: and in case their camp approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make four informedion: whereupon Quintus sent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horsemen; who skirmished with the Lacedamonians about Cynarhie (a publick school and place of exercitc about a quarter of a mile out of the City) who were fall'd out at the gate; and without any great difficulty chaz'd them within the town: and in that very place where the conflict was, the Roman Generall encamped. One day he spent in confancing an espial, whether any new trouble and uproars arose among them within the City. But when he perceived one that they were all amot for fear, he assembled a Councill to take advice. Whether he were bel to give the af-fault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece, (except Aristophon) accorded with one accord, that since there was no other cause of war elsewher, it should begin therewith especially. Quintus in no case would like of that counsel, but willingly he gave ear with evident approbation unto Aristophon, as he discours'd and reason'd against the genrell opinion and content of them all: and over and besides added this of himself. That considering the war was enterprised and taken in hand in the behalf of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing else becoming and more withoutness, than to leave the enemy himself, and to assail and batter the poor City of Argos. For his part he would fight at the head, even against the Lacedamonians and their tyrant. the principal cause of this war. Then having dissolved the Council, he sent certain cohorts lightly appointed to peruse there of grain. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut mowed and rea-ded down immediately and laid up: all that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled, that the enemies from after might have no good thereof. So he disposed and removed from thence, and having passed over the mountain Porthium, at three days end he encamp'd in the territory of Carystus to regt. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before he would invade the territory of the enemies. From Phocis there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of the Thessalians forty horse, the Roman Generall said not now for succours of men (whereof he had sufficient and plenty) but tor his provision of victuals, which he had commanded the towns bordering near hand to furnish him withall. Besides there came great forces by sea, and met him there: for by this time was Lucius Quintinus thriven with forty fall from Lucanis also eighteen covered ships of Rhodes. And now also was Eumenes the King, about the Islands Cyenides with ten close hatched and decked ships, thirty gallions, with other smaller vessels among of sundry sorts. Likewise of Lacedamonians that were exiled and banish'd persons there were very many; who chaf'd and driven out by the onerous and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Roman Camp, in hope to recover their native country again. Now a great many had been expell'd in divers and sundry ages, since time that the tyrants first usurp'd rule, and were poissett of Lacedamon. The chief of these exiled persons was one Agesipolis, a man to whom by right of descent and lineage the inheritance of the kingdom of Lacedamon appertain'd. He whiles he was but an infant happen'd to be expell'd by Lycurgus after the death of Cimon, who was the first tyrant at Lacedamon.

The tyrant before thus found round about with wars threatening both from sea and land, and destruction in manner of all hope, (considering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies) yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but left out of Crete one thousand more (even the choos flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had besides of mercenary soulidiers three thousand in arms: also ten thousand of his own subjects and Citizens of Lacedamon, together with those that he had taken out of the burroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the City with trench and more. And there that might arise no trouble and stir within the town, he held the spirits of men in awe with fear of sharp and rigorous punishments. And forasmuch as he could not hope nor imagine that they defied and wished his good and sake: for that he held some Citizens in filiation and jealousy: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plain, which they call Dromos, he commanded the Laceda-omians to assemble together without any armour and weapons to an audience: and when they were assembled he environ'd them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble. Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time. If he feared every thing, and made all suffre as well as he could: considering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world might bring in suflcription) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt, rather than be surpriz'd in the midst of their practises and complots, and
A and be punished accordingly: even for this cause (quoth he) I will have certain persons in stake custody and during, until the time as the temple be overthrown which now is coming. And when the enemies be once repulsed (from whom lest danger there will be in case domestic crimes may be prevented) then incontinent will I enlarge them and for them at liberty. This said, he commanded the names to be called of fouriere or thereabout of the principal of the youths and as every one of them answered to his name, he clapt him up into prison: and the next night following, murdered them every one. After this, certain licts (these were they who ever of old time were the Burghers and Villagers, a kind of seafarers and country kerns) were accused to have intended to fly unto the enemy and to band with him: who likewise were whipped and scourged throughout all the streets, and then put to death. By the fullest example of this cruelty, these images of the common fort were well cooled and abated, sea, and so attainted, that they durst not once quench nor give attempt of any new defigments tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his strength and places of defence, for neither thought he himselves strong enough to enter the field and fight a feet battell, nor durst abandon the City seeing the minds of men so wavering, and their affections so unconstant.

Quintius having made his provision and set all things in good order, departed from his standing camp, and the second one came to Selinucia upon the river Oe us: in which very place Antigonus sometime King of the Macedonians stuck a battell (men say) with Cleomenes the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence he was to mount upon hard ascent and narrow passage, he set a short compass through the mountains, having it first before.

Certain men to levell the ground and make the way even, and so got into a large and broad post-gate, until be came to the river Eurymedon, which runneth in manner hard under the walls of the City of Sparta: where, as the Romans were pitching their tents, even as Quintius himself with the horsemens and light van-courtiers gone before, the Auxiliaries of the tyrant charged upon them: who looking for nothing less, because no man had encountered them all the way as they marched, but pasted on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and disquieted here-with. This fear of theirs continued a good while, while the horsemens called upon the footmen, and they again unto the horsemens; and both the one fort and the other metred in themselves but little or nothing at all. At length the standards of the legions with their ensigns came forward; and were within sight, and so long as the companies of the van guard advanced forth to fight.

D they who ere while terrified others, were driven in fearfull halfe themselves into the City. The Romans being retired so far from the wall, as that they were without dart-shots, flood a while ranged in battall array. But after that they saw none of the enemies come abroad against them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quintius took his way and marched with his army in order of battell along the town side, near unto the river-hart at the foot of the hill Menedon. The companies of the legionary footmen led the march in the vanguard, the light footmen and the horsemens followed in the rewarward, and Flasked the ret, Nabis kept within the walls his mercenary scoulfers (in whom he repose greatest confidence) arranged under their ensigns, and in readines to fight, purposing to charge the back of his enemies. And the rewarward of the Romans was not so soon paied by, but they called out of the town at sundry places at once, with tumultuous noise as they made the day before. Appius Claudius had the leading of the rewarward, who having prepared beforehand and heareth of his fellowmen, and advertised them to be prout and ready for what occasion ever might happen, presently turned the ensigns and set a compass with the whole army to make head against the enemies. Whereupon there ensued a hot fight which endured a good time as if two armies had directly encountered one another. In the end, the soulers of Nabis began to give ground and flee; in which flight of theirs they had made leafls hurt, and better saved themselves, but that the Achans who were acquainted well with the ground and knew the coasts of the country, hotly followed the chases: these made a tae slaughter and butcherery among them; and the most part, such as were dispersed here and there in their flight they disarmed. Then Quintius encamped near unto Amphipolis, and having harried and wasted all the territory.

F round about the City (which places were very well peopled and very pleasaunt) when he saw no enemies issue out at the City gates, he removed his camp hard to the river Eurus. From whence he made excursions, wasted all the vale lying under the hill Taurus and the lands, butting and adjoyning close to the sea.

Much about the same time L. Quintius made himself Master of the towns, found on the sea side: some yielded willingly, others for fear or pereforce, And being afterwards advertised that the town Gytaunom (served for a place of safe retreat and refuge unto the Lacedemonians in all their exploits and service at sea, and that the Romans lay encamped not far from the sea side, he resolved to affail it with all forcible means. This town at that time was very strong well peopled with Citizens and other inhabitants; and sufficiently furnished with all warlike provisions and munition.

G And in very good time it fell out, that as Quintius was entered into this difficult enterpise, King Emeneus and the Rhodian fleet arrived. A mighty number of mariners and sea-servitors, gathered out of three Armadoes, within few days made and furnished all engines and fabrics, which were to assault the City so well fortified both by sea and land. Now was the town wall broken down with the undermining of the tortures, now was the wall shaken by the puth of the rim, and with all there was one tower that by continual batterie was overthrown: and with the fall thereof all the wall that stood by the side came tumbling down and lay along. And the Romans evermore red at one time to enter the town, both from the haven (where the passage was more plain and easy) to the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place; and also at the breach made in the wall; and they miffed but very little of entrance there where they intended, but the hope they conceived of yielding the city, which anon was crossed again, and turned to nothing, laid their violence and heat of assault. Desagoridas and Corasias governed the town then in equal authority. Desagoridas had dispatched a courier to the Roman lieutenant, to signify that he would betray the town; and when the time and place of execution of this designment was agreed upon between them, the traitor was killed by Corasias: by occasion whereof, the City was the better defended with more careful heed by him alone; yea, and the assault thereto had been more difficult, but that \textit{Lucius Quinctius} came to succour and help with four thousand chosen soldiers. He was no sooner discovered with an army arranged in battle array from the brow and top of the hill that is not far distant from the town; whilst \textit{L. Quinctius} with all from another side followed the assault with his ordnance and artillery both by sea and land, but Corasias then began himself to delpair in very deep and was driven perforce to take that very course, which in another he had punished by death; and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those soldiers which he had ingarriage, he delivered up the City to \textit{Quinctius}. Before that \textit{Gytheion} was rendered, \textit{Pythagoras} left as Captains at \textit{Argos}, leaving the guard and defence of the City unto the charge of "Temporaries" of Pelonius, came with a thousand wounded soldiers, and two thousand Argives unto \textit{Nabia} at \textit{Lacedemon}. And \textit{Nabia} like as at the first arrival of the Roman fleet, and the surrender withall of the town standing by the sea side, was much affected; so he had recovered again some little hope and was well quieted in mind, so long as \textit{Gytheion} held out still & his garrison within the town kept their own. But after he heard once, that it also was yielded unto the Romans, and lo! seeing no hope left by land side, which was wholly poffessed by the enemies, and that he was altogether shut up from the sea, thought it best to yield unto Fortune. And first he sent in herald into the camp to know whether the enemies would permit and suffer him to send his Embassadors unto them. Which being granted, \textit{Pythagoras} repaired unto the General with no other charge and commission, but only to request that they might part with the Roman General, & hereupon the Council was assembled: and generally opined it was that there should be granted unto him a conference; in which, both time and place was agreed upon, and appointed. Now when they were come to the hills standing in the midst of that quarter, with some small companies of soldiers attending on either side upon them, they left their cohorts behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and sight of both parts: and then \textit{Nabia} came down with a certain chosen guard for his body; and \textit{Quinctius} accompanied with his brother. \textit{Lucius} the King \textit{Sabinus} the Rhodian, and \textit{Aristomen} the Priest of the A. heirs, with some few Knight Marshals and Colonels. And then the tyrant being put to his choice, whether he would speak first or hear another, began his speech in this wise.

"If I could have bethought my self (O \textit{Quinctius} and you all that are here present) & imagined what the cause should be that you either proclaimed or made war first against me. I would have attended the issue of my fortune with patience. But now I could not have that Matter and command of my self to forbear, but that before I perished, I would needs know the reason and cause of my ruin and overthrow. Surely if ye were such men as the Carthaginians are reported to be (with whom there is no regard of truth, no trust and security in covenants of society and alliance), would not then make all at a lift if you made small reckoning, & cared but little what matters ye offered unto me. But now, that I behold and advice you well, I see you are Romans, whose manner is to entertain most dully and precisely the observation of holy rites & divine Religion and the faithful keeping of human league and alliance, when I consider and look into my self, I hope and think verily that I am one, with whom in general as well as with the rest of the Lacedemonians ye are linked by virtue of a most ancient league and in particular regard of my self, a private amity and society hath been lately renewed by the war with \textit{Philip}, but peradventure some man will say, That I have broken and overthrown the same first in that I hold the City of the Argives. And how shall I be able to answer this, and excuse my self? Shall I plead to the inhabitant of the matter or to the circumstance of the time? The thing itself prefethunter unto me to a twofold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themselves of the City, who offered the town unto me, I received it at their hands, and in no wise seiz'd upon it by force: I received it, I say, when it was tendered and took part with \textit{Philip}, before it was comprised within your league. As for the time it justified and cleareth me also and my doings. For even then when as I was possfessd of \textit{Argos}, I was allied and associat with you in good accord: and in our covenants, we articled and stipulat to send aids unto you for your wars, and not to withdraw the garrison from \textit{Argos}. And verily, in this difference and question about \textit{Argos}, I have the vantage as well in regard of the equity of the fact (in that I received a City not of yours but of your enemies received it I say not unrightfully by force, but offered and delivered willingly) as also by your own confession, for that in the conditions of the association agreed between us, ye left \textit{Argos} free unto me. But it may be that the name of tyrant hurtest me: and some of mine actions condemn me much, and namely, that I let slaves free and divide lands to the poor commons. As for the name this much I am able to answer: that such as I am, better or worse, still I am the very same man, and no other than I was when you even you O \textit{Quinctius}, entered alliance with me: then, I remember well, I was called King among you; and now I see I am termed a Tyrant; And therefore A therefore if I my self had changed the title and file of my dignity and government, I must have yielded a reason and account of my levity and inconstancy: but seeing you have altered it, ye ought to answer for your vanity, now as concerning the multitude, so augmented by the enlargement of slaves; as touching the land also, parted and distributed among the poor and needy, I can maintain and justify my doings herein. & protect me under the defence and privildge of the very time. For all these things be they as they be may, I had done already, when ye made a league and covenant with me, and receiv'd aids at my hand in the war against Philip. But in case I had done to at this very prentice, I had not now upon this, whether I either had offended you or broken your amity, but thus much I leave, that done I had according to the custom and fapiency of our ancestors. And ye must not think to squyre and try the practice of Lacedemon according to the rule and square of your laws, and ordinances. For to pass many other things, and needles it is to compare particulars: ye chuse your gentemen or men of arms according to their revenue; according to these ye chuse likewise the footmen. Your will is that some few should excel in wealth and power & the commons be subject and valadils unto them. Our Law-giver thought no good that the common wealth should be ruled by one, whom you call a Senate; nor that one or two States should excel, & have a preeminence in the City: but he thought that in the equality of wealth & worship, there would be many more to bear arms for their country, I have made a longer discourse I confess, than the ordinary and naturs: brevity of our speech in these parts will bear. And I might have skitt'd all up in one word and said, that I had done nothing after what I was entered into amity with you, wherewith you needed to have taken any offence & been displeased. Then the Roman General made answer to these points in this manner, No friendship nor association at all have we made with you, but with Pcealy the true & lawful k. of the Laedemonians: whereof, I must needs say that the tyrants alfo who after wards held the seigniny & sovereignty of Lacedemon, have usurped the right, and enjoyed the benefit during the time that they were otherwise employed, and wholly busied, one while in the Punic wars, another whiles in the Gauls, and evermore in one or other: like as you also have done in this late Macedonian war. For what was less unfitting and more absurd, than for us who waged war against Philip or the liberty of Greece, to conclude amity with a tyrant, and such a tyrant, as of all others that ever have been is most cruel, most violent and outrageous with his own subjects? And considering that we were entered into the court and train of setting all Greece at liberty, albeit you had not posseff'd your self of Argo by coyn, nor held the fame by force, yet it behoved us to restore La-cedemon all to her ancient liberty, and to settle her in her owne laws, whereof ere while you would seem to make mention, as if you had followed the steps of Lycurgus. We shall make care and take the pains to void the garrisons of Philip out of Iaffus & Bagriiles: and when we have done, leave to be trodden under your feet Argos & Lacedemon, two most noble Cities, the two lights as it were in times past of all Greece, which remaining still in servitude and slav'ry, might deface the title of our glory, & mar the title that we aim at, of Saviours and Deliverers of Greece. But you say, that the Argives friend'd Philip and took his part. We are content well enough, that you should not trouble your self, and be angry for our sake. For we know for certain, that this was the fault of two or three persons at most, and not of the whole City: and we know as well, that it was not agreed in any publique connivell that you and your garrion were lent for and received into the Cattle. As for the Thessalian, the Phocians & Locrians, they sided with Philip, we wrought well by a general consent of all, and yet when we enfranchiz'd all Greece besides, we also set them at liberty. What think you then should we do in regard of the Argives, who are innocent for any publique connivell intended against us? You said that you were blamed & charged fore for setting bond slaves free. However objections there are, I assure you, not of little importance. But what are they in comparison of other bad parts and heinous facts committed by you and your followers day by day, one in the head of another: Grant but liberty of an Assembly general either at Argos or Lacedemon, wherein the people may speak their minds freely, and what they know by you without empecement: if you would learn the truth indeed, and hear the particular of a most proud and unassailable dominion and tyranny. And to let all old matters go by, what a bloody massacre committed this in law of your Pityogras, even almost within my very fight in Argos, nay, what a slaughter and butcherly made you your self, even when I was well near within the marches of Lacedemon. But come on these persons whom in a generall assembly you caugbt to be attached, and promis'd in the presence of all the Citizens to keep them safe and faire in ward: come on. I say, command them to be brought forth now bound as they be: that their poor fathers & mothers may understand they are alive, whom they have mournd for to much, without cause, as if they had been dead. But you will say, I can't care all this be true, what is that to you Romans? Date you indeed I speak out and lay so much to those that deliver Greece and set it free? to those I say, that for the freedom thereof have paffed the seas have warred both by land and sea? And yet all this while (say you) I have not directly & truly wronged you nor properly infringed & broken your friendship and amity. No have you not? How often would you have me to convince you of the contrary? But I will not use many words & much circumstance, but come to the very catch and point of the matter, what is the things I pray you, wherewith friendship is commonly broken? I take it they are the two else tally, namely, if you take my friends for your foes; and joy your self to my enemies. You have done both the one and the other: for you have taken by force and arms Messena, a City received into our feciety and alliance by the very fame conditions and counefts that \textit{Lacedemon} wis \textit{Anhon}. If you I lay our allies have forced a City allied unto us, Again, with \textit{Philip} our enemy, you have not only concluded amity, but (God save all) contracted alliance and amity by means of \textit{Philades} a Colonell and Commander of his: and making warfare against us, you have kept the seas all about \textit{Macedon} with your men of war and rovers: and I think I may safely say, you have taken pirates, and killed more Roman Citizens than \textit{Philip} himself. And the whole sea-coast of \textit{Macedon} hath leased inflected our ships that use to bring provision unto our armies, and been more safe for passage than the promo nertry & cape of \textit{Macedon}. Do you forbear therefore to make such vaunt of seiden·tery: spare you of all other to speak of the rights of alliance; and laying off the mask of popular language and civil speech: talk as a tyrant and enemy as you are. Upon this, \textit{Arcisius} dealt with \textit{Nabonid} while admonishing and advertising him, another while requelling and entreatyng, I now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himself and his whole estate: he began to diuerte offrute of him of the Tyrants of all the states containing together about one another by name, who when they had inligned up and laid down their absolute sovereignty of command, and restored liberty to their subjects, passed their old age among their Citizens, not only in peace and security but also in great honour and reputation. These words uttered & heard between them to and fro, the night drew on space & parted the conference. The morrow after, \textit{Nabonid} promised seeing the Romans would have it to quit the City \textit{Argos}, to withdraw his Garrison from thence and to deliver again all the captives and fugitive traitors that were under his hands: and if they demanded any more of him, he requested that they would set it down in writing, that he might confer thereof with his friends. So both the Tyrant had reft and time granted to take advice, and also \textit{Orestes} late in Council with the principal heads of his allies what to do. The most part were of opinion to maintain the war till, and to kill the tyrant out of the way: for never would the liberty of Greece be otherwise firm and fast: and better far had it been, never to have entered into arms with him than being once began to give it over. And he will, they say, be greater and more strong hereafter, as if his tyrannical government were approved, and no doubt would reach the people of \textit{Rom} for author of his unjust rule and dominion, and will induce and induce by his example many in other free States and Cities, to lie in wait to work means to overthrow the liberty of \textit{Citizens}, and to bring them into thraldom and bondage. The General of himself was more affected and inclined to peace: for he saw, that if the enemy were once driven within the walls, there was no way but to lie in siege against the City, and that would re-entire length of time: forasmuch as it was not \textit{Gliscius} (and yet that was betrayed and renounced nor forced by affay) but \textit{Lacedemon}, a most strong town both for men and munition, that they were to lay siege unto and assault. And whereas the only hope was, that when they approached with the army, there might some dissention and sedition have rife among themselves within now when as they saw the enemys in manner advanced hard to the City gates, there was not one that mused or flew at all. He added moreover and said, That \textit{Villius} the \textit{Embassador} newly returned from \textit{Antiochus}, reported, how all was not found there, not the peculiar to like and that he had passed over into \textit{Europe} with far greater forces both for end and at sea than at any time heretofore: and (quoth he) the army should be wholly emploied in the siege of \textit{Lacedemon}, what other power have we to maintain war withall against \textit{so puissant and mighty a Prince} as \textit{Antiochus}? These were the remonstrances that openly he gave out; but secretly he was troubled in mind for fear lest a new Conflil should come in his place, and have the government of the Province of \textit{Greece}: and fo he should leave unto his successor, the honour of the victory of a war commenced by him, and in good forwardness. But when he perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his ways, without adding all his contradictions and bending to the contrary, by making remonstrant that he now drew with them and was of their mind, he won them all to approve his designation and intention. Well, \textit{God} fee our hand (quoth he): \textit{Let us besiege \textit{Lacedemon} since ye will have it so: but considering that the laying siege unto Cities, is a thing as ye well know, that goeth so slowly forward, and oftentimes maketh the assailants sooner weary than the defendents: ye ought even now to call this account presently with your selves, that we must lie all winter long about the walls of \textit{Lacedemon}. And were there nothing but travel and peril, that during so long time we were to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to suffer and abide the fame, with stout bodies and resolute minds. But besides all that, we must be at great cost and expences about fabrics, engines, and instruments of artillery, requir'd to the assait of so great a City: we must I say be provided of victuals good (fore against winter, as well to serve us as you. Bewell advised therefore to the end that you should not suddenly in haste huddle up these matters, after ye are once enred into the action, give over and abandon it with flame) that ye dispatch your letters and hand every one to the State wherein he liveth, and found them to the depth, how their hearts serve them, and what strength and forces they have, of aids & succours. How enough and to spare: but the more in number we are, the more maintenance shall we need. At this time the territory of our enemies hath nothing but bare foile and naked ground: and withall, the winter is coming on apace, all which faction, carriage (especially far off) is cum·brons and hard. This Oration at the first caus'd them every one to regard and look homeward to domestical difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleness, the envy and backbiring of those which stay at home, against them that are employed in warfare: the common liberty (which A (which causeth men of one society and communally hardly to accord and fort together) the public-like want of treasure, and the negligence of private persons, when they are to part with anything out of their own purses, and therefore suddenly changing their minds, they put to the discretion of the Roman Generall, to do and determine what he thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintus, taking the advice only of his own Lieutenants and Provost-Marshal, enroled these Articles and conditions following, according to which peace should be concluded with the Tyrants. Imprimis, That there be true made for the term of ten months between Nabos and the Romans. King Eumenes and the Rhodians. Items, That both T. Quintus and Nabos should immediately send Embassadors to Rome, that peace might be ratified and confirmed by the authority of the Senate. Items, That from that day forward wherever

B in the conditions put down in writing shou'd be preterred unto Nabos, the same aforesaid should begin, Items, That within ten days next after ending, all the citizens quit Argos and the rest of the towns within the territory of the Argives and then those places be delivered void and free unto the Romans. Items, That no prince taken captive in wars, belonging either to the King, or to any publick State, or private person be had away from those towns: and if any former time had been carried forth, they should be restored again duly to their right Masters. Items, That Nabos should deliver again those ships that he had gotten from the maritime Cities, and that himself have no vessel at all but only two galleons, and those to have no more than him and twenty oars, sixe to direct and rule them, Items, That he render all the runagate Traitors and captives unto all the Cities confederate with the people of Rome, as also make restitution to the Meffennians of all their goods again, that either could be found, or the owners know certainly to be theirs. Items, That he restore to all the banished Macedonians their wives and children but of the wives, so many only as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them should be compelled against their wills to go with any enquired person. Items, That as many mercenary bandits of Nabos, as were either gone from him into their own Cities or to the Romans, all their own goods should be justly and truly delivered again, Items, That in the Island of Grec he should not be possessed of any one City: and look what Cities he then held, he yield them to the Romans, Items, That he enter into alliance with no Candiots, nor with any other whatsoever, nor yet make war with them: Items, That he remove all the garrisons out of all the Cities that himself had delivered up, and which had surrendered themselves and all they had, under the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, and not molest them neither by himself nor any of his. Items, That he build no town nor Castle, either in his own land or in any other, Items, That for the more assurance of performing these covenants, he give five hostages, such as it should please the Roman Generall to choose: and namely, his own Son for one of them. Last of all, That he make present payment of one hundred talents of silver, and fifty more yearly until the term of eight years be run out. These Articles enroled, were sent to Macedonias, where the Camp was removed nearer to the City, But nothing well pleased was the time with any of them. Only he was well apaid, that beyond his hope and expectation, there was no mention at all therein of reducing the exiled persons home into the City, But that which offended and displeased him most was this, that both shipping was taken from him, and also the maritime towns: for great commodity he got by the sea. In curing the coast from the Cape of Malea with his pyrats and men of war: and besides, the youth and able men of those Cities, were very well furnish'd and man his ships with the very best soldiers and men of service that were. And albeit he planned and consider'd upon these articles in great secrecy with his friends, yet were they all of them diverted abroad and current in every min's mouth: so that were the couriers commonly and hardly to be trusted, as in all things else especially in keeping of secret counsell. These conditions were controlled and found fault with, noto much by all men in general, as by each one in particular, as they took exceptions against those points that touched and concerned themselves. They that had married the wives of the banished, or were possessed of any part of their substance, chaited, and corrected them, as if they were to lose and forg're their own, and not to render and restore the goods of others. The slaves who had been freed by the tyrants, were now not only to lose the benefit of their freedom, but also to endure harder servitude and bondage than at soetime; setting before their eyes how they should return again in the houses and hands of their old Masters, angry and incensed now against them. The hired soldiers were malecontent, for that they saw they should lose their pay after peace concluded: and faw full well, that there was no being for them in those States and Cities, who hated the tyrants themselves no more than their followers and attendants. At first they muttered and murmured, whispering these things among themselves in their secret meetings and conversations: afterwards they muttered, and on a sudden ran and took arms. The Tyrants seeing the multitude disquieted enough of themselves with this tumult, assembled the people together. Where, after he had declared the conditions impos'd upon him by the Romans, and in every article had unruly put to somewhat of his own devising, to aggravate all matters and make them seem more grievous and intolerable, at the rehearsing of every particular the whole assembly one while cried out, and another while the fudgery parts thereof: for up a note of utter dislike, Then he asked their opinion what answer they would have him to return unto those Articles, and what to do? They all in manner with one voice accordan't and said: that there was no anwering of the matter, but that he should plainly go to war, and make no more ado, ado. And that every man for his own part (as the usual manner is of a multitude, when they are together) should take a good heart, and hope the best, saying that Fortune favoureth Fortitude. The tyrant incited with their words, seconded them himself; and assured them that Antochus and the Aetolians would take their parts and assist them; and if they did not yet were they strong enough of themselves, and had sufficient means to endure the siege. No more talking now nor thinking of peace, but every man was ready to run in haste to his several quarter, and stand upon their own guard, without any rest or repose from thenceforth. The Romans so soon as they saw some few of them to fly out of the City, and to discharge their darts among them, were soon put out of all doubt, that no other remedy there was, but they must to war again. After this, there passed certain light skirmishes four daries together at first without any assisted issue of good speed, either of the one part or the other; but the fight day after one conflict fought in manner almost of a set battle, certain Roman soldiers following the chafe upon their enemies, and killing them in their flight, entered the City at certain void places, where the wall was not united: for in that order were the walls built of that town in those daires. Quintus then verily, having well bridged and named by this terror his enemies for making any more excursions, and opposing that there remained no more, but lastly to go to an assault, sent one certain of his provost officers to call the mariners and sea-soldiers from Gyttium, while himself in person, accompanied with the Provost Marshals, rode about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Sports in times past without murage. And the tyrants of late days had built walls against the open flats and plain fields. The higher ground and of harder access, they fortified with strong corps de guards of armed soldiers, instead of bulwarks of defence. When Quintus had diligently considered every corner, he perceived there was no other way but to invent round about, and thereupon with all his forces united (which being all together Roman Citizens and Latin allies, foot and horse, land-soldiers and sea-soldiers one with another amounted to 50000 fighting men) he compassed and environed the City, some brought female, and every man one thing or other, not only to give an assault, but also to terrify and amaze them, with direction and express command, with a loud shout and shout at one in all places to approach the walls, and give the venture upon them; to the end that the Lacedaemonians, when at one instant on every side, might not know which way to turn them, and be to see, where first to make head against the enemies, and in what place to come with success. Having therefore divided the whole power of his army into three parts, he gave the one of them in charge to all that quarter which was called Phleumum, and a second likewise to set upon that which is named Termum, and the third to force the canton Heptagonia: places lying open and without a wall. The City being thus feized on all sides with so great fear, the tyrant moved and troubled to hear so sudden outcries and fearful news brought unto him by hasty messengers, according as any place was most in danger, at the first, either presented himself in proper person, or else sent some to the place, but afterwards, seeing the fear so general, and no one place void of danger, he was engaged, that uncle he was either himself to give good direction to others or to hear their, and was he and disturbed of advice and coun sel, and bereft of his right wisd and senses. The Lacedaemonians at first hand inflamed the furious violence of the Romans in the narrow streets and passages, and at one time in divers places, three armies fought on either side but a教育资源的; as the best of the fight encroached, the service was M nothing equal of both parties; so the Lacedaemonians discharged shot from which the Roman soldiers easily saved themselves, by means of their large targets, and withall much thereof either fell short and beside, or else to feebly flung from them that little or no harm they could do. For by reason of the brightness of the place, and the multitude so thronged and thrust together, they had not only no space to take their run, when they should lance their darts (the feet means of all other to enforce them) but not so much as lure looking, and at ease to drive and level them with all their strength, insomuch as all the darts and javelins which were directly shot at them, none at all pierced to their bodies & very few so much as fell in their bucklers. Mary some happened to be wounded from the higher places, by those that fell down near unto them, and about their sides. And anon as they advanced forward they changed to be hurt, not only with arrows & darts from off the honies, but also with tiles and flats ere they were aware. But afterwards, they covered their heads with their targets, which they set to close united together one under the other, feather wise, that not only there was no place of entrance for the darts thrown and cast at random afar, no, not so much as any room for a weapon to get between, levelled though it were, and aimed near at hand; in as under this target hence they approached nearer and nearer in safety. At the first the narrow and straight passages filled with the throng both of themselves and also of the enemies to thrust and crowded together, levelled them for a while; but afterwards when they had by little and little gathered upon the enemies, and put them back, and were come into a larger and more spacious street of the City, then their force and violence could not possibly be endured any longer. Now when the Lacedaemonians turned their backs and red appearance to gain the higher places for their advantage, Nabis verily for his part trembling and quaking as if the City had been quite lost, looked about him on every side, which way himself might escape and in his life. But Pythogeneus as in all things else he performed the devoir and part of a correct Captain, so he was the only canis that the town was no loss: for he commanded to set fire to the honies standing next to the wall, which in the minute of an hour burned one on a light there as being let forward by the help of the thosse, who otherwise were wont to quench the like care whereupon the houses came crying and tumbling down upon the Romans' heads, and not only the tile harvests, but also the timber pieces half burnt fell upon the armed louders, the flame spread far and near, and the mothering smoke put them in tear of more danger than was. And therefore, as well those Romans who were without the City in the hotliest of their assault, retreated from the walls, as also those that were entred already, for fear left by the fire behind them they should be separated from their fellows, retired themselves. Quintus also seeing how the cafe stood, caused to sound the retreat, and so being recalled, they returned out of the City which they had as good as won, into the camp. And Quintus conceiving more hope by the tear of the enemies, than of the thing it fell and the service done, never gave over for three days to terrifie them partly by skirmishing, and partly by incursions and stopping up certain quarters, that they might have no passage at all to fight, and so for themselves. The tyrant continued at length with these dangers men ready Pythagoras again as an Orator unto Quintus, but he at first rejected him, and commanded him to avoyt out of the camp; yet in the end after he had made most humble supplication, and set himself prostrate at his feet, he gave him audience. The beginning of his speech was this: that he yielded all to the discretion and former award of the Romans. But seeing that he gained nothing thereby, and that his words took no effect, they grew at length to this point, That upon the same capitulations which few days before were exhibited up in writing, a sum he'd have been made, and hereupon was both the money and also the hostages received.

Whiles the tyrant was besieged and affaird, there came��st upon point to Arch, that Lacadena was at the point of being lost: whereupon the Argives took such hearts and courage unto them (by reason that Pythagoras with the bell part of the Garrison louders was departed before out of their town) that contaminating the small number which remained in their fortresses, under the leading of one Archippus, they expelled the rest of the parchment. As for Timocrates of Pelene their Captain, because he had heaved himself in his charge and government gently and mildly, they sent him away alive with faire conduct: At the very instant of this joyful event, T. Quintus arrived after he had granted peace to the tyrant, and sent away from Lacadena Euceneres and the Rhodians together with L. Quintus his brother to the fleet. The City of Argos in great joy proclaimed the celebration of their most solemn feast, and those to famous and renowned games and palatines called Nemesis against the coming of the Roman army and their Generall. which they had foreseen upon the ordinary time and day, by occasion of the troubles of war. And for the honor of Quintus they ordained him to be the overier of these solemnities. Many things there were to redouble and increase this their joy and solace to the full. The Citizens were reduced from Lacadena whom Pythagoras of late and Nobis aforesaid had carried away. They also were returned home again who had fled and escaped, after the conspiracy of Pythagoras was discovered, and the massacre begun. Now they saw their liberty again, whereby they had left the light a long time now; then the Romans the authors thereof, and who for their sakes were induced to take arms and enterprize the war with the tyrant, As long as the very day of the Nemean games, the liberty of the Argives was published and proclaimed by the voice of the public beadle, beadle and crier of the City. But took how much joy and hearts content the Achaeans conceived in their common and general Counsell or all Achaia, for the restoring of Argos unto its ancient freedom, so much troubled they were again, in regard that Lacadena was left still in trepidation, and the tyrant to near amongst them ready ever to prick their sides, whereby their joy was not found and entire. But the Eotians in all their Diets inveighed mightily against this, saying, That the Romans never gave over the war with Philip before he had abandoned all the Cities of Greece; as for Lacadena, it was left still under a tyrant and in the mean while the lawfull and natural King who had been in the Roman camp, and all the rest of the nobler Citizens should live in exile. For now the people of Rome were become a pensioner to guard the body of tyrannizing N. bus. Then Quintus brought back his army from Augustus Elam, from whence he departed to the Spartan war, some write, that the tyrant when he fought with the Romans came not immediately out of the City; but that he was lodged without him full opposite to the Roman camp; and that after he had made good a long time, expediting the aid of the Eotians, he was driven in to the end from a battall, by occasion that the Romans charged upon the terrangers and purveyors of his camp: in which battall he was vanquished and beaten out of the field, and craved peace after that fifteen thousand of his men were slain, and four thousand taken prisoners, and above.

At one and the same time in a manner were letters brought both from T. Quintus touching the affairs at Lacadena, and also from M. Porcius the Consul out of Spain. And by order of the State, it was granted in the name of either of them a solemn procession to continue three days. L. Valerius the Consul, after he had governed his Province in quietness upon the defeat of the Boians about the forrest of Litania, returned to Rome against the general assembly for election of Magistrates, and created Consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, the second time, and T. Sempronius Longus: whose fathers had been Consuls in the first year of the second Punick war. Then the Assembly was holden for the election of Praetors, wherein were chosen P. Cornelius Scipio and the two Cnei Cornelii, the one M. Merentius, and the other Bino: Ca. Domitius Aeschnur, Sextus Diginitus, and T. Jovinianus Toba. When these elections were finnished, the Consul returned again into his Province, That year the Perentiniis affared to obtain a new privilege: to wit, That as many Latines as were enrolled in any Roman Colony, should be be Citizens of Rome. But they of Paters, Salernum, and Buxentum, who were Coloniers and had their names entered there, and by that means carrying themselves as Roman Citizens, were adjudged by the Senate to be no Citizens of Rome.

In the beginning of this year, wherein P. Scipio Africanus was Conful the second time, with T. Sempronius Longus, two Embassadors of Naissus the tyrant, arrived at Rome. For to give them audience, the Senate assembled together without the City in the Temple of Apollo. Their petition was, That the peace agreed upon with Quinctius might be ratified: and their suit was granted. When it was moved, as touching the government of the Provinces; the Senate (assembled in great frequency) were all of this opinion. That so much as in Spain and Macedon the war was ended, both Conuls should have the government of Italy. Scipio was of advice, That one Conul was sufficient for Italy, and that the other should be employed in Macedon. And why? there was cruel war menaced from King Antiochus; himself already was palled over into Europe: And what think you, seniores, will he then do, when the Epirians (who doublets are enemies) of one side shall solicit and call upon him for war, and Antiochus, a warriour and commander so renowned for the defeats and overthrowes of the Romans, shall prick him forward of the other? Whiles they debated thus about the Provinces of the Conuls, the Praetors call lots for their several governments. The City jurisdiction fell to Cn. Domitius, the foraini to T. Junius; To P. Cornelius the farther Spain was allotted, and the bishop to Sex. Digidius. Cn. Cornelius Bulo had Sicily assigned unto him, and M. Mercurius was charged with Sardis. It was not thought good that a new army should be transported over into Macedon; but concluded it was, that the army there should be brought back by Quinctius into Italy. Scipio charged, Item, That the army likewife should be cased, which had served under M. Fontinius Capo in Spain, I. e. That both Conuls should govern Italy, and levy two legions of Citizens to go thither, that when those forces were dismissed and licenced to go home, which pleased the Senate to let at liberty, there should be eight Roman legions in all, and no more pay.

In the former years, when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Conuls, there had been held a solemnity of a fared Spring. But when P. Licinius the high Pontiffes made report first to the College of the Priests, and by the advice and authority of that College, unto the L. of the Council. That there was some error committed, and that it was not performed accordingly; the Senators ordained, that it should be done again anew, according to the direction and direction of the Pontiffes aforesaid. Also that the great Roman Places, which together with that Spring were vowed, should be exhibited with the accustomed toll and expenses: And that all young captalls that fell between the Calends of March, and the last day of April, in that year wherein P. Cornelius, Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus were Conuls, should be accounted as consecrated for that sacred Spring above-named. After this, there was an assembly held for the choosing of Gentiores, wherein were created Sex. Aelius Pans, and C. Cornelicus Collerus: who elected P. Scipio the Conul, President of the Senate, like as the Conuls before them had done. In the survey and review of the whole Senate they left out and disdained three only, and none of them who had born office of State, and sat in the Iovis chair. Great love these Conuls, won amongst them of that calling and equality in giving commandment to the Eedle's unble. That the Roman games and plays they should let out places apart from the rest of the people for the Senators to behold the said diports. For aforetime they beheld the sports and diversions all together, without regard and distinction. Few also of the Gentlemen or Knights of Rome had their offices of service taken from them; and rigorously dealt with them at the rate and degree. The porche of Liberty, and the hamlet called Villa publica were by them required and enlarged. The Sacred Spring was celebrate; and the games vowed by Se c. Sulpisius the Conul, were by them exhibited, And whiles all men were armed and their minds occupied thereunto, Q. Plemius, who had been cast in prison for divers and sundry outrages committed at Locri, to the great annoyance of God and man, had procured certain persons, who in the night leson at one instant should set on fire many places of the City, to the end that whiles all the people were affrighted in this night-time, he might break prison and elapse. This compier was discovered and reported to the Senate by some of them that were privy and accedant therunto, And Plemius was let down into a lower dungeon and there killed.

That year there were certain Colonies of Roman Citizens conducted to Paters, Volturnum, and Liternum, and three hundred men planted in each of them. Likewise Coloniers of Roman Citizens were brought to Salernum and Buxentum. The Triumvirs who had the placings of them were T. Sempronius Longus, Conul for the time being; M. Servilius and Q. Minutius Thermus. The territory of the Campanians was divided among them. Three other also departed for the like purpose, D. Iunius Brutus, M. Bibius Tamphus, and M. Helvius placed a Colony of Roman Citizens in Sempronium to enjoy the lands of the Arpinians. Likewise other Colonies of Roman Citizens were planted in Templa and Cerone. The lands belonging to Tempia were won from the Bruniis, who had expelled the Greeks: and the Greeks remained in Cerone. The Triumvirs for Cerone were Cn. Otho, L. Eumolpus Paulus, and C. Plebrus, and for Tempia L. Cornel, Merula, and C. Sabinius. Also that year were seen at Rome divers wonders and prodigious sights: and some were reported from other parts. In the common place place, in the publice Hall, Comitium, and Capitol, were seen certain drops of blood. And sometimes it rained earth. The head of Paters was on fire. News came that at Interamna there ran a stream of milk, Alto that at Ariminum there were

A were two Insants both of free condition, born without eyes and nose; and another in the Picene country handlest and footles. These strange tokens were by order given from the chief Pontes, looked unto and expacted, and a Novendial lastice continued for nine dites, became the Adrians brought word, that in their territory it rained lions.

In Gaul, near to Mediolanus, L. Valerius Flaccus the Pro-Consul, fought a last field with the French Influbrians and Boians, which Boians under the conduct of Dumnaticus, passed over the river Padus, thus to sollicit and raise the Influbrians. In which conflict were slain ten thousand enemies. About the same time his Colleague in government, M. Perrinius Cato, triumphed over Spain. In this triumph he carried in pomp and show 25060 pound weight of silver in bullion, and in coin 153000 Biga pieces of Ocean silver 540 pound weight, and of gold 40000 pound weight.

B the booty won from the enemies he dealt among his foudliers that were footmen 270 ailes, and tremble so much to every man of them.

T. Sempronius the Consul having put himself in his journey toward his Province, led first his legions into the Boian country, both at that time their Prince with his two brethren, having raised the whole nation to rebellion, encamped in certain commodious places, as it appeared that if the enemy entered their confines, they were ready to give him battle. The Consul perceiving how strong and confident the enemies were, dispatched a courier to his Colleague, to make haste if he thought good and come unto him: for until his coming he would fall off, seem to retire and not fight. But the same cause that moved the Consul to stay, gave occasion to the Gauls to make more haste: for besides that the delaying & lingering of the Consul encouraged the enemies, they were desirous to have the trial of a battell before the forces of both Consuls were joined together. Howbeit, for two dases space they did nothing but stand ready ranged for fight, if any should come forth to brave and dare them. On the third day they approached the trench and rampier of the Consul's Camp, and on every side at once gave the alman. The Consul immediately commanded the foudliers to arm, and when they were armed, he kept them in while, with intent to encrease the foolish confidence in the enemies, and to dispose of his own forces, and give direction, what companies should fall out at every gate. The two legions he commanded to issue forth under their colours: at the two first gates called Principates: but in the very passage without the Gauls stood thick and made head again, so that the way was flopp'd up. A long time they fought in those fight, and they belittled themselves no more.

D with their hands and fwords, than they prefled one upon another with their bodies and targets; whiles the Romans thrust to advance their enigns out of the gates, and the Gauls endeavoured no less, either to enter themselves within the camp, or else to impeach the Romans going forth. But in this conflict there was nothing between them either won or lost, no ground gained the one of the other, before that Q. Valerius a principal Centurion of the Pilum in the second legion, and C. Atinius, a Tribune or Marshall of the fourth, caught the banners from the enign-bearers (a thing often praftised in time of extremity) and thum them among the enemies. For whiles thelaboured and strained themselves to recover each one a banner, they of the second legions first brake through and got forth of the gate: so as now, they maintained skirmish without the trench, and the fourth the best still in the gap. By which time there profe another tumult and noise in the contrary side of the camp: for the Gauls were broken at the Quartors gate (or the gate against the Quartors) and thin hole that valiantly made head and held them play; to wit, Lucius Poppiminius a treaty forenamed Tyrannus, Marcus Atinius and Publius Sempronius two Colonels of the allies, and well near two hundred foudliers besides. Thus the camp on that part was won, until such time as one extraordinary cohort was sent from the Consul to defend the Quartors gate aforesaid: which either flew that hole that were within the rampier, or else drive them forth, and so withlood those that would have rush'd in. And much about this time the fourth legions also with two extraordinary squadrons brake forth at the gate. Thus at once there were three several battells in sundry places about the camp: and the dilomat crying and noises (according to the divers occasion of every party minisht by their fellows) turned and withdrew the minds and spirers of those that were in fight, from the present skirmish before them. In this manner maintained they the fight till noon: equally matcht in strength and number, and little or no odds between them for hope of victory: but redions travel and extremity of heat compelled the Gauls (whose bodies are hot and open, and soon running to sweat, and of all other things can leave away with their) to abandon the battell: and those few that remained behind, the Romans ran upon, ruffled their colours, and chafed them into their own field. Then the Consul sounded the retreat, at which signall given the most part retired themselves: but a few of them, upon a hot desire of fight, and good hope to be Masters of their camp persisted still close to their trench, The Gauls disdaining their small number issued all forth out of their Camp: and then the Romans being discomfited, were glad now of themselves for fear and flight to edge into the strength of their own bold, which they would not retire into at the commandment of the Consul. Thus on both sides there was one while victory, and another while fearfull flight: bowseit, when all cards were told and the reckoning made, the Gauls had the worst of the game: for of them were lain eleven thousand, whereas of Romans there died but five thousand. Then the Gauls retired themselves into the most inward parts of their country, and the Consul marched with his legions to Placentia. Some write, that Scipio and his Colleague with their this joint forces, invaded and spoiled the countries of the Boians and Ligurians, so far forth as they could pass for woods and bogs; others again record, that he having done no memorable exploit at all, returned to Rome about the assembly for election of Consuls.

The same year T. Quinctius spent the whole winter season at Elatia (whither he had retired his forces for winter harbour) in hearing men's caues and ministring justice to every one; also in reforming and redressing all such disorders as had palsied in the States and Cities, through the licentious government and jurisdiction either of Philip himself or his Captains, while he advanced those favourite of his own faction, and put down the right and liberty of others. In the beginning of the spring he came to Corsiæ, where he had given summons, that there should be held a general Diet of the State. There in the assembly of all the Embassadors and agents from the Cities, gathered about him as if there were to hear an Oration, he made a speech unto them: beginning I first, with the amnesty contrived between the Romans and Greeks: and proceeding to the acts achieved in Spain by the Generals afore him, and those also of his own, all that he spake was heard and received with great applause, until he touched the point concerning Nabæs: for it was generally thought uniting, that he undertaking to fet all Greeks at liberty, had left a tyrant (not only a grievous oppressor of his own subjects, but also dangerous to all the Cities about him,) to remain till as a fearful malady settled in the very bowels and heart of a most noble and renowned State. Quinctius, not ignorant of their affections and dispositions, confuted, that he should not indeed have any ear at all to the motion or mention of peace with the tyrant, in case that Lacedæmon might have flood in safety without so doing: but now since that Nabæs might not possibly be confounded and overthrown, without the present ruin and fearful downfall of the City, he thought it a better course in policy to leave the tyrant enfeebled and disannihilated of all means to offend and hurt any man, than to suffer to goody a City to die in the cure, and under the hand as it were of the Physician, anidio the quick and sharp remedies which it was never able to endure: and so as to recover liberty, and persever in their liberty until ten days they should hear news how all the garrisons had quitted Demetrius and Chæcias: and that he would deliver out of hand unto the Achæans in their very right, the territories of Corses: that all the world may know, whether it be the Romans guile or the faction of the Eroians, to over-reach and lie: who, in their common talk have not let it discomme, to low murmurs, and to buzz into mens heads that it was danger for Greeks, to put their liberty into the hands of & that they had made an exchange of their lordly rights, admiring the Romans in lieu of the Macedonian: But as for them (quoth he) their tongues is no fonder of being such persons as never took heed and made regard what either they did or said. But the other Cities he advertiseth to weigh their friends by deeds and not by words, to be wise and well advised whom they are to truff, and whom they are to beware of, to muse their liberty in measure and moderation; which if it be well tempered and qualified, is good and wholesome to particular persons and general States: but exceeding if it be, it would not only be grievous and unsupported to others, but also unruly, and pernicious to themselves that have it. He gave them counsell, that the Princes and States in each City should maintain concord not only among themselves, but also with all other in one common munificence: for so long as they accord and agree together, no king nor tyrant should be strong enough for them: whereas discord and sedition maketh overture and openen ease way to enemies that lie in wait for the vantage: considering that the side which in civil contention is the weaker and goeth to the wall, will band rather with a forrainer, than give place and slop to a Citizen. In Conclusion, he advised them, to keep and preserve by their careful regard, this their liberty put, hated for them by foreign forces, and delivered unto them with faithfull security of strangers and aliens; that the people of Rome might see, that they have given freedom to well deserving people: and this their great benefit hath been well bestowed upon worthy persons. While they hearkned to these sage admonitions as uttered out of the mouth of a very father, the tears gushed plentifully out of their eyes for kind heart and joy: insomuch as they troubled him in the delivery of the rest of his speech. For a while there was a plentiful noise heard among them as they approved his words, and advised one another to ponder these sage sayings, and to impressed them deeply in their hearts, proceeding as it were from divine oracle. After silence made, he requested them to seek up all those Roman Citizens (if haply there were any) who lived in fervitude and slavery among them, and within two months to lend them unto him into Thessaly: for it were a great ignominy and shame even for them, that in their countries there should remain in bondage any of those, by whose means themselves they were fet free and delivered out of bondage. With that, they all cried aloud with one voice, That for this above all the rest they rendered thanks unto him, in that they were admonished and warned by him, to perform their devoir and duty, and honest to religions, and to necessary. Now a mighty number there was of captives in the Punic war, such as Arminæus (when their friends redeemed them not by ransom) had fold in open market. And how great the multitude of them was, this may prove and tell which Polybius writeth to wit, that this sent the Achaæans for their part one hundred talents: and yet they ordained and set down, that there should but 500 Demæis be repaid unto their Masters for the redemption of every poll: but by this account Achaæans had 1200 of them. And now unto them as many as all Greece was like to have by that proportion and see what number may arise.
The assembly was not broken up and dismissed, before they might see the garrison defending from the fortress of Corinthus, who marched directly to the gate and went their waives. The General presently followed after, and being accompanied with them all, who called him with a loud voice, Their Savities and Redeemers: he took his leave and bad them farewell: and so returned the same way he came to Epirus. From thence he sent his Lieutenant Ap, Claudius with all the forces, commanding him to conduct the army to Oretum by the way of Thessalia and Epirus, and there to expect and wait his coming: for he purposed there to take Sea and set over his army into Italy. He wrote also to L. Quinctius his brother and Lieutenant and Admiral likewise of the fleet, to gather all the ships of burden from along the Sea coast of Greece into that place. Himself went to Chalcis, and having withdrawn the garrisons not only from thence but also from Oretum and Eretria, he held a general Conclave: there of all the cities of Euboea: and after he had made remonstrance unto them in what case he found them, and in what estate he left them, he dismissed the assembly. From thence he departed to Demetrius, where also he removed the garrison, and being attended with a train of all the citizens, like as at Corinthus and Chalce before, he took his journey into Thessalia: where the cities were not only to be set free, but also to be reformed, and from a general disorder and confusion wherein they stood, to be reduced and framed into some tolerable order and form of government. For they were not only tainted and infected with the corruption of the times, and the violent current of licentious outrage, which had taken head under the government of the King; but also of an inbred troublesome spirit and humor of their own, whereby, since their first beginning and uprising, even unto our days they never held Parliaments, Elections, Diets, Councils or any other assemblies whatsoever, without much trouble and sedition. He chose the Senate and Judges there in regard especially of their wealth, and in all cities he made that part more mighty unto which it was more expedient and beneficial to have all quiet and in peace. Thus having visited Thessalia, and taken a general review thereof, he came by the way of Epirus to Oretum, from whence he minded to cross the seas. From Oretum all his forces were transported to Brundusium, and so they passed forward throughout Italy to the City of Rome, in manner of triumph, sending before them as great a train of prizes by them taken, as they made themselves in their march. After they were come to Rome, the Senate assembled without the City for Quinctius, where he had audience to declare and discourse of his worthy exploits: and willing they were to grant him triumph, according to his deserts. Three days together he rode in triumph. The first day he made a show of all the armours as well defensive as offensive, also of brazen and marble images, of which he had taken more from King Philip than he found in the fagade of the cities. The second day there was carried in pomp, the gold and silver both unwrought and wrought into plate, vessels, and cut into coin. Of silver unwrought there was 18,000 pound weight: of wrought, 270 pound weight. Many vessels of plate of all sorts, and most engraven, some of curious and exquisit workmanship. Likewise brazen vessels cunningly and artificially made: and besides ten shields of silver, and in coin eighty four thousand Attick pieces of silver, which they call Tetradracmas, weighing almost four Roman deniers apiece: of gold there was three thousand seven hundred and fourteen pound weight, and one shield full and whole of beaten gold: and of Philip golden pieces in coin, fourteen thousand five hundred and fourteen. The third day were born in view for a pageant, a hundred and fourteen coronets of gold, which were the presents of Cities given unto him. Moreover there were led that day the beasts for sacrifice: and before his chariot went many noble prisoners and hostages, and among them, Demetrius, King Philip his son, and Arocrates the son of Nabis the tyrant, a Lacedaemonian born. Then rode Quinctius himself in a chariot into the City, and a great number of soldiaries followed after, because that his whole army was retired with him out of his province. To every footman he gave two hundred and fifty Atties, duple as much to a centurion, and triple to an officer. Those who were redeemed out of captivity, followed his chariot with their heads shaved, and much beautified the glory of the triumph.

In the end of this year, Q. Elia Tubero a Tribun of the Commons, presented a request or bill unto the people, and they granted and enabled it, to wit, that two Colonies of Latins should be conducted, one into the Britains country, and the other into the territory of Thurium. For the conduct and planting whereof, there were ordained three Deputies called Triumvirs, whose common commission was in force for three years, namely, Q. Nepius, M. Minutius Rufus, and M. Furius Graffius: for the Britains: and for Thurium, A. M. Milus, P. Eliaus, and L. Apollius. For the chusing of these officers, Cn. Domitius the Pretor in the City, called two several assemblies in the Capitol. In that year were certain Temples dedicated one of Isis Sabina in the herb-market, which had been vowed and set out to building four years before, by C. Cornilius the Consul, during the war with the French, and he in his Centuriae dedicated it. Another Temple of Fortuna: the Edities C. Serhonius and Cn. Domitius, had likewise bargained for the building: thereof two years before, and laid by the money therefore: and this Cn. Domitius being now Pretor of the City dedicated it. Also Q. Minutius Rulla, dedicated a Temple to Fortuna Prima genitus upon the hill Quirinalis, having been created Dumniris himself: for that purpose. Sperpusius Sabinus had vowed the same ten years before, in the time of the Punick war, and agreed for a certain price to have it built, also C. Serhonius the other Dumniris consecrated the Temple of Jupiter within the island. Vowed it was six years before in the Gauls war by L. Furius Purpurio Pretor, and by him afterwards (when he was Consul) order was given for the edifying thereof. And there were the affairs which passed that year.
P. Scipio returned out of his Province and government of Gaul for the election of new Consuls, and to that purpose was the general assembly summoned; wherein were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minucius Thermus. The next morrow after were created Pretors, L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Furius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Meleagris, L. Porcinius Licinianus, and C. Flaminius, C. Aurinius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo. Ediles of the chair, were the first that exhibited the State-plaies called Magnaedia. And the Roman plaies or games represented and set out by theseEdiles, the Senate now hir and never before beheld apart from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministered much talk; whiles some gave their opinion and said, That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long ago was due; others again confir'd thus, and gave out, That whatever was added to the Majesty of the Senators and Nobles, was derogatory from the dignity of the people: and that all such kind of distinctions, whereby estates and degrees are severed one from another, are prejudicial as well to common peace as public liberty. For these five hundred and eighty years they, these plaies and games have been beheld and looked upon in common, without any such precise difference. What new accident is indubitably befalln, why the Nobles should not will to let the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should disdain his poor neighbour to fit by him? This is a new appetite and strange longing of theirs indeed, full of pride and arrogancy, a thing never desired not taken up and practised by the Senat of any nation whatsoever. So as in the end even Africanus behaved himself (men say) and repented thereof, for that he in his Consulship moved and perfwaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked of. And men are ever more willing to keep them to ancient customes, unless they be such, as practicable and experience do evidently check and condemn.

In the beginning of the year, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minucius were Consuls, news came to thick of many earth-quakes, that men were not only weary of the thing it fell, but also of the holy-days and solemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Consuls could not intend either to assemble the Senate and sit in Council, or manage the affairs of the Common-weal, for being wholly employed about sacrifying and appeasing the wrath of the gods. In conclusion, the Decemvirs were commanded to peruse the books of Sybiles, and according to their answe and direction, a procession and supplication was for three days solemnized. And before the Altars and thrones of the gods and goddesses, they made their praiers with garlands and corones on their heads; yea, and commandment was given, that every house-hold and family by it self should fall to their praiers and devotions. Alfo the Consuls by order from the Senate made proclamation, That upon what day a fall or solemnity was ordained by occasion of one earthquake, no man the same day should bring news of another. Then the Consuls call'd for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretors did the like. Unto Cornelius befell Carthage, and to Minucius the Ligurians; C. Sempronius had the charge of the civil jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the foreign; L. Cornelius governed Sicily, L. Porcinius Sardinia, C. Flaminius high Spain; and L. Furius the lower. The Consuls look'd for no war that year: but even then at that instant were letters brought from M. Cicerus, Lord President of the Palaest, which gave notice, that twenty thousand Ligurians were up in arms, having conspired together in all market Towns and places of refor throughout the whole of the nation, and that they had already laid hold on the territory of Utica, and having invaded and pill'd through the Tifan Land, had over-run also the Sea coasts. Wherefore Minucius the Consul, unto whom the government of Liguria was allotted, by the advice of the LL. of the Senate mov'd up into the pulpit Rhetor, and published an Act: That those two legions of Roman citizen-s, which the former year had been enrolled, should within ten days present themselves at Ariminum, in lieu whereof he would levy two other legions out of the City. Also he commanded the allies and Magistrates of the Latian nation, and their Embassadors, who oved knight-service and were bound to find foulers to come before him into the Capitol. And from among them he enrolled fifteen thousand four and five hundred horse, according to the number of young and vigorous men that were to be found in each State: which done, he commanded them forthw, to go directly from the Capitol to the gate of the City, and presently to take matters that all might be done with greater expedition. Unf Palaest and Flaminium were appointed three thousand Roman footmen and two hundred horsemen in separate, for to supply and strengthen their forces; also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latin nation, with two hundred horse. Moreover the Pretors were charg'd to dismis and call the old foulers, so soon as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when all the foulers that were enrolled in the City-legions, retired thence into the Tribuns of the Commons, that they should take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warlike, for that they either had serv'd out their full time by law appointed or were sickly and disabled: behold the letters of Sempronius dashed all this, and Cee'd every difficulty and scrupulosity: wherein it was written, that fifteen thousand Ligurians were entred the territory of Palaestinum, and had made great wall and liggace therein putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as far as to the very walls of the Colony it fell, and the banks of Pardus. Also that the nation of the Boii made contingency and gave in ipides of rebellion. In which regards being there was a tumultuous and indi- dance toward, the Senat pass'd a decree, wherein they signifi'd that it was not their pleasure that the Tribuns should accept any excuses pretended by the foulers, but that they should all meet meet and assemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latin nation, who had served in the armies of T. Cornelius and T. Sempronius, and were discharged from soldiery by them being Consuls, should now be ready to flew themselves, against that day which L. Cornelius the Consul should appoint, and at what place before of Hirtius he should command by way of proclamation: Also that the said L. Cornelius the Consul in his march and journey toward the Province, might take up, enrol, and arm, what soldiers he thought good, out of all the burthongs and villages in his way, and have them with him whither forever he would, yea, and have commission to dismiss whom of them he thought good; and when forever he listed at his good pleasure.

After that the Consuls had taken matters, and were gone into their Provinces, then T. Quinctius demanded to have a day of audience in the Senate concerning those affairs that he had concluded with the adherence of the ten Delegates above said: and that it would please them to confirm and establish the same by virtue of their affent and authority. Which they might do with more ease, in case they would hear the Embassadors themselves speak, who were come out of all Greece, a great part of Asia, and from the Kings. Thesee embassadors were admitted into the Senate by C. Serbonius the Pretor for the City, and all dispatched with a gracious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus required long time of debate, therefore it was referred and put over to the ten Delegates, of whom some had been in Asia, or at Lysimachus with the King. And Quintius was commanded, that together with those said Delegates he should hear what the King his Embassadors could lay, and return unto them with an answer, as might hand with the honor and welfare of the people of Rome. The chief of this Embassador from the King were Memnon and Heracleane. Then Memnon began and said, 'That he knew no such perplexed difficulty in their embassies, considering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contrac a league and adherence. For, faith he, there are three sorts of confederacies and alliances, whereby States and Kingdoms ordinarily conclude league and amity one with another. The first, when they that are vanquished in war, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yielded into the hands of him that is the mightier and more putative, then is it in his power and at his discretion and will, to give unto the conquered party what he list, or to take from him as he pleaseth. The second, is when they that are equal in warlike forces give over on even hand, and are content to make peace and amity upon indifferent and equal conditions, one with the other.

In which case, demand and claim is made, restitution and amends performed according to the accord and agreement: and in time of the wars, any have been molested and troubled in their possession, they fail to composition either by the form and tenor of ancient law, or by agreement to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meet and concur together about concluding some friendship, by way of solemn alliance and society: who neither give nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerors, and those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is comprised in this last kind, I marvel not, (for he) that the Romans should think or say, It is reasonable to tender articles unto him, or to provoke and let down, what Cities of Asia they would have to be free and exempt, and which would have to be tributary: and into what Cities they would expressly forbid the King his garrisons, or the King himself to enter and set foot. For in this wise ought they to make peace with Philip, their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amity and alliance with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this Oration Quintius shewed his answer in this fort, 'Forasmuch as it pleaseth you to make your speech thus distinctly by way of division and severally to rehearse all kinds of confederacies and alliances, I also will set down as methodically in order two conditions without which you may let the King your master to understand, that he must not look to entertain any friendship with the people of Rome. The one is this, that he must not use us to intermeddle with the Cities of Asia: the likewise he himself hath no ting to do with all Europe. The other, that he cannot contain himself within the compass of Asia; but will needs encroach upon it the Romans likewise may have liberty and power both to maintain their amities which they have already, and also to entertain new with the States of Asia.

Afr. Hereat Heracleane interred and said, 'That this was an indignity intolerable and which he could not abide to hear, namely that Antiochus should be diffizled of those Cities of Thrace and Cimmerus, which Seleucus his great-grand father had conquered with singular honor from King Lysimachus, whom he vanquished in war and flew in field, and let the fame in him as in his right inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Antiochus himself with as great praise and glory hath partly by force of arms regained out of their hands and partly repeople with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and desolate, and namely, Lysimachus it itself as all the world testeth: and more than that, hath re-edified to his exceeding charge and expense, those that lay along in their ruins, and were consumed with fire.

What likens then is there between these two demands: namely that Antiochus should quit the possession of that which either he acquired or recovered in that fort : and that the Romans should obtain and forbear Asia, which never appertained unto them? To conclude, Antiochus (faith he) is deformed of the Roman friendship, but in such terms as may hand with his honor: and not purchase his immi flame and reproach. Then Quintius rejoyned again in this manner: 'Forasmuch as ye, we balance and weigh things according to honesty: as in truth it is bettling the chief and principal rate of the world, and to great and mighty a King to prize that only or at

A diquiet and trouble the state of the City. There is a stranger, say they, one Aristotle a Tyrian, hither come with instructions from Antiochus and King Antiochus; certain men there are, that daily have privy conference with him, and devise in secret of that, which anon will break out to the utter ruin and overthrow of all. Whereupon they all cried with one voice to convene Aristotle peculiarly before them, and to examine him about what business he was thither arrived and now he would betray & declare the matter, to lend him with Embassadors of purpose, to Rome: For why? we have (say they) left the heart enough, and paid sufficiently for the silly and rash head of one harebrained man already. Let private persons bear their own load hereafter, and at their own peril commit a trepail: provided always that the Common-wealth be preferred clear not only from all affairs, but also from all appearance and built of any such intent. Aristotle being called before them, found fully upon his integrity and excused himself: and evermore used this for his belt and shield defence. That he had brought no letters at all to any person: howbeit he could not render a ready & found reason of his coming thither: but especially he was thither troubled and put to his wits when they charged him, That he had talk and communication with those only of the Barcian faction. Hereupon rose some debate and altercation in the house: whereof some were of opinion that he should be apprehended for a spy, and clapped up in ward: others again were of mind that there was no cause to make such a stir and tumult for: it was an evil precedent to be given, that strangers coming to their City, should be troubled and hardly intended; and the like measure no doubt would be offer'd to the Carthaginians in Tyre & in other Towns of commerce, whereunto to they were to have resort for exchange and trafficke. So that day the matter was put off. Aristotle framing him self to play the crafty Carthagian among the Carthaginians, wrote a certain bill, and in the hearing of the day, hung it up in the most conspicuous and publick place of all the City, even over the door where the head Magistrate useth daily to sit. And himself about the third watch got to fullboard and escaped. The morrow after, when the Soviets were in their benches to ministe the law, the bill aforesaid was seen, taken down, and read: wherein to this effect was written That Aristotle was not come with a message to any person in particular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in general: for so they call the Senate. After that the thing was by this means made a publick matter, and the whole state of the Senators reputed culpable, they were not to esteem or extend into private persons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Rome to give information hereunto to the Consuls and the Senate, and withal, to make complaint of certain wrongs done by Massafrica.

D. Massafrica understanding that the Carthaginians were suspected and in some ill name among the Romans, and alio at large and variance within themselves; and namely, that the great and principal men were had in jealousy by the Senate for their conferences with Aristotle; and their Senate likewise suspected by the people, by reason of that writing above-named of the said Aristotle, taking this for a good advantage and opportunity to do them some injury, not only invaded their maritime parts and made spoil, but also forced certain tributary Cities to the Carthaginians for to pay him himself tribute. That quarter of the country they call Emporia. It is the sea coast of the latter Syrie, and the country is exceeding fertile: there is in it one only City named Ephas, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute, a talent every day. All this region Massafrica then had plighted love, and for one part thereof he made some claim, as being injustices which pertained to his Kingdom or the Seigniory of the Carthaginians; and because he knew for truth, that the Carthaginian Embassadors were about to go to Rome as well to purge themselves of some crimes wherein they were charged, as to complain of him; therefore himself also addressed his Embassadors to Rome, who should lay open more matter against them of deeper suspicion, and debate withal as touching the right of those tributes. The Carthaginians were no sooner heard speak concerning that Tyrian stranger but the LL of the Senate grew into some doubt lest they should wage war with Antiochus and the Carthaginians both together. And this pretension of all the rest made the suspicion most pregnant, because when they had the party among them, and were purposed to send him to Rome, they neither made the man himself intreat nor the bark wherein he arrived. After this, they fell to debate and argue with the Kings Embassadors, about the territory and land in controversy. The Carthaginians pleased for themselves, and flood much upon their bounds and limits, for that the land in suit lay within that precinct by which P. Scipio the Conqueror limited off that territory which pertained to the seigniory of the Carthaginians. Also they alleged the condition of the King himself, who at what time as he purposed Africoth, that fled out of his own realm, and with a company of Numidians ranged abroad about Oryene, made request unto them, to give him leave to pass through this very ground, as if (without all question) it belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians answered again to these points & laid plainly to their faces, that they lied in their threats, as touching that supposed limitation and bounding by Scipio; and moreover, if we would go (say they) and search the very original indeed of the law, what land at all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meet strangers, they had after much praier and entreaty, as much ground allowed them and no more, to build them a City in as they could compass with thongs cut out of one bull hide. And look whatsoever, they had encroached upon without that nett and leash of theirs in Byptus they got and held it by force and violence. And as for the land now in suit, they are not able to prove, that they always held the same in possession, nor that they kept it any long time together. But as occasion and opportunities served of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian...

Publius Scipio Africanus being sent Embassador unto Antiochus, talked at Ephebus with Annibal (who had sided with Antiochus) to this end, that he might rid him of that fear which he had conceived of the people of Rome, at touching the taking away of his life. Among other matters passed between them, came the command of Annibal, whom he judged also to be the noblest and greatest warrior of that very age, so that it was Alexander King of the Macedonians, for that he had a small power defended as did a defeated and an infinite number of armed, and within, passed through the seas for distant and remote parts of the world unto which a man would not believe: that it were possible for any person to go and see them. Then he asked of him whom he deemed for the second: Who, but Pyrrhus (quoth he) because he taught the manner how to pitch a camp and besides the man had the skill to gain places and hold the forces of any enemy that could set his corps as guard or plant garrisons better than he. And when he proceeded thus to know whom he took to be the third, Annibal named his own good self. At which answer Scipio said laughing: And what would you have said then (quoth he) if your hap had been to have vanquished me? Merry then (quoth he) I would have set my self before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other. Among other predictions also, whereof there were reported very many, it is said that in the year wherein Caesarius was Consul, once spoke, and said these words: Rome, look to thy self. The Romans prepared war with Antiochus, Nabis the tyrant of the Lydians, provoked by the Aetolians, who solicited both Philip and also Antiochus to wage war against the people of Rome, resolved from the Romans and after he had raised war against Philip, and as the Aetolians was by the river Styx fled. The Aetolians likewise abandoned the friendship of the people of Rome with whom Antiochus King of Syria bivarded: who warred upon Greece, and surprised manyCities and named, Chalcis and Ephesus among the rest. Besides, this book contained the martial affairs in Liguria, and the preparation of Antiochus for the war.

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

In the beginning of that year wherein their affairs thus passed, Sextus, Dictius Pretor in high Spain, fought battles (rather ordinary, and for number many than other wise memorable and worth the speaking) against those States, whereof the departure of Cato a great fort had rebelled. And those battles for the part were so confounded, that hardly he could deliver up to his master the one half of those soldiers which he had received. And doublest all Spain would have taken here again, if the other Pretor P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cornelius, had not sped better in many of his conflicts beyond Iberus. Upon which account no fewer than fifty good Towns revolted unto him, and these exploits performed Scipio as Pretor, who also in quality of Proconsul, encountered the Lusitans upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with a mighty great booty taken out of the base Spain, which they had utterly pill’d and spoileth: where O. fought from the third hour of the day into the eight, with doubtful evert, for number of soldiers he was inferior to his enemies, but for all things else he had the vantage, and went beyond them. For his battalions were well appointed and close composed of a med men and so he charged upon the enemies marching in a long train, and the same encumbered with a deal of cattle besides his soldiers were fresh in heart, whereas the other were wearied with long travel.

The fifth and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Ai vel. For the enemies set forth at the third watch, and besides their night journey, they had marched three hours also of the day, and without any repose or rest at all, they came to a conflict presently upon their travel on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battle, so long as they were in any heart, and their strength served, they troubled and disordered the Romans with the first charge they gave, but afterwards for a while they came to be equal in fight, In which hazard of donnbrifie the Prepostor vowed to set forth certain solemn games to the honour of Jupiter, in case he might discojnt the enemies, and kill them in chafe. At the length the Romans advanced forward more hotly, and the Ligurians retreated, yes, and anon turned their backs quite. And when as in this train of victory the Romans purifhed them hard in the rout, there were of the enemies slain upon 10,000; 500 and forty taken prisoners, all in manner horsemen; and of military ensigns they carried away one hundred hundred and four. Of the Roman army less envy and three only were left. This battle was fought not far from the City Hip. And thither brought P. Cornuctius his victorious army, enriched with prey and pillage, Which was laid all abroad before the Town, and every man had leave given to challenge and claim his own. All the rest was given to the Treasurier to be sold and the mony raied thereof, was parted among the soldiers.

Now had not C. Flaminius the Pretor as yet taken his leave of Rome, when these things fell out in Spain, and therefore both he and his friends talked and discoursed much upon these occurrences both good and bad; and forasmuch as a great war in his Province was broken out to a light fire, and himself was to receive from Sext. Dizius, but a small remnant of an army, and the same timorous and full of fright as not well recovered of their former flight, he had affixed to bring about, that the Senate would assign unto him one of the City-legions; to the end that when he had joined thereto those foulciders which himself had enrolled according to an order set down by the Senate, he might out of all that number chafe forth six thousand and five hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. With which legion (for in the army of Sext. Dizius he repose small confidence) he minded to make war. The ancient Senators denied and said, That acts of the Senate were not to be made upon every flying tale and report for abroad and blaming by some particular persons in favor of Magistrates. Neither would they hold any thing for certain, but that which the other Pretors themselves wrote out of the Provinces, or Embassadors sent of purposes related. And if there were any such commotion and trouble in Spain, they were of advice that the Pretor should levy in iay without Italy, such tumultuary foulciders, as in that case were usually taken up.

The intent and mind of the Senate was, that foulciders should in that fort be prefix out in Spain. Valerius Antonius write that C. Flaminius both sailed into Sicily to levy and mutter men, and also as he made sail from Sicily toward Spain, was by wind and temper put with the house or Africa, where he found certain foulciders disperst over the country, remaining of the army of P. Africannus of whom he took a military oath to serve him in his wars: and that to the leaves sailed in two Provinces, he joyed also a third in Spain.

The war of the Ligurians likewise grew as fits: for they had already besieged and invested Pisa with forty thousand men: and thither retired and fledgleyed daily unto them great multitudes as well for hope of pillage as upon the brute and rumor that went of the war. Musonius the Consul came at the day appointed to Aquintum, which was the Readiness where he had commanded all his foulciders to meet him from whence he marched with a thousand. Battailion toward Pisa, and (as it is said) had removed but a small mile from the City on the other side of the River, the Consul entered the Town which no doubt by his coming he preferred. The next day himself also encamped on the other side of the River, almost half a mile from the sea-shore, from which place he made light skirmishes with them and saved the territorty of his army from the excursions and robberies of the enemies. He durst not as yet try a battail in pitched field, as having but raw and new foulciders, and those gathered out of many kinds of men and not to well known among themselves, that one might fiercely trust another. The Ligurians bearing themselves bold of their numbers, not only came forth into the field ready to bid battail, and hazard all upon a throw but having multitudes at commandement and to spare, sent out into all parts sundry Companys to poinp and salie booties as far as to the marches and frontiers of the country. And when they had gathered together much carrai and great store of pillage, they had a strong place of defence ready at hand, well manned and guarded, by means whereof all was conveyed into their burthens and Towns.

Thus while the Ligurian war was settled about Pisa, the other Consul L. Cornicius Merulc entered with his army by the utmost confines of the Ligurians into the territory of the Boians: where the war was managed far otherwise than with the Ligurians. For the Consul entered the field in battail array, but the enemies fell off and would not fight. In so much as the Romans seeing none to come forth and present themselves, ran abroad into all parts to speed their hands with pillage. And the Boians hoic rather to suffer their goods to be ransackd making no resistance.

War to save the fame with the hazard of a battail. The Consul when he had writ his pleasure and confirmed all with fire and sword departed out of the territory of the enemies, and marched toward - Mutala, securely without any regard of hims, as through a receivable country of his friends. The Boii perceiving one that they were gone out of their livings, followed after with great and silent march, seeking some convenient place for to set an ambush. And having in the night passed beyond the Roman camp, they seted themselves of a tree the pasage within a fatheme, through which of necessity the Romans must pass, and there they laid them.
This was not to closely carried; but the Consul had an inking thereof: and therefore whereas his manner was to set out in his march early in the morning, long before day light, now for fear left the darkness of the night should increase the terror of a tumultuous skirmish, he waited for the day. And albeit the sun was up before he removed and left forward, yet he sent out a troop of horsemen to scout and discover the quarters. And after he was advertised by these epilals what number there was of enemies, and in what place they were, he commanded that all the baggege and carriage of the whole army should be bestowed in the mids, and that the Triarii should shake and pale it all about, while he with the rest of his forces marched in order of battail, and approached the enemy. The like also did the French, after they once saw that their ambul and trains were detected, and that they must of necessity fight a let pit hed battail, where down right blows, clean strength, and pure valour, was to carry away the victory. Thus about 1 the second hour of the day they affronted one another. The left wing of the horsemen of the allies and the extraordinaries fought in the vanguard, under the conduct of two Lieutenans that had been Consuls, to wit, M. Marcellus, and T. Sempronius, Consul the year before, the new Consul one while in the front of the battail, another while at the tail to keep in the legions, left for eager desire of fight they should advance forward to the conflict before that the signal was given. As for the men of arms belonging to the legions, he commanded Quintius and P. Minnius, Marhsall or Colonels, to bring them forth, and conduct them without the battail into a large plain, from whence out of the open ground they should on a sudden charge the enemies, when he gave them a signal by found of Trumpet. Thus as he was marshalling and directing his men, there came a messenger from T. Sempronius Longus with a report, that the Iooole Extraordinary K souliards and store were not able to abide the violence of the Gauls; that many of them were slain, and those that remained, partly for want of travail, and partly for leasful cowardice began to quail their heat of fight: and therefore he thought to good, he should send one of the two legions to succour, before they had received further dishonor. Whereupon the second legi on was sent, and the Extraordinary retired themselves out of the battail. Then began the conflict anew, by reason that the souliards came in fresh and in heart, and the legions besides was compleat and fully furnished with all her companies: the left wing of horsemen store was retired out of the battail, and in lieu thereof, the right wing advanced into the fore-front. By this time the sun with extreme scorching heat, rotted and fried the bodies of the Frenchmen, which of all things can least abide heat: howbeit, standing with their ranks thick and close together, one while they L leaned one upon another: other whites they refted and bare themselves upon their targets, and intimated the violence of the Romans. When the Consul perceived, he commanded C. Livius Salinator who had the conduct of the light horse in the wings, to send in the quickest horse in all his company, with his carrier to break their ranks: and gave charge that the legiomy horsem en should abide behind in the rearguard. This tempest and storm of Cavalry firtt shook and put in disorder the battail of the Gauls, and afterwards brake their ranks and files clean, yet not fo, that they turned their backs; for why, their Captains and Leaders would not suffer them, laying about with their truncheons upon the backs of them that fo trembled for fear, and forced them into their ranks: but the light horsemen aforeaid riding among them would not permit them to stand to, and keep their place. The Consul for his part encouraged and exhorted his horsemen to stick to it a while, for the victory was in their hands: and to charge still upon them, so long as they law them disordered and affrighted: for if they suffered their ranks to close again, they should abide another conflict, and the same perhaps doubtful and dangerous. The Ensign-bearers he commanded to advance their banners: and thus at length with putting all their power and good will together, they discomfited the enemy, and put him to flight. After they threwed their backs once and took them to their heels, running away on all sides, then the legionary horsemen were sent out after to follow the chase; fourteen thousand Boians that day were slain, a thousand and nine hundred taken prisoners alive: 221 horsemen, three of their Leaders, and of Ensigns were won 212, and chariots 65. The Romans likewise won not this victory for cooler, but it cost them some blood. For, of their own souliards and allies together, there died above five thousand, N 23 Centurions, besides four Colonels of Allies, and two Marshals of the second legion, to wit, M. Ceminius, and M. Marcellus.

At one and the selfsame time in manner, both the Consuls letters were brought to Rome, Cor nelius his letters touching the battail fought at Mutina with the Boians: but the other of Q. Min nius from Visfe were written to this effect, That whereas by lot it belonged to him to hold the assembly for the election of new Magistrates, yet considering in how doubtful terms of hazard his affairs stood in Liguria that he might not possibly depart from thence without the utter ruin of the allies, and hinderance of the weak publick: therefore if it might seem to good unto the LL of the Senate, he would advise them to lend unto his brother Consul, That he, who had finish'd his war, might return to Rome for to hold the foresaid general assembly for the election: but in case he should think much thereof, because this charge properly appertaineth not to him; he promised them, that himself would do whatsoever the Senate should think good. But he requested them to consider and be well advised, Whether it were not more expedient for the common-weal to proceed rather to an interregno, than that he should leave the Province in that state of jeopardy. The Senat hereupon gave in charge to C. Scribonius to lend two Embassadore both of Senators calling, unto L. Cornelius the Consul, who should carry also with them unto him the the letters of his colleague written and sent unto the Senat: and withal, to let him understand, that unless he would come himself to Rome for the election of new Magistrates to succeed, the Senat would suffer an irregener rather than call away Q. Metellus from the war unfinished, and wherein he was wholly employed. The Embassadors that were sent, brought word back, That L. Cornelius would repair to Rome himself for the clouting of new Magistrates. As touching the letters of L. Cornelius, wherein he gave them to understand, what happy issue & in case he had in the battle with the Boians: there was some reasoning and debate in the Senat-house: for A. Claudius his Lieutenant had written other letters privately to most of the Senators, to this effect; That they were much behelden and bound to give thanks unto the good fortune of the people of Rome, and the valour of the fouldiers, in that they fped so well as they did: for by means of the Con-ful, not only there were a good number of men loit, but also the army of the enemies was escaped out of their hands, when they had fit opportunity presented unto them of a final defeat and overthrow thereof: and that by this occasion there was a greater number of the fouldiers miscarried; for that they who should have been released and incored thofe that were diblifled, came too late out of the regard; and the reason why the enemies got away and escaped was this, because the legionary horifon men had not the signal soon enough founded unto them, and could not possibly purfue them in the chafe. Therefore as concerning that point, they would not determine any thing rashly and hand over head, but the matter was referred and put over to a more frequent assem-ly of Senators.

A greater object there was to trouble their heads; for the City was much oppreffed with milit-ry: and albeit the avarice and covetousnes of men had been well gagged and bridled by many laws concerning uity, yet was a carefons device and shift found out, to avoid all fataces in that behalf: to wit, that all obligations should pass in the names of aleys, and be fealed unto them, who were not tified and bound to obrieve the laws afoireafied. By which means the creditors en-wrapped their debtors in what bonds they lif, and forced them to pay extream intereft as they would themselves, without fitt. For to fee into this disorder and enormity, and to redrefs the fame, it was thought good and order taken, to let down and limit a certain day, namely, upon which the initteres were left refrained. From which day all those allies should come in and de-clare and profefs, what mony they had put forth upon uity to any citizens of Rome; and that the creditor Shay have right to recover those monies put forth from that time, according to fuch conditions as the debtor would himself. Hereupon, after there were discovered great fums of money and debts contracted by this fraudulent practice, M. Semprenius a Tribun of the Commons, by advice of the Senat propounded a law, and the Commons allowed it. That the fame course of putting our money practiced between citizen and citizen of Rome, shou'd likewise be in force am-ong the allies of the Latin Nation. In this fort went matters in Italy, both within the City of Rome and also in the wars abroad.

In Spain the war was nothing fo much as the brait that ran thereof. C. Flamininus in high Spain, namely in a Town in the Orcans countrey: after which he took, he laid up his fouldiers in their winter harbour. And in that time there paffed certain light skirmifhes (not worth the naming) against the excursions of brigands and thieves, I may rather fay, than enemies: and yet the fortune was variable, and not without fome los of men. As for M. Fulsw the great matters: for he fought in a ranged baffail with banner dilated against the Vacingons, the Vediones, and the Celibrians, before the Town Toletum: where he discofemted and put to flight the army of those nations, and took prisoner alive, their King Helianus. While these things thus paffed in Spain; the day drew neer, of the Solemn election of Magis-trats at Rome: and therefore L. Cornelius the Conful having left M. Claudius Lieutenant in the army, came to Rome: who, after he had disconforted in the Senat-house of his own exploits, and in what eftate the province stood, he complained to the LL. of the Senat, that considering to great a war was brought to an end, by one baffail fo fortunately and happily fought, there was no folemnity to the honour of the Gods, performed in that behalf. Over and beides, he demanded, That if they would decree a procession and triumph withal, But before the Senators; were to deliver their opinions to this demand, Q. Metellus, who had been Conul and Dictator, rofe up, and faid, That there had been letters brought at one and the fame time both from the Conul Cornelin to the Senat, and also from M. Marcellus to a great many of the Senators, and those letters improting conftinctions: whereupon the confultation of that matter had been deferred and put off, to the end that it might be argued and debated in the presence of them both, who wrote the letters: and therefore I ever looked (quoth he) that the Conul (knowing especially that his Lieu-tenant had written and informed somewhat against him) and considering that himself was to re-pair to Rome would have brought him also with him: faying that it had been more meet and befiting him to have delivered the army to T. Semprenius, one that was in the commission and had a command than to a Lieutenant. But it should leem now, that he was left behind far enough off of very purpose, for ftre were he would avow and justify personally his fhand-writing, and charge him face to face: and that if the Conul should make report of any untruth, he might be chal-lenged therefore, and the thing lifted and canvased, until the truth appeared clearly and came to light: and therefore my opinion is (quoth he) that nothing be determined at this prefent, as touching the demands of the Conul. But when as he perifhed not withfanding, and followed the hint still, namely, that they would ordain a Solemn procession, and that himself might enter the
the City, riding in triumph. Then Marcus and C. Titius, both Tribunes of the Commons, protected them that would interpose their negative, and cancel the order of the Senat in that behalf.

The Centurion for that time, were Sex. Albus Petrus and C. Corvusius Cathenius, created the year before. Corvusius took a review of the City and numbered the people; and there were accounted by his survey 14,5704 polls of Citizens. Great floods arose that year, and Tyber overflowed all the flats and plain places of the City: and about the gate Fluminentana certain houses and buildings were overflowed withal, and laid along. The gate Calmontana besides, was stricken with lightning, and the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Arcia, Loamnus, and in mount Aventin, it rained stones. And reported it was from Cacus, that a great swarm of Wasps came flying into the market place, and fled upon the Temple of Mars; which being with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterwards consumed with fire. In regard of these prodigions tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the books of syllables; whereupon a novendial sacrifice (to continue nine days) was appointed, a publick procession solemnized, and the City was cleansed and hallowed. About the same time M. Perius Cato, dedicated the Chappel of Virgin Victorius, near to the Temple of the Goddesses Victorius, two years after that he had vowed it. In that year also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Vctus, L. Aelius Fallo, and P. Aelius Tiberius, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colony) had commission granted, to conduct a Colony of Latins into the country of Thurium: and thither went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen: a small number in comparison of the largeness and quantity of the territory. There might well have been set out thirty acres for every footman, and threescore for an horseman: but by the motion and advice of Appius, one K third part of the lands was excepted and reserved, to the end, that afterwards in time, they might enrol new Colonies if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twenty acres, and the horsemen forty acres.

Now approached the end of the year, and more ambition there was, and hotter suit for place of dignity in the election of Consuls, than ever had been known any time before. Many mighty men as well of the persons and nobles as the Commoners, stood and laboured hard for the Confulship, to win. C. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cnemus, who lately was departed out of Spain after he had achieved many worthy deeds, L. Quintius Flaminius who had been Admiral of the navy in Greece, and Cn. Manlius Vctus, all of the Nobility. But of the Commons were Cn. Lulus, Cn. Dominius, Cn. Lucius Salinator, and M. Aelius. But all men eyes were fixed upon Quintius and Cornelius Scipio. For they desired one place, being both of them nobly defended, and their fresh glory for feats of war, recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethren of these competitors, two most renowned warriors of their time, set the debate on a light fire. The glory of Scipio, as it was the greater of the two, so it was more infancy to envy. The honour of Quintius was more fresh, as who that year had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had been now almost ten years continually conversant in the eyes of men (a thing that maketh great men not to be highly regarded, by reason that they are grown stale, and the world is full already of them,) also he had been twice Consul, and Conful once he vanquished Annibal. But in Quintius all was fresh, and new, to win the good grace and favor of men. And more than that he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor to say a truth, requenced any thing. He alleged, that he made suit for his own natural and whole brother by both sides, and not for a Consul German: in the behalf of a very companion and partner with him in the managing of the war (for as himself served by land, so his brother performed many exploits by sea.) So he obtained, that Quintius should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanus and his brother [Africanus] brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelius seemed to countenance even then when a Cn. Cornelius, Consul, was president of the election and held the assembly; whom the Senat had given to grave a testimonio, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the City, and thought most worthy to receive the goddesses dame Idea coming from Pienus to the City of Rome. Thus were L. Quintius, and Cn. Dominius Africanus created Consuls, in such a sort that Africanus was of no credit, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be sure) in the election of a Consul out of the third estate of Commoners, albeit he employed himself, and did his best for C. Lulus. The next day after were the Pretors elected namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Centumola, A. Atilius Serranus, M. Fabius Tampilus, L. Fabius Tappus, and Q. Palinius Sarrus. In this year M. Emilius Lepidus and L. Emilius Paulus, the Consuls, bare themselves so in their offices, as if they had made their year to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned and fined many of the City graters or farmers of the common pastures: and of that money which arose of their amercements, were certain gilded shields made, which were set up on the finial or lantern of Jupiter Temple. They made one terrace or gallery without the gate Trigemin, with a marchants Hall orBurse adjoined thereto, near Tyber: and another from the gate Fontinulae they built in length, as far as to the Nai of Mars, leading to Mars field.

For a long time nothing was done in Liguria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the year twice the Romans in great jeopardy: for both the camp of the Consul was assailed and hardly defended and also not long after, as the Roman host marched through a frightful pass, the army of the Ligurians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Consul seeing he could not make way through, turned his enlings, and began to retire the same way he came: but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the back part of the pass, insomuch as the lamentable
A lamentable remembrance of the Caudine overthrow, not only presented it to their spirit and mind, but also was in manner an object to their eye. Now had he amongst his auxiliary or aid-forces, to the number almost of eight hundred horse. Whole Captain promised the Conful, that he and his would break through whither way he would, let him only but tell him which of the two quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the first thing that he did, he would fire their villages and houses to the end, that the fear and fright thereof might force the Ligureans to depart out of the chaise which they held and belte, and run to succour their own neighbours. The Conful commended him highly, and led him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horseback, and began to ride about the camp; who, indeed, of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the first, a man that had been there, would have thought nothing more contemptible, being both men and horse, little, spare and gaunt. The horseman unarmed and without a weapon, gave that he carri'd about him some light darts: the horses without bridles and as they ran fluttering out their stiff necks, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, made a very ill favoured sight. And the riders, for to make themselves more defied, would on purpose seem to take falls from their horses, and made their enemies good sport. Whereupon they who (of his) at that instant had been affli'd, would have been heedful & ready to have received the charge, now fast fell (many of them unarmed) to behold this pleasant pastime. The Numidians would gallop towards them and presently ride back again; but for as little and little they gained ground, and advanced nearer to the palt, yet making temblance, as if they had no rule of their horses, were carried thither against their wills. At the last they set spurs to their horses indeed, and brake through the midst of the enemies guardando as soon as they had recovered the open ground, they set on fire all the houses near the high way (ide), and so far away they burned the next village they came unto, and delir'd all afore them with fire and sword, Euticus, the man that was delir'd, afterwards the enemy heard of them that were affrighted in the villages and hat of all, the children and old folk that fled to save themselves, made a trouble and hurly-burly in the camp: in such, as much as any man of himself without advice, without warrant or direction, made what halt he could to run and save his own. Thus in the turning of an hand, the camp was abandoned, and the Conful delivered from siege, arrived thither where he intended. But neither Boats nor Spaniards (with whom that year the Romans made war) were to skillfully and maliciously bent against them, as the whole nation of the Eotolians. They at the very first were in very good hope, that presently upon the remove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Greece, and seized upon the vacant possession thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabis would be in reit, and do nothing. But seeing them not to stir in any place, they thought it high time to make some trouble and confusion themselves, for fear lest by delays and lingering, all their dispositions would turn to nothing: and therefore they published a Diet or Council to be held at Nysaenum. In which assembly Thasus their Preor, after he had made grievous complaints of the wrongs received by the Romans, moving and soliciting the state of Asia (for that they of all other nations and Cities of Greece, were least honoured and let by after that victory, whereas they had been the cause) gave his advice, That there should be Embassadors sent to all the neighbour Kings, not only to find out their minds and affections, but also to incite them to certify of the same. Euticus and preck them every one forward to enter into arms against the Romans. So Democritus was despatch'd to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaearchus the brother of the Preor unto Antiochus. Democritus had in commonhip to dignify unto the tyrant of Macedonia, * That by the loss of his maritime Cities, the very fringes and fineways of his tyranny and Kingdom were cut inunder; * From thence he was hurri'd with foiards, from thence had he his ships and sevitors at sea; * Whereas he now, he might see the Achaman LL, and rulers of Ptolomaeus was himself was * Placed up and enclosed within his walls and never should he have opportunity to recover himself, if he let pass this that prefently was offered unto him. No Roman army was now in Greece: * And never would the Romans think it sufficient cause, to pass over the Seas with their legions.* into Greece, for any occasion of Gythium or other Laconians inhabiting the Sea-coasts. These reasons were laid forth to incite the courage of the tyrant, to the end that when Antiochus was once paffed over into Greece, he being touched in confidence, that he had broken the Roman league by committing outrage upon their allies, might of necessity join and band with Antiochus, * Semblable remonstrances and reasons used Nicander for to provoke and persuade Philip; and much more matter he had to enforce that point, as the King was deposed from much higher degree of elate than the tyrant had been, and also had sustained far greater losses. To this he alleged the ancient name and renown of the KK, of Macedon; and how that nation had over-run the whole word and filled all places with their noble conquests & victories. Moreover he said. That he advised him to take a course, which was safe both to be enterprised, and also easy to be executed. For he gave not Philip counsel to stir, before that Antiochus were paffed over with an army into Greece; and considering that he without the aid of Antiochus had maintained war so long against the Romans and Eotolians, what possible means had the Romans to withstand him allied with Antiochus & the Eotolians his allies, who even then were fiercer enemies than the Romans? Over and besides, he interred this reason also, what a brave and doughty Captain Antimachus was, a man even born to be an enemy to the Romans, and who had lain already more leaders and soldiers of theirs, than were left behind. These were the allegations of Nicander to Philip. As for Dicaearchus, he had other motives to perversive with Antiochus, first, and principally pally above all others, he affirmed, "That howsoever the prize and booty of Philip fell to the H Romans, the victory was gained and achieved by the Ætolians, and none but they either gave the Romans entrance and passage into Greece, or furnished them with forces for the per-tormance and accomplishment of the victory. Then he flewed and made promise what power as well of foot as horse they would pretend unto Antiochus toward his wars, what places they would give him for his land-forces, and what havens and harbours for his strength and army at Sea. After all this he fluck not (to serve his own turn) for to over-teach and tell a loud lie as 'touching Philip and Nabas, in giving out confidently that they were both of them ready and at 'the point to renew war: and would take the vantage of the very first opportunity and occasion 'that could be prefixed, to recover those things which by war they had lost. Thus the Ætolians laboured to fet all the world at once upon the top of the Romans. Howbeit, the KK, were either I not moved at all with their solicitings, or beliefed them more flonely than they looked for. But as for Nabas, he bent immediately about all the Towns by the Sea side, certain pears of purpose to few discord and kindle seditions among them: and some of their principal citizens he won by Gifts and presents to his own purpose and designs: but such as finely continued fast and firm in alliance with the Romans, thole he made away and murdered. Now had T.
Quintus given in charge and commissio to the Achizans to fort guard all the Laconians that dwelt upon the Sea-coasts: and therefore presently they both dispatched their Embassadors unto the Tyrants, to put him in mind of the confederacy and association with the Romans, and to warn habit about Selga.

At the same time the Romans Embassadors P. Sulpicius and P. Villius, who as we said before I had been sent unto Antiochus with direction, first to visit X. Eumenes, arrived at "Esopus, and from thence went up to Pergamus, where Eumenes kept his royal court. Eumenes was defirous in his heart that Antiochus should be warred upon: supposing verily, that if he were at peace, being a Prince so much mighty therin himself: he would be but an ill and dangerous neighbour to neer unto him: but if war were one effect that he would be no more able to be heard and match the Ro-manes, then Philip had been: and that either he should wholly be overthrown and come to utter ruin; or if, being vanquished therin he had peace given unto him by the Romans: then, as he left much thereby and would be weaker to himself should gain by the bargain, and grow mightier, that after wards he might be able easily of himself to make his part good, and hold his own against him, without the help and aid of the Romans: or if any misfortune should happen unto him, he were better by far, to hazard any fortune whatsoever in the Roman society, than either alone to endure the Lordly dominion of Antiochus and be subject or in refusing to obey, be compelled thereto by force and arms. For these causes he employed all the credit and authority he had, yeæc addressed all counsel that he could devise for to prink on and set forward the Romans in this war. Sulpicius remained behind sick at Pergamus. But Villius persuaded that the King was occupied and busied in the Pidian war, went to Ephesus: and whereas he abode there some few days, he endeavoured and made means to have conference oftentimes with Annibal, who haply at that time sojourned there, both to found his mind if possibly he could, and also to secure him of all fear from the Romans. In these meetings and communications, no other thing passed nor was done between them, but see what ensued hereupon of it self, as if it had been a thing wrought and compassed of meet pollicy. Annibal by this means was less set by and in smaller credit with the King, yeæc in all matters began to be more and more suspeeted and had in jeoloue, Claudius (the Historian) who followeth the Greek books of Aulius, writeth that P. Africanius was joyned in that embassage, and that he talked and devised with Annibal at Ephesus: and namely, maketh report of one conference and speech between them twain: and that is this. Africanus demanded of Annibal, whom in his judgment, he took to have been the greatestest commander for feats of arms, that ever was:
to which he made answere, that he judged Alexander the King of the Macedonians was simply the most excellent warrior: in this regard, that he with a small power had delected innumerable ar-niest and besides had passed as far to the utmost bounds of the whole earth, even to those lands, that a man would think incredible for any one to reach unto. And when he asked again whom he deemed worthy to stand in the second place he anwetered, that Pyrrhus was the man: for that he first taught how to pitch a camp and above all other points of military skill no man knew better to choose out commodious ground and places of advantage, or more cunningly to plant and ellipogarrison: besides, he had such a sleight and dexterity to draw and win men unto him, that the Italian nations had rather have been subject to him afoie Prince than to live under the people of Rome, notwithstanding they had of long time the Seignory and rule of those parts, And
when he proceeded still to know whom he reputed for the third, he made no kicking at the matter, but named himself. Whereupon Speio took up a laughter and replied again: What would you say then, if your hap had been to have sabbred me? Mary then, quoth he, I would think I were worthy to be set before Alexander before Pyrrhus and ye and before all other martial men and commanders in the whole world. At this answer, Speio took delight and pleasure to see how futilely and cautiously he had like a cunning Carthaginian, couched his words in a certain kind of flattery, as if he had fore Pituated him from out of the range and rank of all other Captains as being by many degrees incomparable, and far above all others. Then Villius went forward from Ephesus to Asepotes and thither Antiochus also repaired forth to meet him, hearing of the coming of Roman legates. In this communication and conference at Asepotes, the matter was debated much after the fame sort, as it had been at Rome between Quintus and the Kings Embassadors. But the news of Antiochus the King on his death, whom I laid a little before, to have been sent into Syria brake off the peace. Great mourning and sorrow there was in the King's Court, and much was that young Prince mislaid and moaned for, that so good proof he had given of himself, that if he had lived any longer, he would have proved by all likelyhood of his towardness, a great, a mighty, and a righteous King. The deeer and better beloved he was of all men, the more fupiticous was his death: and namely, that his father doubting that he would prefereward and be instanced to succeed him in his aged age, took order by the ministerly of certain Eunuchs or gudened men (persons generally accepted with Kings for such services) to have him poisoned. And they say, that another cause also set him forward to commit this ferre act, because having given the City Lyonsachus to his canon Seleucus, he had no such place to bellow upon Antiochus his son, for to keep his residence in, whereunto he might have removed him farther off from his own person, under colour of doing him honor. Howbeit, great resemblance and there was of much mourning and lamentation all over the court for certain days: in whom the Roman Embassador retired himself to Pergamus, because he was both to converse there uncivilly, at to unfaceable a time. The King returned to Ephesus, and gave over the war that he had entred into, Where the countries being filled by occasion of the mourning time, he devised and continued in great lest ret with one Minisc an inward friend unto him, and whom of all other he beloved best, and trusted most. This Minisc a meer strangeu and altogether ignorant in foreign affairs and forces measuring and esteeming the power and greatness of the King by his exploits done in Syria or in Asia, deemed verily, that Antiochus had not only the better cause, that the Romans demanded unreasonal conditions; but also should have the upper hand in the trial thereof by war. When as now the King returned to have any conference and deliberate with the Embassadors, either for that he knew by good experience that it would be bootless for him to do so, because he was troubled in spirit upon this late and fresh object of grief and sorrow: Minisc undertook the business, and professed that he would speak to the point of the matter and to good purpose: and to perused the King to lend for the Embassadors from Pergamus. By this time Sulpisius was recovered of his sickness, and therefore both of them repaired to Ephesus; where Minisc excused the King, and in his absence they began to treat about their affairs, then Minisc with a premeditated action began in this wise, "Tell well (quod, he) that you Romans pretend unto the world a goodly title of getting free the Cities of Greece, but your deeds are not answerable to your words: and ye have set down unto Antiochus one manner of law to be tied unto and profess your selves another. For how cometh it about that the Smyrneans and Lampacens should be Greeks, more than the Neapolitans, the Rheginians and Tarentins, of whom you expropriate and require ship by vertue of the accord and covenants between you? Why dont ye yearly to Syracuse and other Greek Cities of Sicily, a Pretor in foreign authority, with his rods and axes? Certainly, ye have nothing else to say, but that ye have subdued them in war, and by right of conquest have imposed these conditions upon them, The like, ye and the same name I know ye that Antiochus alleged as concerning Smyrna, Lampacens, and other Cities and states of Asia and E. lis. For having been conquered in war by his ancestors and progenitors, having they been made tributary and liable to impositions, he challenged of them the ancient rights and duties due from them, and to him belonging, And therefore ye shall debate and treat the question according to equity and reason and not rather pick quarrels and seek occasions of war, I would gladly know what ye will answer to him in this point?

To this Sulpisius made answer in this wise. "Antiochus (quod, he) hath done very well and with good regard of modesty in that having no other matters to plead unto for his defence and the maintenance of his cause he hath made choice of any other rather than himself to be the speaker. For what one thing is there alike in those cities which you have named and put in compara- tion? Of the Rheginians, Neapolitans and Tarentins, we demand that which is our due according to the deeds of covenants indented, and hath ever been since time that first they were in subje- ction under us; that they which we have challenged and enjoyed by virtue of one continued course and tenor of right, by us ever praeful without any intermission or interruption. And are you able to avouch, that as those nations neither by themselves nor by any other have altered and changed the accord between us and them to the Cities of Asia, when they once became subject to the ancellor of Antiochus, remained always in the perpetual possession of your Kingdom? And not rather that some of them have been under the obeissance of Phlip and others obedient to Ptolemeus? Yeas and divers of them for many years have been free & used their own liberties without contradiction, and no words or doubts made thereof? For admit this once, that..."
that (because their Cities fortnight were in bondage through the iniquity of those times where- H in they were oppressed) there shall be a right pretended, and the same be effectual to reduce them again after so many ages into servitude? What wanteth it but ye may as well lay, that we have done just nothing, in delivering Greece out of the hands of Philip? and that his successors and polkerty, may claim again and lay title to Corinth, Chalcis, Demetrias, and the whole Thesalian nation? But what mean I to maintain the cause of the Cities of Greece, whom it were more meet and reasonable that both we and the King himself would give audience unto, and let them plead what they can for their own selves? With that he commanded the embassages of the Cities to be called in, which were prepared and instructed aforehand by Emmenius, who made this reckoning, that whatsoever strength went from Antiochus, should accrue and come unto him and his Kingdom. Many were admitted to speak: and whilst every one set forward his own cause, I some by way of complaint, others in manner of demand, each one putting in for himself without regard of right or wrong, so he served his own turn, they fell at length from reasoning to wrangling: in so much, as the Embassadors returned to Rome as uncertain and doubtful in all matters as they were when they came, without releasing or obtaining any one thing at all.

When they were dismissed and gone, the King held a Counsel as touching the Roman War. In which assembly, some delivered their opinion more freely and fluently than others: but generally the more bitter speech that any one uded against the Romans, the greater hope he had to enter in to especial grace and favour with the King. One above the rest, inveighed much and spake against those proud and insolent demands of the Romans, who imposed hard laws and conditions upon Antiochus, the mightiest King of all Asia as if he had been no better than Nabu, whom they had conquered and subdued. And yet (faith he) they lett unto Nabu some feignity and dominion in his own country and City of Lamacedamon: whereas if Lambescum and Smyrns should be at the command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignity. Others opened and said, that those two Cities were but small causes, and not worth the naming, for so fallacious a Prince to stand upon and to war for. But always (say they) men begin with just and reasonable demands to make an overture and way to compacts and obtain that which is unjust. Unless one would believe, that when the Persians requested of the Laucedemonians, water and earth, they flood in need of a clot & surf of ground, or a draught of water, in like fort for all the world; the Romans do not find and try the King, in their demands, touching these two Cities. For other Cities likewise, so soon as they shall perceive that those two have shaken off the yoke of obedienc, will soon revolt and turn to that people which is their deliverer, and at whole hands they hope for liberty. And say, that freedom were not to them more dear and precious than bondage yet it is the nature of every man to feed and picke himself with a bare hope of a change; and new world much more than with the attainted hold of any present state whatsoever. There was in place at this council, Alexander of Mæna, one who totime had friended Philip but of late days was far from him and followed the court of Antiochus, a more wealthy and magnificent Prince: and being taken for a politician who had a special insight into the state of Greece & was not ignorant of the affairs of Rome, had wound himself into high favour and inward friend ship with the King, that he was taken in to be one of his privy council, and acquainted with all his secrets. This man, as if the question in hand had been not, Whether war should be levied or no; but, Where, and by What means and How it should be managed, spake aloud & said, "That he made full reckoning and account in his very spirit and heart of the victory, in case the King would pass the Seas over into Europe, to plant & settle himself in some part of Greece, and there wage war; for at his very first coming he should see in arms already the Athenians, that inhabit the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only Captains and port-ennegins to match it before them, ready to venture and enter upon the most difficult and dangerous enterprises of war. Again, in the two cantons and angles as it were thereof, he should find Nabu of the one side from Peloponnesus, at hand to rise and raise those quarters, with intent to regain the City of the Attiges to win again the maritime Cities, which the Romans have disfrized & dispossessed of, and have minged and shut him within the walls of Lamacedamon. On the other side from Macedonia, Philip would no doubt take arms, so soon as he shall hear the first alarm and found of trumpet, Full well (ed he) know I his courage, and of what spirit and flamack he is might & I wot not that he hath folled in that breath of his a long time, anger and dispute like to those wild savage beasts which either are kept within iron gates or full tayed and bound: and as well I remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the Gods, to touch for to give him Antiochus for his helper and assistent; and if now he might enjoy his wish, and have the thing so long desired and prayed for he would without any delay enter into arms and war incomitently. Only (ed Alexander) we must not linger and stay not drive off, for as such is herein conflit the very point of victory, even betimes to seize upon commo dious places of advantage before the enemies be posseled of them. Also with all speed, Ambibal only was not called to this counsel: for by reason of the foresaid conferences with Philip, the King had him in some jealousy, and therefore he was out of favour, and of no credit and account with him. At the first, he put up this dispose and made no words, but afterwards he thought it a better course, both to demand the cause of Antigonus' fratres and alienation of him: and also to take some good time to excite and purge him self, And therefor upon A father Antiochus, when upon a time he sacrificed unto the God, called me (a very little one) to be brought and presented before the Altar where he forced me to touch the same with my hand, and to take an oath. Never to be friend unto the people of Rome. To accomplish this, and fulfill this oath, I maintained the war for six and thirty years; by virtue of this oath, in time of peace I was driven out of my native country; and being fled from thence, this oath brought me into your courts; and by the guidance and direction of this oath, if you should disappoint me of my hope, yes whatsoever I know there are forces, whereas, I hear there is any skirmishing and railing of arms, I shall seek all the world over, until I find some Roman enemies. And therefore if there be any of your Couriers that have a mind and desire to advance themselves in your good grace, and would grow by carrying tales and accusing me unto you, let them find some other subject and matter to do this by: for I hate the Romans, and am like wise hated of them. That this is truth which I say, my father Antiochus and the God in heaven, can testify. Wherefore, whenever you shall think to make war with the Romans, see you entertain Ambassadors of one of your greatest and most affured friends: but if any occasion shall force you to peace, seek some other counsellor and not me, to confute withal about that point. This speech was ended, that not only is prevailed with the King, but also reconciled Ambassadors unto his grace, and so they departed out of the council with a full resolution to make war.

At Rome it was commonly talked and directed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no provision and preparation there was for war, but only whetting the edge of their stomacks. For both Conuls had no other Province but Italy aligned unto them to go to war. And they were either to agree between themselves, or else to call those, whether of the trions, should hold the general assembly, and be president of the election for that year. And he whose hap was not to be charged with that business, was to be in readiness to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italy, as need should require. And to this Conul it was permitted to enrol two new legions of citizens, and besides of allies and Latins 20000 foot, and 800 horse. To the other Conul were appointed those two legions, which L. Caecilius the Conul of the former year had under his government; also of allies and Latins 15000 footmen out of the same army and 500 horse. As for Q. Minucius, his commission was continued till for the conduct of that army which he had in Liguria. And for to supply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enrol 4000 Roman footmen, and 150 horse, and likewise to levy of the allies 9000 foot, and 350 horse for that service. To Q. Domitius it fell by lot, that he should go with a power out of Italy, whither forever the Senate gave order; and unto Quintus to govern Gaul. Then the Pretors election followed, who likewise call lots for their Provinces. M. Fulvius Centumalus had the civil jurisdiction, and L. Scribonius Lake the foreign. Q. Vadinius Tappus governed Sicily, Q. Solanius Sabes, Sardinia; M. Priscus Tappus high Spain, and A. Attilius Severinus the bale; but those two changed their Provinces, first by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act also of the Commons. For to Attilius Macedonius was aligned and the army, and to Babius the country of the Bruttii, Flaminiius and Fulvius continued in the government and command of Spain, and to Babius Tampilus for the rule of the Bruttii were those two legions appointed which the year before lay in the City.

E. With commission to take up and levy of allies fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse to go thither, Attilius Attilus had in charge to call thirty galliaces to be made with five banks of oars on a side, and to take out of the harbors and docks as many old vessels as were fit for service, and to enrol mariners and rowers. The Conuls also were enjoined to deliver unto him two thousand allies of the Latin nation, and a thousand Roman footmen. It was commonly voyed, that these two Pretors with two armies both by Land and at Sea, were prepared against Nobis, who openly now scatled the confederates of the people of Rome. But still the Embassadors were looked for, who had been sent unto King Antiochus, and the Senate commanded the Conul Domitius not to depart from the City before their return. The Pretors, Fulvius and Scribonius, whose charge it was to minister law and execute justice in Rome, had commission to provide a hundred galliaces, besides that fleet which Attilus was to command. But before that either Conuls or Pretors went forth into their Provinces, there was a procussion held, in regard of the prodigies and fearful sights that were reported. For word was brought out of Pieria, that a thbe-goat had yeamed his kids at once, and that it rained earth at Amsteram; and at Formia, that a gate and wall of the City were smitten with lightning; and (that which most of all troubled and frightened the Conul Domitius) that an Ox spake these words, Rome, take heed to thy self. In regard of the other prodigious tokens, there was a supplication held: but as for the Ox, the South-ayers and boweler prices gave commandment, that he should with great care be kept and nourished. The Tiber also with more violence overflowed into the City than in the former year, and overthrew two bridges and many buildings, especially about the gate Flumentum. Moreover, a mighty stone broken out of the Capitol Cliff, fell from thence into the street called Inguriam, either by the force and violence of rain, or some earthquake (which if there were any, was so little, that it could not be perceived) and that stone killed many a man. In the country also, by reason of this deluge, much cattle was carried away with the flood, and many farm houses and granges were born down and laid along.

comit, put to flight and chased into their camp; which being assailed, was defended manfully with much fighting until dark night; and then the Ligurians fled away in the night season secretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romans entered and feized thereof when it was empty of the enemies. Lest pillage was there found, for that ever and anon what booties forever they got in the country they sent home to their houses. Minimus not withstanding gave the enemies no repose from that time forward. For being departed out of the territory of Nîge he came into Liguria, where he destroyed their borroughs and Castles, and put all to fire and sword. There the Roman soldiers filled their hands with the Tuscan prizes, lent thither by the forragers and robbers.

Much about this time the Embassadors returned to Rome, from the KK, who brought word and made relation of nothing that was sufficient to enforce them to proceed in any hât to war, but only against the Lacedemonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achaean Embassadors also gave intelligence) the Sea coasts of Lacedaemon and Corinth were wronged and assailed, against the covenants of the league. Whereupon Actius the Pretor was sent with a fleet to defend the associates. And for as much as there was no imminent peril from Aetocbus, it was thought good, that both the Confuls should go into their Provinces. Domitius took his journey, and went the nearest way by Antriminus, and Quintus came into the Boians country by the way of Liguria. And there two Conuls armies in divers quarters, wafted all abroad the enemies country. At the first some few of their Gentlemen and Horfemen, together with their Captains: afterwards all those of Senators calling; and last of all, as many as were of any repute, worth and worthip, to the number of fifteen hundred fled to the Conulf.

Likewise in both Spains that year, the affairs went prosperously: for not only C. Flaminius by force of maneles and engines of batterry the rich and strong Town Litturum, and took priuie alive their Lord Coripilo a noble Prince, but also M. Fulvius the Consul confess feight with two armies of the enemies twice, and put them to the worse; and won by assault two Towns of the Spaniards Veselius and Helle, with many other forteresses: the rest of themselves revolted unto him. After this he made a journey into the Oretian country, & there having gotten two towns, of Toledo and Castile, he set forward and marched to the river Tagus. In that quarter there stood a town of a small City, but strongly seate: whilsts he assaulted it, there came a mighty army of the Veçtions to aid the Toledoans, with whom he fought a set field, and won the day, and having defeated the Veçtions, he forced the Toledoans with engines of batterry, and won the Town.

But all the wars which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL, of the Senate so much as the expectation of the war which Aetocbus had not yet begun and enterpris'd. For although they had ever and anon certain advertisements and intelligences of all things by their Embassadors, yet many flying tales and headlesse bruits there went without any certain Authors, reporting Lies as well as truths. And among the rest there ran a rumor, that Aetocbus soon as he was come into Aetola, would presently put over a fleet into Sicily. Whereupon the Senate, notwithstanding they had sent Actius the Pretor with a fleet into Greece yet forsooth as there was need not of forces only but also of authority to entertain the hearts and affections of their allies, they sent over T. Quintus, Cn. Oflavius, Cn. Servilius, and P. Fulvius, as Embassadors into Greece, and gave order that M. Fulvius should advance his legions out of the country of the Brintians, toward Tarentum and Brundisium, that from thence if need required, he might fall over into Macedonia. Moreover, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should put out a fleet of thirty sail for the defence of the coast of Sicily and that the Admiral thereof should have full commission there to command (now L. Oppius Salinator, who the former year had been one of the Ediles of the Commons, had the command of those ships,) also, that the same Pretor should address his letters unto L. Fulvius his Colleague, and advertised him that it was to be feared, that the armado of King Antiebus would cross over out of Eetol into Sicily; and therefore it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that he should take up and enrol into that army which he had already, of tumultuary foildiers 12000 horsemen, and 400 horse, by whose means he might defend that coast of the Province which looketh toward Greece. For the levy of thefe forces, the Pretor took matters not only in Sicily, but also in the tiles adjacent and lying therabouts, and fortiied with good garritons all the Towns upon the Sea side which lie toward Greece. Those rumours about there were fed still and maintained by the coming of Actius the brother of Eumenes, who reported that King Antiebus was passed over Hellefpond with an army, and that the Eetolians were in that forwardness, that they would be preft and ready in arms against his arrival. Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his absence, as to Actius there present in place. Also order was taken, that he should have a lodging allowed him at his pleasure, and his charges born for his diet and house-keeping. Moreover, there were given him as presents, two great horses of service, two pair of horfemen armors, as much silver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight: and of gold plate, as much as weighed 20 pound.

And forasmuch as meffengers one after another advertised and gave warning, that war was at hand, it was thought requisite and expedient, that the new Conuls should be cho'd in all convenient speed: whereupon a decree passed from the Senat, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should forthwith dispatch his letters unto the Conulf, to certify him of the Senats pleasure, namely, that he should commit the government of his Province and the army unto his Lieutenants, and return himself unto Rome, and in his way send out his write aforehand for the publishing of an assembly general.
A general for the election of Cnfulus. The Cnfuls obeyed their letters, directed forth his summons in manner aforesaid, and came to Rome. In this year a great ambition there was, and much fuit for the dignity of government. For that three noblemen stood for one place, namely, P. Cornelius Scaurus, the son of Cnbus, who the former year had the repuMe, L. Cornelius Scipio, and Gna. Manlius Vulso. The Cnfulship was conferred upon P. Scaurus, so as it might appear to the whole world, that this honour was deferred only, and not fully denied to a worthy a candidate. His adjutant companion in government was A. Aelius Gallus, a man by calling a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit, L. Ennius Paulus, G. Ennius Lepidus, M. Junius Brutus, A. Cornelius Mammalia, C. Livius, and L. Oppius, both summoned Salinator. This Oppius was he that had the conduct into Sicly of a fleet of thirty ships. Mean while that their new Magistrates call lots for the government of their Provinces, M. Ennius was commanded to pass over with all his power from Brundisium into Epirus, and to keep his forces about Apollonia. And M. Fulvius the Pretor of the City had in charge to build fifty new Galleys called Quinqueremes, of five banks of oars on either side. And thus verifying the people of Rome being provided against all enterprizes and attempts of King Antiochus whatsoever.

Neither was Nibur behind in this part in levying war; but assaulted with great force: the Town of Cythera; and of a mischievous and malicious mind against the Achæans, for sending a garrison to aid the besieged Townsmen, he forrode and waited their country. The Achæans durst not go in hand with war, before their Embassadors were returned from Rome, and until they might know the pleasure and will of the Senate; but after the return of those Embassadors, they both published a Diet and general Council at Sicily, and also sent their Embassadors to Quinctius for his advice and counsel. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make war out of hand: only the letters of T. Quinctius made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advised them to expect the Pretor and navy of the Romans, Now when the States there assembled in counsel were distraffed; some perfifing still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advice of him upon whom they had sent for counsel: the multitude at length looked what Philopomenes would say in that behalf, The Pretor he was for the time, and in those days surpassed all other in wisdom and authority. Therefore rose up and used this preface and said, "That it was a good counsel among the Achæans, and well ordained and provided, that the Pretor himself in all consultations of war should not deliver his own opinion; and therefore willed them of their selves to resolve and determine with all speed possible what they pleased. As for the Pretor, faith he, he will be ready to execute with fidelity and careful diligence their decrees accordingly;" by yea and indero, so far forth as man's policy may reach unto, that they shall not repent of their resolution be it war or peace. This brief speech of his was more forcible and effectual to incite them to take arms, than any persuasive Oration, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the wars. And therefore with exceeding accord of all in general they agreed upon war. As for the time and means of managing the same, it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretor, to use his own liberty and pleasure. Philopomenes, besides that Quinctius advised, was also himself minded to wait for the Roman fleet which on the Sea side might defend Cythere, but fearing again that their present necessity could abide no delays, and left not only Cythera should be lost, but the garrison also miscarried, which was sent to the defence of the war he set out and put to the Sea the Achæans shipping, The Tyrant likewise had rigged and dressed a small fleet to compass any aid and succours that haply might be sent to the besieged by Sea, to wit, three covered ships with hatch and deck, three Brigantins or Pinnaces and as many Gallions. For the old ships were by composition and covenant delivered up to the Romans, And to make proof and trial of their new vessels how wiry and nimble they were and withal to see how all things else were well fitted for a battle, it need was: he made every day certain shews and representations of fight at Sea, and exercised both mariners and soldiers by such kind of false alarms: supposing that herein principally confided the hope of his sieges, in case he could cut off all their aid from the Sea side. Now the Pretor of the Achæans as he was equal to any of the best and most renowned commanders and Captains of that time in Land service, either for experience and prudence, or wit and policy: so at Sea he was but a novice and a learner, as being an Arcadian born, an Inlander far within the land, and ignorant besides of all foreign forces, but that he had born arms and served a little in Contry, where he had the leading there, of some auditory, One old Gally there was a Quadrireme, taken at Sea 80 years before, at what time as the carried Nicol the wife of Craterus from Northam to Corinth, And having heard much talk of this ship (for indeed he had been sometime of great name in the Kings royal fleets) he commanded her, all rotten as she was now, and ready to fall in pieces, to be sent into the Sea from out of the Bay of Argus. This ship as admiral, made way before the rest, wherein T'of Nappa, a Captain General of a fleet was aboard; and encountered the ships of the Laconians, making fall from Grikas. And at the first she changed to Sea, and running against a new strong ship and being old, of her self, leaping and taking water at every gjwt she was rent, splintered and fell apies. All within her were taken prisoners. The rest of the fleet having lost their capstans fled as fast as possibly their oars could make speed and away. Philopomenes himself was in a light boat, frigot or pink, and fled again, and never stayed until he was arrived at Paros. This ship nothing discouraged and abated the heart of this martial warrior, who had run through many and sundry adventures; but contrary wise wrought this effect, that he suffered himself and said, That if he were overtaken and put to the worse in service at Sea, wherein he and he had no skill, he would do much the rather quit himself to upon the land (where he had much experience and was already) as the Tyrant hoped not long joy and make boath of his winnings.

Thus he had put himself up with pride of his fortunate victory, and perfusing himself adately that he had no cause to fear any more danger from the sea, purposed likewise to stop up all the avenues and passages by land; and therefore before all the ways times with strong guards, which he bestowed in convenient places. And retiring with a third part of his forces from the siege of Glykseum, he encamped before Philippi. This is a place that overlooketh and commandeth the territo-
A. Finally, against the morrow, which way were safest to remove the camp? and what form and manner of march were best? In these councils and discourses, he had from his childhood so injured and exercised his spirits, that he was never to be quiet what to do upon any such sudden occasion or accident presented unto him. And now at this present, seeing his enemies to near, first and foremost he made a stand with his vanguard; then he sent out toward the forlorn enigmas, his auxiliary Candians that came to aid him, and those horsemens which they call Tarentin, whose manner is to have with them, two horses apiece, and then commanding his own men of arms to follow, after, he posted himself a rock standing over a brook or running rill, from whence they might water commodo: into that place he gathered together all his bag and baggage; there he bellowed all the pages and horseboys, and followers of the camp, whom he environed also with armed men: and as the nature of the place would give him leave, he fortified his camp. But to pitch pavilions in a craggy, rugged, and uneven ground he found much ado. Now were the enigmas about half a mile off: and at one and the same rivulet they watered both, with the guard of their light armed foaldiers: but before that they could encircle and skirmish together (as commonly they do when the camps stand to near one to another) they might overtook them. It appeared plainly there would be some fighting the next day about the brook for water: and therefore in the night season he bellowed close in a valley, farthest out of sight from the enemies, as many of his targeteers especially the place would contain and hide. When day-light was come, the light armed Candians and those Tarentin horsemen (of both sides) entered into skirmish upon the very banks of the brook. Letemnorust the Candian had the leading order (so far forth as the breadth of the valley would permit) that they might easily receive their fellows as they fled, within the spaces between their ranks and files. Then at once they arose, fresh in heart and ordered in good array, and charged upon the enemies, disordered, disbanded, loose, scattered, weary with travel; and faint of their wounds. Then it was out of double and pant all that adventure where the victory went: for presently the Tyrant foaldiers turned their backs, fled a good deal farther than they made pursuit before, and were beaten into the camp: many were either killed or taken prisoners as they fled; and they had been put in full sight also within the camp, but that Philopomereus commanded to sound the retreat, fearing more the rugged and broken ground, and the disadvantage and difficulties thereof in case he had rashly venedowed forward any further, than he did the enemy. Then he, taking his conjecture by the battle of the E. fight, and gleaning by the nature of Nausthe General, in what test and fight he might best send into him one of his auxiliaries that were strangers, counterfeiting himself to be a reigned revolt, to inform him assuredly, that the Achaens determined the next day to march as far as to the river Euroros, which travelled hard by the walls of Lacedaemon, for to stop the passage, that neither the Tyrant might retire himself into the City when he would, nor any munition or victuals be carried from thence into the camp: moreover, that they would give the attempt, and affay if they could illicite any of the citizens to revolt from the Tyrant. This conjecture carried himself: for in this errand, that the Tyrant believed not so much his words, as took hold thereby of a good pretence and honest occasion for to quit and abandon the camp: and therefore the next morrow, he commanded Pythagoras, with the auxiliary foaldiers and the horsemens, to keep a good guard about the trench and enclofe of the camp: himself in person with the strength of his army, marched as it were to a battle, and commanded to advance forward the enigmas in all haste toward the City.

Philopomeres, perceiving that the army marched to fit through the narrow passage down the hill, put forth his own horsemen and the auxiliary Candians, against the guards of the enigmas that were widen before the camp. They, seeing the enemies to approach and themselves forlorn of their own fellows, at first went about to retire within their hold: but afterwards when they perceived the whole army of the Achaens advancing against them in order of battle, fearing that they and their tents should be at once surprised, made space after their own hose which was gone a good way before. With that, the targeteers of the Achaens assaulted the camp, entered upon it, and ranfack the tents, whiles the rest went forward and purifed the enemies. The way was so rough, as that an army at liberty and free from fear of enemies, might hardly and with much ado rid any ground and march without encumbrance: but in so much as the skirmish began in the tail of the retreating, and the noise and cry of them affrighted behind was heard in the vanguard: every man made frst for one, flung away weapons, and fled into the woods on either side of the way; and ere one could turn about all the wayes were tumbled and choked up with armours and weapons and especially with darts or javelins which lighting the most part with one end full against the enemies, were in stead of a flaked or embalmed palisade to hinder their passage.

Philopomenes having given commandment to his light armed aid-soldiers to press forward still, and to follow the chase as fast as they could (knowing well that the horsemen would have much ado and trouble in their flight) conducted himself, the main army and heavily charged, by a more open way to the River Eurus: where he encamped himself a little before the going down of the sun, and there he flared for his light appointed soldiers, whom he had left to follow after the enemies. Who being come about the time of the first watch, brought word, that the Tyrant with some few was entered into the city, but the unarmed multitude were dispersed, and wandered all about the forest and the woods. Then he willed them to repose and refresh their bodies: which being done, himself chose out of all the soldiers besides (who because they were come first into the camp, had well heartened themselves with taking their refection and some small sleep) certain, elect and special men, and took them forth immediately with himself, having about them nothing but their swords, and set them in good order to keep two port waies, by which men go to Phare and Earsibenes, where he presumed that the enemies would take their way and retire themselves upon their flight: and nothing was he deceived, for the Lacedemonians, so long as the day light lasted, had withdrawn themselves to the middle of the forest, through by-lanes and blind paths; but when the night was once come, and that they defaied lights within their enemies camp, they kept themselves aloof over-against them within close and secret lanes: and when they were once passed beyond, and thought all to be in safety and security, they came down into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that forlaid them in ambush: so they were every where by numbers either killed or taken prisoners; insomuch as scarce one fourth part of their whole army escaped, Philopomenes having first up the tyrant close within the City, spent almost thirty days consequently enquiring in waiting and spoiling the territory of the Lacconians: and when he had thus weakened and in manner broken the back of his enemy, he returned home, and the Achæans held him a paragon, and equal to the Roman Generals for glorious deeds of arms, pay in the service of the Lacconian war they preferred him before the other.

During the war between the Achæans and the tyrants, the Roman Embassadors, who carefully and diligently visited the Cities of the Allies, for fear left the Ætolians had alienated any of their affections from them to King Antiochus, travelled but little in going about to the Achæans, whom by reason of the hatred they bare to Nabis, they hoped verily to be fait and faithful enough unto them in all other things. And first they came to Athens, from hence to Choloc, and so into Theßaly: and after they had conferred with the Thessalians in a frequent council of theirs, they turned their way to Demetrias, where there was published a solemn Diet to be holden by the Magnêtes, where they were to frame their speech more curiously than in other places because certain of their great men and Potentates were estranged from the Romans, and altogether made for Antiochus and the Ætolians. The reason was this; because when news came that Philip his son, who was left hostage with the Romans, should be rended again unto him, and likewise the tribut remitted which had been imposed upon him, among other false tales and untruths, it was reported, That the Romans would redeliver Demetrias also unto his hands. And rather than that should come to pass, Eurylochus (a principal and chief man among the Magnêtes) and some others of that faction, defired to have a new world and an alteration, by the coming of the Ætolians and Antiochus, to the Magnêtes, they were to concile and place their words so, in ridging them of that foolish vain fear which they had conceived, that thereby they did not put Philip clean beside his hope, and so give him occasion to be ill affected unto the Romans; considering that he alone was to them of far greater importance in all respects, than were the Magnêtes, put all together. Thus much only they said by way of advertisement. That as all Greece generally was much behelden and bound unto the Romans for the benefit of Liberty, which they by their means enjoyed, so that City and State especially above all others was obliged unto them. For there, not only a garrison of Macedonians had been maintained to keep them in awe, but also the king had built him a royal palace, to rest himself there, to the end, that they might evermore have in their eye, their Lord to command them. But in vain, and to no purpose was all this, in case the Ætolians brought Antiochus in his stead to make his refuge in the holy and palace of Philip, and would needs entertain a new and unknown King in lieu of the old, so long a time and so well known. The sovereign Magistrat of that City, they call Magnetarches; and for that time Eurylochus was the man: who hearing himself big and stout of his high place, said plainly, That he knew no caufe, why either he or the Magnêtes should impute and impute the rumour that ran so fast touching the delivery of Demetrias into Philip his hands. For rather than to suffer that, the Magnêtes were to oppose themselves, yea, to do and dare any action whatsoever. And in the vehement hear of speech he went so far, that inconsiderably he call out one word and said, That Demetrias seemed free in outward show and appearance, but in very truth was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every beck of the Romans. At this speech there arose a dissorant bruit and murmuring of the assembly, which jarred and varied one from another, whilsts some fwooned him up, others were offended, and took it in great delight, that he should presume to utter and speak so much. And Quintius was in such a heat of cholery therewith that stretching forth his hands to Heaven, he called the Gods to witness this ingratitude and dishonesty of the Magnêtes, at whole words they were all greatly terrified. Then Zero one of the chief, a man that at that time of great authority and reputation, as well in regard of the honourable part that he ever caried in the whole course of his life, as also for that he alwayes stood firm and sure A to the Roman side, befought Quintus and the rest of the Embassadors with tears, Not to impute the folly of one man to the whole City, for every man is to bear his own burden, and as he hath abused, so to drink, and abide the iarm of his own scratching. As for the Magni dens, they acknowledge to owe unto T. Quintus and the people of Rome, not only their freedom, but all other things else that are most dear and precious unto men, Neither could a man pray or wish, at the hands of the immortal Gods for any thing, which the Magni dens had not received by their means: and sooner would they like frantic persons pluck the very heart out of their own bellies, yea, and tear themselves in pieces, before they would violate and break the amity which they had with the Romans. This speech of his was followed and ended with the humble prayers of the multitude. Enrylochus departed out of the assembly, and through-by B waves and blind lanes recovered the gates, and from thence fled straight into Eolus. For now by this time, and every day more than other, the Eolians discovered and shewed themselves how they were affected to revolt, And happily at the same time, Thous, a principal personage of that Nation, whom they had lent as Embassador to King Antiochus, was newly returned, and brought with him Menippus the Kings Embassador, Who, before he had audience given them in a coun cell assembled for them, had hild every mans ears and bluffed thorth, what forces were prepared both for Land and Sea, what a mighty power was coming both of foot and horte, how elephants were sent for out of India and above all (wherewith they thought the minds of the people would be most moved) That there was such a mass of gold brought, as would buy all the Romans out and out. It was easy to see what trouble and brolf such language might make in the general diet and assembly. For the Roman Embassadors had intelligence, both of their coming, and of all that ever they did. And albeit there was little hope or none at all to do any good, yet Quintus thought it not amiss, that some Embassadors from the allies and associate Cities should be present at that Council, such as might admonish and put the Eolians in mind of the Roman alliance and society, and not flick to speak their minds frankly, yea and thwart the King his Embassador. The Athenians of all other were thought the meetest mentor that purpose, both in regard of the authority and reputation of their City, and also for the ancient league between them and the Eolians. So Quintus requested them to lend their Embassadors to the Pamelion in Parliament, When the assembly was met, and the Councellet, Thous first declared his embassage; and after him was Menippus called in, who being entered in place, spake in this manner: It had been (qd.
he) the best course for all them that inhabit both Greece and Asia, that Antiochus had inter-led in these affairs, during the upright fortune and entire state of Philip; then, every man had enjoyed his own, and all had not been reduced to the appetite and devotion, nor brought under subjection of the Romans. And even yet (quoth he) in case ye persift still in the same mind, and purpose refolutely to accomplish and finish these your designs and commenced enterprises, pos-tible it is by the favor and help of the Gods, and by the means of the Eolian association that Antiochus may recover the State of Greece, created as it is, and much broken and bring it again to her first fresh hue, to her lively and lightsome intivre, which consisteth in true liberty, even that which is able to stand alone and maintain itself, and dependeth not upon the will and pleasure of others. The Athenians, who first (after the Kings embassage was delivered) had audience given E them and liberty to speak their mind, without making any mention at all of the King, Advi ced the Eolians of the Roman society, and put them in mind of the favors and good turns done by Quintus to Greece in general, advising them to take heed, that without discretion they overthrew not the welfare thereof, by running rashly and too soon into a new word of strange courtes and fine devices: for hot, hafty, and heady counsels are at the first flight and entertainment, pleasant and amiable: in the handling and managing, hard and difficult: in the end and issue, busy and dangerous. Consider how the Roman Embassadors, and namely, Quintus among them, are not far off: and whilsts things stand in good terms of integrity, it were better to treat and debate of matters in question and doubt, by words and reasons, than to fall all Asia and Europe together to take arms and to make lamentable and deadly war one upon another. The F multitude defirons of a change enclined altogether; and were wholly devote to Antiochus, being of opinion that the Roman Embassadors were not to be admitted into the Council: but the more great and ancient persons of the nobility and states-men, obtained thus much by vertue of their authority, That they should have audience granted unto them, And when the Athenians had made relation of this decree and conclusion passed, Quintus was of mind to go into Eolus; for this acquaint he made, either to obtain some what that he came for, or else to have all Gods and men to bear him witness, that the Romans would enter into the action of war justly, and in manner upon consent and necessity. Thus Quintus being therither come, began at first to discoursbe fore the whole assembly, as touching the society of the Eolians with the Romans, and how often they had broken for their parts the faithful accord between them: and when he had fo G said, he used a brief speech concerning the right of those Cities that were in question, And if they thought that they had any law and reason of their side, how much better (quoth he) were it to send Embassadors to Rome either to argue and expostulate the matter with them, or to demand their advice (whether they would themselves) than to cause the people of Rome to make war with Antiochus & the Eolians together, not without great trouble of the whole world & certain ruin of all Greece. For one should feel the smart & calamity of this war sooner than they that are the very causes thereof & began first, Thus spake the Roman Embassador by way of prophecy, but in vain and to no effect. After him Thras and the rest of that faction, were heard by the general applause of all: and they effected so much, that without any farther proroguing of the Diet, and referring the matter to another day, yeas, and without staying so long until the Romans were out of the place and abient, they concluded to make a decree, by virtue whereof Antiochus should be sent for to affranchise Greece, and to decide the quarrel between the Romans and the Aetolians. This decree was not so proud and insolent, but Demetrius their Pretor accompanied it with as arrogant and reproachful a trump of his own. For when Quintus required of him to see the said decree, he without any respect of the honorable petionage of the man, made answer, That for the present time he had somewhat else to do of greater importance; but he would give him the decree and an answer withal shortly, and that within Italy, encamped upon the bank of the Tyber. So great a spirit of insolence folly in those days had possessed the nation of the Aetolians, I and their chief Magistrates! Then Quintus and the delegats returned to Cormh.

After the Romans were dismissed, the Aetolians held no more general council of the whole Nation, because they would make semblance and seem to do nothing of themselves as touching the cause and question of Antiochus, but sit still and expect the coming of the King. Mary, they treated and debated the matter by their Apostles (for to they call their special and privy Council which consists of certain elec chosen persons) by what means there might be an alteration and change in the affairs of Greece. This was held of all men for certain, that in every City and State, the chief and the best men generally were for the association of the Romans, and contended themselves with the present condition wherein they stood: but the multitude and those who had not all things to fall out to their own good, were delusios of a change. And one day above the rest, the Aetolians entered into a design and plot, which was not only out of all measure audacious, but also most shameless, namely, to surprize and possess themselves of De- virtius, Choleis and Lacedemon, And to each of these Cities there was sent one of their principal personages, namely, Thras to Cholos, Alexamenos to Lacedemon, and Diocles to Demetorius. This Diocles had the help and affiance of Eurytthus a banished man (of whole flying away, and the occasion thereof we have spoken before) who other wise had no hope at all to return again into his native country. The kinfolk and friends of Eurytthus and the rest of that faction, upon in- structions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children so present themselves in the frequent assembly of the citizens in habit of mourners, in poor array, and vailed after the manner of humble suppliants, there to beleech them all and some, not to suffer him a guiltlesse person, neither convicted nor condemned, to was old and pine away in exile. All that were plain and simple men seemed to be touched with pity and commiseration. The wicked and licentious persons conceived some hope to make a confusion in the state by these Aetolian troubles: in so much as every one was of opinion and gave his voice, that he should be restored and sent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horsemens (for then was he the Captain of the Cavalry) took his journey, under a colour and pretence to reduce and bring home this banished person his hoft and good friend; and in one day and night travelled a mighty great journey, and came within six miles of the City. And betimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troops he marched forward, commanding the rest of the horsemens to fol low after. When he approached the gate, he caused them all to alight on foot and to lead their horses in their hands by the reins of their bridles, and to go without order, resembling travellers and waifaring men, so as they seemed more like to the ordinary train of Captain Diocles, than to the men of arms and warriors under his charge: and leaving one of his troops at the gate, for fear it was the horsemens behind might be flut off, he led Eurytthus by the hand, and brought him through the mids of the City and the market place home to his house: and all the way he was met with many of his followers and friends that welcomed him, and joyed for his return. Anon the whole City was full of horsemens, and all places of opportunity and advantage were feized and possesed by them, Which done, divers were sent to maifrace the chief of the adversary part in their houles. Thus the Aetolians became masters of Demetorius.

As for Lacedemon, they devisd in no hand to force the City, but by some wile to entrap and surprize the tyrant. For seeing the Romans had despoiled him of all his sea coast Towns: and the Achazians driven him within the walls of Lacedemon, there was no doubt, but who so ever could first take his life from him should carry away all the thanks, and curry especial favor with the Lacedemonians. Good occasion and pretence they had to send unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for some aids, considering that by their advice and perswasion he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexamenos a thousand footmen, and thirty elec horsemens, drawn out all of the flour of the City, Demetorius the Pretor delivered unto them from the privy councel of that nation (of which we have before spoken) "That they should not believe that they were to be employed in war against the Achazians, or in any other service, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his own head: but he charged them to be ready to perform and execute obediently whatsoever should be in determination Alexamenos upon the present occasion should happen to attempt, were it never to be unlooked for, strange, inconsiderate, and audacious: and to rest upon this, That they were sent with him to accom- plish that, and for no other purpose. Thus Alexamenos with the conduct of these men thus prepared to his hand came unto the Tyrant: and no sooner was he arrived, but he possest him presently with a world of hopes giving to understand, "That Antiochus was already passed over into into Europe: that shortly he would be in Greece, and over-spread all seas and lands with his armies and armadas: that the Romans should full well know and find, that they have not now to deal with such an one as Philip: that the numbers of his foot and horse by land can not be counted, nor his ships at Sea numbered: that the battle of his Elephants at the very fight will decide the matter and finish the war. Moreover, that the Ætolians with all their forces, were ready and pritly to come to Lacedæmon, (as need required) at any time: but indeed, deditious, they were to travel and mutter before the King at his arrival, a goodly number of armed soldiers. N. bis therefore himself should do very well, not to suffer those forces which he had, to decay with long reposo and idleness, but bring them forth and train them abroad, make them to run in their armour thereby both to whet and sharpen their courage, and also to exercise and to improve their bodies: for by use and fötome, the labour will be lighter: and by the courtsey and graciosines of his General, not without delight and pleasure. Hereupon, they began to issue out of the City and oftentimes went into the plain lying by the River Enoeta: They of the tyrant's guard kept commonly in the battail or middle ward: and himself with three horsemen at the utmost (with whom Alexænius for the most part was) used ordinarily to ride before the ensign, taking survey and viewing the utmost points and wings of the army. The Ætolians were placed in the right wing, as well thole that came before to aid the tyrant as thole thousand that were newly arrived with Alexænius. Now had Alexænius taken a cullome one while to toourney as it were amongst the ranks before in the company of the tyrant, and to instruct him in some maters tending to his commodity: otherwhiles, to ride to his own men into the right wing, and soon again to return to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of somewhat necessary to be done. But upon that day which was appointed for to do the feat and murder the tyrant, after he had ridden forth with the tyrant to the usual place, and kept him company a while, he took occasion (as his manner was) to make a step aside to his own foildiers; and then he went in hand with those hosemen which were sent with him from out of Ætolia, and said thus unto them: 'Now first, you shall adventure and execute that hastily and without delay which you were comanded to perform by my direction and leading. Be ready with heart and hand, and be not slack and idle to exploit that, which ye shall see me to undertake and enterprise. And look who soever he be that either standeth still, or will seem to argue and interpret his own wit and advice to crose mine; let him make account, he shall never go home again to his own country.' With that he let them all a quaking, for well they remembered what their charge was when they came forth from home. Now was the Tyrant a coming on horseback from the left wing: Then Alexænius commanded his horsemen to touch their lances down, and to have their eye upon him. He also himself to take a good heart unto him, which was not a little daunt on at first with the co-gitation of so great a designment that he had projected. When he was now approached and come near the Tyrant, he ran with full carrier at him, gored his horse, and overthrew himself to the ground. He was not so soon unhorsed and laid along, but the horsemen flagged him with many a thrust: whereof the most part did no harm, considering they were driven against his colttes: but in the end they found where his body was naked and unarmed, so he gave his last gasp before he could be rescued by his guard in the main battail aforesaid. Then Alexænius taking with him E all the Ætolians, made all the hait he could to posses himself of the royal place. The Penitencers and Squires of the body, seeing this murder done before their eyes, were at first mightily affrighted: but afterwards perceiving the army of the Ætolians to go their wayes and depart, they ran to the battlefields carrie left among them, and of men that should have guarded his body and revenged his death: they became a sort of idle gazers and lookers on. And surely there would not a man have once stirred, in case the multitude had immediately been called to an assembly: and if after arms laid down, they had been entertained by him with some Oration or Remonstrances framed according to the time. The Ætolians were kept many together, in arms still, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one person, But all things that they did, hastened the speedy triumph and destruccion of those that had committed this fact, as it could not otherwise be in Fyllaction, but they should fo be ferved, who had plaid follow and treacherous a part. The Captain and Ring-leader of all this mischief kept him self close that within the royal palace, spending both night and day in riling and searching the Tyrants coffers and his treasury. And the Ætolians for their part also fell to raking and as they had won that City by assaulted, which they made countenance and semblance to let free. The indignity of thee their pranks, the contempt with in small regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedæmonians to gather together and consult of the matter. Some were of opinion and said, That the Ætolians were to be thrust out by the head and shoulders, and to be sent away with a midstief, and their own liberty to be recovered, which under a colour of being retorted, was intercepted and taken from them; others advised and said, that for fashion at leastwise, some one of royal blood should be set up G for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and item one Ætolian a young child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant: him they mounted upon horseback and then they took arms with all speed, and as many Ætolians as they could light upon, wandering here and there in the streets, they ran upon and beved in pieces. Then they ashuted the palace, where they also murdered Alexænius, albeit some few about him he made resistance and defended himself. The rest of the Ætolians gathered together about Chalicteus (which is a Chappell of Dian made of braies) and there likewise they were massacred. A few of them hang flung away their weapons and fled some escaped to Tegae, and others to Megalopolis: where being apprehended by the Magistrates, they were sold in port-sale, to them that would offer more. Philopompus hearing of the Tyrants death, went to Lacedaemon, where he found all things out of order and in confusion by reason of war. And having called forth the principal & chief citizens, he used unto them such a speech, as indeed Alexander should have made, and thereby knw the Lacedemonians in league and alliance with the Achæans: which he effected the sooner, because it chance even then, that Atilius was come before. Gythaum with four and twenty galleasses of five banks of oars on side.

About the same time, Thoas had not so good speed before Chalcis; by means of Embrymidas, a great and chief man of the City (one, who by the might and stronger hand of those that sided with the Romans, had been expelled the City after the coming of T. Quintus and the Embassadors 10 deligats) and also of Herodatus of Canus, a Merchant and a man that in regard of his wealth and riches bare a greatuide in Chalcis: Thoas, I say, sped not so well by their means, notwithstanding that the supposits and part-takers of Embrymidas were well disposed to the Town: as Enylochus did in the surprizing and feizing of Demetrias. This Embrymidas from Athens (for there he had made choice to dwell) first came to Thebes, and from thence he went forward to Salamine, Herodatus abode at Throniwm, and not far from thence within the gulf of Malea, he had 2000 footmen, and Thoas two hundred horsemen, and about thirty light Caravels. Which Herodatus was commanded to let over into the Island Aetoliana with fix hundred footmen, that from thence, when he perceived once the Land-forces to approach Aleis and Euphris, he might cut over to Chalcis. As for themselves, they conducted the rest of the forces in all thehalt they could, and K most by night journeys marched into Chalcis. Mitto and Xenodochis (who had the managing of the affairs in Chalcis, and might do all in all there, now that Embrymidas was banished) remained in Chalcis, and whether they mitredot somewhatthemselves, or had some inkling and intelligence of the matter, I wot not, but afraid they were at first, and had no other hope at all but by flight to save themselves: howbeit afterwards when their fear was well allayed and fet, seeing evidently, that not only their own country was betrayed, but also the Roman society abandoned, they plotted in this wise, and entered into a confine as followeth.

It Fortune at the very same time, that a solemn anniversary sacrifice was celebrated at Eretria to the honor of Dianæ Amorvybis: to which solemnity there resortet not only the inhabitants of those places near at hand but also a number of Cariytins. Thither they lent certain Orators, L to requit and entreat the Etrurians and Cariyfins, both to take some pity of their estate, considering they were born in the same Island, and also to have some regard to the alliance of the Romans and not suffer Chalcis to fall into the hands of the Achæans; who no doubt, if they might got Chalcis, would not be long ere they had Euboea too. Sirly Lords (say they) were the Macedonians, and rigorous, but the Achæans would be much more unemployable. Thefe Cities were principally respective to the Romans, whose virtue and prowess was, in war, their justice and bounty in victory they had lately experience of, and therefore both States armed the flower and manhood of all their youth and sent them. The Townmen of Chalcis having committed the guard of their walk to the, went forth themselves with all their forces passed over Euphris, and encamped near Salamine. From which place they lent first an herald and after him Embassadors to the Achæans, to demand of them. Wherein they had so offended either in word or deed, that their allies and friends should come to molest and affail them thereby of hostility? To whom Thoas the General of the Achæans made this answer, That they were not coming to annoy and trouble, but to deliver and free them from their servitude under the Romans. For bound they were and tied now with a brighter and more glittering chain indeed, but far heavier, than at what time as they had the garrison of the Macedonians within their Citle. The Chalcidian replied again and interred, that they neither were in bondage, nor needed at all the garrison of any. And thus the Embassadors departed from the party, and returned to their own people. Thoas and the Achæans, whole white and whole hope was to come upon them on a sudden, and surprise them at unawares returned home again as they came, being not able to maintain open war, nor to affail a City so well forimified both by sea and land, Embrymidas being advertised that his country-men lay in camp at Salminate and that the Achæans were dilated and gone, retired himself also from Thebes to Athens, and Herodatus likewise, after he had wittily and with great longing, expected from Aetolians to dain together, to see some signal (but in vain) sent on a pinnae or brigantine, to know what the cause might be of such flight; and understanding that the enterprise was given over by his com-the whole multitude flocking unto him. And Villius demanded of them whither they had rather that he came to them as to friends or enemies? Unto whom Ennius the Magnesian, answered, that he was come unto his friends: but he would not, to him, for fear the haven, and suffer the Magnesians to be at peace and liberty, and to beware that under a pretence of parole, he did not solicit and disquiet the multitude. After this there was no farther talk and speech between them but plain debate and altercation whereas Villius the Roman blamed and challenged the Magnesians, as unthankful persons, and fore warned them of the miseries and calamities that hung over their heads: and again the multitude cried out aloud, and acceded as well the Senator as Quintus. Thus Villius without doing any good, returned to Quintius. But Quintius having dispatched a messenger to the Pretor, that he should reduce him his forces, retired himself again by sea to Corinthis.

The affairs of Greece thus interlaced and blended with the Roman, have carried me away as it were out of my life: not for that they were so necessary and important to be written, but only because they were material to the cause of the war against Antiochus. After the Confuls were elected (for they I began my digression), L. Quintius and Cn. Domitius, the Conuls went into three several provinces, Quintus in Liguria, and Domitius against the Boii. As for the Boii, they held themselves quiet, and the whole body of their Senat with their children, their captains also, with their Cavalry, to the number in all of fifteen hundred, yeeded themselves to the Conuls. But the territory of the Liguri was overrun and walked, and some forreis were taken: whereby not only there were prizes got of all sorts, and prisoners taken, but also divers captives, as well citizens as allies were recovered out of the enemies hand. This very year a Colony was planted at Viminacium.

C by an act of Senat and Commons: and there went thither three thousand and seven hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. The Triumvirs, who had the placing of them, were Q. Caecilius, M. Marius, and C. Flaminius. Every footman was endued with fifteen acres of land, and the horsemen with twice as much. It was a territory held latt in the tenure of the Britans, and they had conquered it first from the Greeks.

About the same time, there hapned at Rome two most searfull accidents; the one of them continued long, but was not altogether so vehement and terrible: for there was an earthquake endued eight and thirty days. All which time, the law freight or vacation from all courts of law and civil causes, continued in great fear and peniveness: in regard whereof, a supplication was holden for three days. As for the other, it was not a vain fear, but a very los, indeed that touched many men: for there began a fire in the best Market, and continued a day and a night, burning many houses standing on the Tiber side; and all the shops and ware-houses, with much inheritance of great price, were consumed. Now was the year well drawing to an end, and daily more and more the bride and greater of the war with Antiochus increased: and likewise the care that the Legions of the Senat had thereof. And therefore they began to treat concerning the Provinces of the Megalitars, to the end, that all of them might be more circumpect and intentive to their charges. So a decree passed that the Conuls should have the governance of Italy, by name, and also to go whithersoever the Senate should please to dispone of them: and all men knew well enough, that the war against Antiochus was upon the point. Also ordained it was, that he whole lot it was to manage that war, should have the conduct of four thousand footmen of Roman Citizens, and three hundred horsemen; besides six thousand allies of the Latine nation, and four hundred horsemen. L. Quintius the Conul was appointed to take muffers for those foundiers, that there should be no flaw, but that the new Conuls might immediately put himself in his journey, to what expedition forever the Senat thought good. Item, it was decreed as concerning the Provinces of the Pretors, in this manner: Namely, that the first lot should affign the double jurisdiction, civil and foreign, as well among Citizens as strangers: the second should concern the Britans: the third, the navy, and the lame to tell whithersoever the Senat would appoint: the fourth the Sicily: the fifth for Sardenia: the first for the nearer Spain. Over and besides L. Quintius the Conul was commanded to enroll two new legions of Roman Citizens, besides twenty thousand foot and eight hundred horsemen of the Latine nation: and this army they set out for the Pretor, who was to govern the Britans. Two chappels that year were dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus: the one of them L. Furius Purpurio vowed in the Gauls war, as Pretor; the other when he was Conuls and Q. Martius Rullus the Daunilivius, dedicated them. This year there passeyed many sharp and grievous sentences and judgements upon oyers: against whom (being privet men) M. Tuccius and P. Justus Brutus the two Adiles of the chair, commenced action. Of that silver wherein they were fined, was made a charriot with four wheels, guided: and set up it was in the Capitol in the cabinet of Jupiter above the top of his throne: likewise twelve bucklers guided. The fame Adiles also, caused the porch or gallery to be made without the gate Tergemium, among the carpenters.

As the Romans were wholly amused upon preparation for this new war, so Antiochus for his part was not still: three Cities there were which kept him back and checked his progreffe, to wit, Smyrna, Alexandria in Treas, and Lampeca; the which they never could do to that by force, by assault, or draw into submition with any condition whatsoever; and to leave them behind in these terms, when the should in proper person passe over into Europe, he was not willing. Somewhat also he was impeached by a consultation as touching Amnial. For as first he was flaid and hindered by occasion of the open ships which he intended to lend with him into Affriss, And afterward buzzed it was into his head by Thoas the Etoian especially, and question moved, whether er it was good simply to send him thither at all, or no? This Thous, when Greece was all in an hurry and full of troubles, bare them in hand, that Demetrius would be in their power and at their devotion. And like as with his leaguer touching the King, in multiplying and magnifying his forces, he had brought many of the Greeks into a fools paradise, even so also after the same manner he ceased not to feed the King with lies, and fill him with hopes, making him believe as all men wished for him with all their hearts, and would run by heaps to the seas strand, to meet him to look as they could ken his fleet under sail. This selfsame man was so bold also as to alter the Kings mind as touching Annibal, which seemed before resolved and fetled. For he persuaded him that the Kings navy was not to be dlimembred, and past therefore to be sent away; and if he were to make out any of the ships from the rest, yet Annibal of all other was not to have the conduct thereof, a banished perion and a Carthaginian; who was like enough to be of many minds, & I to change a thousand times in a day, such was his present condition and fortune, & such was his nature and disposition. And as for that glorious name for martiall prowess (which is the came that Annibal is so much let by, and which recommendeth him as a speciaall and singular gift to the world) it is too much, and far unfitting for any one captain under a King: & more meet it were that the King himself should be regarded and feen above all others, that the King, I say and none but the King should be the leader, conductor and commander of all. Again, if Annibal chanced to mistrey with a fleet, or to have his forces defeated, the loss would be accounted no more then if any other meaner captain had done it: but if the affairs should prosper and speed well, Annibal should go away with the honour, and not Antiochus. Moreover, say that fortune were so kind as to give Antiochus the upper hand of the Romans, and the entire victory over K, them for ever, what hope or likelihood is there that Annibal would be content to live under the King and subjett to him alone, who hardly could brook and endure the command and sovereignty of the whole state wherein he was born? He hath not carried himselfio, ever since his first youth, bearing amind to compasse the dominion of the whole world, as that now in his old age he can not abide to have a lord and a superior over him. To conclude, the King (quoth he) hath no such need of Annibal in this war, as to make him a commander, well may he use him for a counceller, and to forth have him in his train and company; for some mean fruit and end of such a nature cannot be cumberfome, hurtfull, and dangerous: but if high and great matters be reachfed at, loon they may bear down and overcharge both the giver, and also the receiver. And no spirits are so ready to envy and malice others, as they whole birth and parentage, whole degree L and estate is not answerable to their baryous minds: and such commonly, as they hate the virtue, so they depriue the good of another, Hereupon our course of sending Annibal into Africa, as was forthwith laid aside and clean cast behind, which was so well devised in the beginning of the war.

Antiochus bearing himself aloft now, principally for that Demetrius was evicted from the Romans unto the Etolians, determined no longer to delay the matter, but presently to take a voyage into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the sea, he went up to Ilissus from the sea-side for to sacrifices to Minerva; and when he was returned to his fleet, he made fail with 30 close covered and hatched ships, and 60 uncovered and undacket, and after those followed 100 vessels of burden, charged and fraught with victuals, munition, and warlike furniture of all forts. And first he fell with the land Imbros: and from thence he cut over to Sepharos, where after he had called his ships which had been fastened one from another in the wide and deep sea, he arrived at Petilum, the first town of the main and continent, Where Eurylochus the Magnetarches, the sovereign of Magnesia and the principal citizens of the State, were come from Demetrius, met him and jouined with him; who rejoicing exceedingly to see so goodly a company of them in his train, the next day put into the haven of the City of Demetrius: and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six Elephants: a small power (God wot) and insufficient to seize upon Greece, ill naked and alone, far shorter then to bold and maintain war with the Romans. After it was reported that Antiochus was come to Demetrius, the Etolians proclaimed a councell, wherein they made a decree to tend for Antiochus. For now the King knowing that they would passe such a AA, was departed from Demetrius, and had withdrawn himself to Phaleron within the gulf of Madea: And after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Lamia, where he was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of hands, faints, acclamations, and others signs, whereby the multitude used to shew & tell thin their great joy. When they were assembled together and fet in Councell, Phanes the Pretor and other chief citizens brought him solemnly in: where Olymades, thus the King began his speech, first exulting himself, in that he was come with a far smaller power then all men hoped or looked for. And even this (quoth he) may serve in stead of the greatest argument that may be of my exceeding love and affection toward you, in that being unprovided and unarmiied of all things, and at a time to unreasonableness for to fail, as too early to take the sea. I have not thought much but I am willingly come at the call of their Embassadors being thus allurely persuaded, that the Etolians seeing me once, will suppose that in me alone consist all their hope and defense whatever. And yet I would accomplish I assure you, and satisfy to the full even your contentment also, whose expectation for the present may seem to have been disappointed: for soon as the time of the year will serve, and the spring is once come, that the seas are navigable, I will offer for all Greece with men, horses, and provision; I will take up all the seas coasts with fleets, if I can; for no coasts, no ports, no ports, until I have taken from their necks the heavy yoke of the Roman empire, let Greece free indeed, and the made the Eotians the chief commanders therein. Nay, with mine armies besides I shall come all kinds of provision and furniture out of Asia, but the present (with which) the Eotians must see order, that my people may be served with corn and other victuals at reasonable rates. To this effect when the King had spoken with the great assembly of all men, he departed. After the King's departure, there rose some contention betwixt two great men of the Eotians, to wit, Phanes and Theon. Phanes was of opinion, that it was better policy to make Antiochus for a mediator and reconciler of peace, or to be an umpire or arbitrator to decide the controversies betwixt them & the Romans, rather than to be the General of the war. For his very coming and majesty would be more effectual then all his forces to strike some reverence in the Eotians and cause them to be respectful unto him. For men oftentimes yield and submit many things of themselves willingly to avoid war, which they cannot be forced into by wars and arms. When they are once entered into action. Thbot inferred again and said, that Phanes spoke not this for any desire & love to peace, but his meaning was to scatter and disperse that furniture and preparation of war for this intent: That by this redoubling of the King's courage might abate, and the Romans gain time to make themselves ready. For, that there was no reason possibly to be gotten at the Romans' hand, they had tried sufficiently by good experience, in leading to many embassies to Rome, and in debating the matter to often with Quintus: Neither would they ever have fought against Antiochus and carved his head, if all their hope otherwise had not been cut off and clean failed. And now since his helping hand is pretend ed unto them sooner then all men expected or looked for, they were not now to begin to fear and give over, but rather to request and interest the King, that since he was come himself in person - which was the greatest matter of all - to set free and maintain Greece, he would fend for forces both at sea and land. For the King in arms, might persa urance obtain something: but disarmed if he were, little or no returning would the Romans make of him in the quarrel, and question of the Eotians, nor on his own affairs whenever he should reason and debate thereof. And here went the bare away. They all opened straightways to file the King with the name of Emperor. And they chose thirty of the chief personages to assist him in council for all things required. Thus the Dict was dissolved, and every man slipp'd away and retired to his own City.

The next day the King sat in consultation with their Apolectes, in what place they should begin the war. And it was thought best, first to assail the City of Chaldeis, which lately the Eotians had situate in vain. And for to effect this service, there was more expedition and speed required then any other great forces and preparations. Hereupon the King set forward with 10,000 footed men which followed him from Demetrias, and made by the way of Ptoias: The Captains of the whole of the Eotians, having levied some few companies of their youth took another way, and met with him at Chersones, and followed with ten covered ships. The King encamped near Solybe, and himself in person with the chief of the Eotians crossed the Euripus and when he was landed and not far gone from the haven, the Magistrates and chief men of Chaldeis came forth without their gates, and some few of both sides met together for to parle. The Eotians were content to partake with them, that to war forth as they might without impeaching the Roman amity they would situate the King to be their ally and friend for as much as he was posted into Europe not to make war, but to deliver Greece, and let it free as he did. and not in word only and falle semblance, as the Romans had done. And nothing was there more for the good and benefit of the Cities in Greece, then to entertain in the society and fellowship of them both. For under the defence and safeguard of the one, they might be sure to guard themselves from the violence and outrage of the other. But if they accepted not of the King, they were all to take heed and see what danger they extensively incurred: considering the favours of the Romans, they enjoy peace and liberty already. As for the King, we refuse not his amity, nor yet reject it; because the friendship of the Eotians, and we will take it for a special point of friendship that they shall be still they gentry will depart out of our land and be gone: For, as for us, we are ready to reckon this, not to receive them within our walls, nor, not to contract with them any society, without the advice and consent of the Romans. Whenevert matters were related to the King, which he layd before with the ships, he determined presently to return to Demetrias for that he was not come with such a power as to attempt any thing by force; where, seeing his fleet enterprise came to nothing, he conferred with the Eotians which was to be done next: And concluded it was to found the Attains & Aminander the King of the Armenia. They suppos'd that the nation of the Beorcius was clean estranged and badly afficted to the Romans ever since the death of Bassilis and those troubles that ensued thereupon. They were persuaded also by Philip (a great potentate, and principal leader of the Achæans, was both malicious and odiouz unto Quintus for emulation and jelouze of honour in the Laconian war, Aminander had expected, and taken to wife Apeam, the daughter of one Alexander, a Megaloplaton, who, vaunting himself to be defended from Alexander the Great, named his two sons Philip and Alexander, and his daughter Apeam; whom being thus advanced by marriage with a King, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Achæania. This Philip a vain-headed young man, the Eotians and Antiocius had induced into a foolish hope (considering that for certain he was of the roayall blood) to obt in the Kingsdom of Macedonia, if haply he could bring about to join Aminander and the Achæanians to Antiocius. And these vain conceits of great healtl brought mightily not with Philip only, but also with Aminander.

Now in Achæa there was a counsell holden at Egium, and audience given there to the Embassadors of Antiocius and the Eotians, before T. Quintus. Where the King his Embassador spake first, and being, (as all those commonly are, that have intertention and maintenance of Kings,) full of foolish babble, & making tea and land refund again with his vain prating and lown- ly words; yet at an end, and told them, what an infinite number on horsemen were passing over by Hellefion into Europe: whereof some of them were in complete harness, armed at all pieces, whom they call Catsabrates: others were archers, and horse of horseback, against whom there was nothing close, nothing fare enough, who when their backs are turned, and their horses run away, shoot so much the more surely, and even point-plank, and albeit these forces of horse by his report, were sufficient of themselves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put togethet, yet be ad ded besides a mighty number, I wot not how many of footmen: and terrified them with a sort of strange nations, that fiercely had been heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Elymians and Cadusians. But for his forces as it was there was no bays, "barbers, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them. The sydionian and Tyrians (say they) hold the right side, the Aradians, and the Siders out of Pamphylia left the keep: nations for skill and valour at tea incomparable. As for money and other provision and furniture for the wars, it was needesle to discourse of, since they themselves knew well enough, that the realms of all Asia have alwayes flowed with gold, as their proper wealth. So as the Romans now were not to deal with Philip nor with Amnibal, the one a chief person among many of a City; and the other limited within the confines only of the kingdom of Macedonia, but with the great Monarch of all Asia yes, and of some part of Europe. And yet he, as might a potentate as he is (notwithstanding he is come to the utmost coasts and bounds of the Levant seas, to deliver and enfranchise Greece) demandeth nothing of the Achæans prejudicial to their fealty and allegiance to the Romans their frict allies and associats: for he required not them to take arms with him against them, but only not to intermeddle and take part: his seeking is, that as behoveth good friends and mediators between both parties they would all well and peace among them, and not interpoze themselves in a quarrel of war. Archidamus is wife the Embassador for the Eotians, requested in manner the same, that they would hold themselves quiet and in repose a thing most caufy and lasts from them) and being but lookers on the war, wait and attend the issue of others more fortunes, without the hazard of their own; yet he stated not so, but proceeded to M far and overthan himself so much in words, that he brake forth at length in ill language, one while riling against the Romans in general, another while against Quintus in particular; call- ing them ungrateful and unhankful persons, reproaching, upbraiding, and hitting them in their teeth, how not only they bad got the victory of Philip, but also savéd themselves by the virtue and valour of the Eotians: and as for Quintus, he was to thank them and their means, as much as his own life came to & the preservation of his army. For wherin at any time (god he) performed in the duty and devoir of General in the field? Seen him indeed I have in the time of battell and in the camp, take the flight of birds, kill sacrifices, and make vows very devoutly, like some holy parish-priest or divine Prophet, whiles I myself was in his defence to expose and present my body to lances and darts of the enemies. To these challenges Quintus made answer in this wise, saying, that Archidamus had more regard in whole preface the space, to them so he directed all his speeche for the Achæans know very well, that all the value of the Eotians, standeth in bragging words and not in martiall deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diets and assemblies rather then seen in the field and battell; and therefore no marvel if he made so small recking to speak unto the Achæans, considering that he knew, how well acquainted they were with the manners and fashions of the Eotians. But he hath besides vaunted and made great braggs before the King Embassadors, and in their person, before the King himself in absence. And if a man had not known before, what it was, and had to knit and united Antiocius and the Eotians, together, he might perceive it evidently by the speeches of the Embassadors: for by exchanging lies reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and puffed up one another with vain hopes, whiles they tell and would make them believable. That Philip by them was vanquished, that the Romans by their valour were protected; and other gay matters, which ere whyle heayd-building castles in the air; to the end, that you & other states and nations would side with them and take their parts: the King again (by his Embassadors) overspreading all with clouds of horsemens and footmen, and covereth whole seas with fleets and
and armidos. Now in faith this is mine hoft of Chaleis up and down, a friendly man I assure you, and a good fellow in his home, and one that knoweth how to entertain his guests and bid them welcome. And verily I can liken this manner of dealing to nothing better then to a fupper of his: We went upon a time to make merry with him, and I remember well it was not midsummer (when the days are longest and the sun at the hottest) where he made us passing good cheer. And as we wondered how at such a season of the year he met with that plenty of venison and such variety withal; the man (nothing so vainglorious as these fellows here) smiled pleasantly upon us and said, we were welcome to a feast of a tame twine and no better: but well fere is good cook my masters (q'd. he) who by his cunning hand, what with teasoning it, and what with ervaing it up with divers sauces, hath made all this fair show of wild fleg, and the fame of sumby forts. This may fully be applied to the King his armies and forces: of which even now to great boaft was made. For these his divers kinds of arms, these many names of nations never heard of before, to wit, the Dakes or Dithians (I wont not what to call them), the Medes, the Cadulians, the Elymenians, they are but Syrians when all is done; who for their base minds by nature, are much better to make a sort of slaves then a company of good lodgers. And would to God (you masters of Achaia) I could represent unto your eyes the port and train of this great King, when he tar from Demetrias, one while to Lamia to the counsellor of the Etoilians, and another while to Chaleis; you should see in the Kings camp hardly two pretty legionets; & tho' but lame ones neither and not well accomplished you should see the King sometime as good as beggaring grain of the Etoilians, to measure out among his hungry lodgers; otherwise making shift to take up monies at interest to make out their pay: now standing at the gates of Chaleis.

And anon shot out from thence and excluded clean: and when he had done nothing else but been Anilis and Euripus, returning fair into Aetia, Antiochus (you see) hath yeelded but small belfe to the Etoilians, and the Etoilians have as little trusted & relied upon the vanity of the King. And therefore the liefe should you be deceived by them, for nothing worse entertain your selves in it; for the fidelity of the Romans so often tried, so often known and approved. For whereas they say It is your best course not to be embarked and intere€tted in this war. I assure you, there is nothing more vain then this, may, nothing so hurtful unto your state. For you shall be a prize and prey to the victor, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quininius was thought by the Achaiaee to have spoken not im pertinently, but to have answered them both, fully and an easy matter it was to approve his speech unto those, that were well enough enclined to have given him gentle hearing: for that it was no question nor doubt at all, but that every man would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Achaiaean nation, whom the Romans held for theirs: yes, and would conclude in the end of an act, to denounce war both against Antiochus & the Etoilians. Moreover, according as Quininius thought good, they lent presenty an aid of 500 sollidiers to Chaleis, and of as many to Pyramus. For at Achaia there had like to have been a sedition and mutiny, whiles some drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and sold for money) to part with Antiochus upon hope of large rewards and great bounties, until such time as Quininius was sent for by them that took part with the Romans, in so much as Apollodorus (who gave counsell and perused to revolt) was accaled by one Leon, and being condemned, was banished. Thus verify the embassage returned from the Achaiaans to the King with present answer. The Boeotians delivered no certainty: this only was their answer. Thats when Antiochus himselfe was come in Boeotia, then they would consider and consult what they were best to do.

Antiochus was advertised, that both the Achaiaans and King Eumenes also had sent men for the defence of Chaleis, thought good to make half, that his forces might not only prevent them, but also if it were possible receive them and cut them short as they came. And for this intent, he sent Menippus with three thousand sollidiers or thereabout, and Polyxenia with his whole fleet. Himselfe a few days after marched with six thousand of his own sollidiers; and of that levy, which on a sudder might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Etoilians. Tho' five hundred Achaiaans stole afoot, and the small aid that King Eumenes sent under the conduct of Xenodches the Chalcidian, having lately passed Euripus before that the wates and passages were beate, arrived at Chaleis. The Achaiaans also who were upon five hundred, at what time as Menippus encamped before Salamis, came to Hermonnes, where is the passage out of Boeotia into the island of Euboea. In their company was Miltion sent as Embassador from Chaleis to Quininius, for to crave some succoure: who perceiving that the wates were laid and the strights kept by the enemies, leaving his intended journey by the way of Anis, turned to Delium, minding from thence to cut over into Euboea. This Delium is a temple of Apollo situated upon the sea strand, and five miles distant from Tanagra, from whence there is a short cut (little more than a league) over an arm of the sea unto the next parts of Euboea. In this Temple and sacred grove about it, to religious, so privilaged and secured (as are those franchised houses and sanctuaries which the Greeks call Aytla) and at that time, when neither war was proclaimed, or at least wise so far proceeded, except in the hearing and knowledge of any man there had been sword drawn, or blood shed in any place. In this place, and at this time, I say, whiles the sollidiers wandered at their leisure and pleasure, some gone to see the temple aboveaid and the grove, others walking upon the strand unarmed, and a great fort also of them scattered over the fields (such as were gone for forrage, and fewell all on a sudder Menippus finding them loose and disbanded, charged upon them and flew them, and to the number of fifty he took alive: very few escaped, among whom

Marcus Acilius Glabrio the Consul, with the aid of King Philip, vanquished King Antiochus, and drove him out of Greece. He also subdued the Aitolians. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, the Consul, reputed and judged by the Senate the best man in the City, dedicated the temple of the mother of the gods, whom himself had brought into the Palatium. He also, when he had overthrown the Boians, took them upon surrender to his protection, and triumphed over them. Other and besides, here are set down the prosperous battles fought at sea, against the admirals and captains of King Antiochus.

The six and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

So soon as P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneus, and M. Acilius Glabrio, the two Consuls were entred into their magistracy the LL of the Senat enjoyned them (before any speech or question moved as touching the provinces) to sacrifice greater beasts in all those temples, wherein the custom was for the more part of the year to celebrate the solemnity of Lechtemas, and to make their prayers in this manner. That whereas the Senat intended a new war, the gods would vouchsafe to blefe and happily conduct the cause to the good and publick weal of the Senat and people of Rome. All those sacrifices proved good and as they ought to be: the very first beasts that were slain, prognosticated fortunate success; and theewed apparent signs that the gods were pacified and well pleased. And thus the foot soldiers and bowell-priets, out of their learning, answered. It was evident, that by this war the bounds and limits of the Roman empire should be extended, and that both victory and triumph were forsignified. These answers being reported, and men's minds setted, and their conidences revolved of all furies as concerning the gods, then the LL of the Senat granted out an order, that a bill should be preferred solemnly unto the people in this form: Prosit to you, and to your will, that war should be encreas’d against Antiochus, and all that take his part; and if this bill pass and be granted, you are pleas’d, that the Consuls, if they think so good, refer the whole matter unto the Senat to take order for the managing thereof accordingly? P. Cornelius propounded this bill, and the people accepted thereof. Whereupon the Senat let down a decree that the Consuls should cast lots for the government of Italy and Grecia and that he whose lot it was to govern Grecia should (over and above that number of foildiers, which L. Quinctius by authority and commision from the Senat had for that province either enrolled or levied) receive that army also which M. Scaurus the Pretor caused to passe over the year before into Macedon, by virtue of an order from the Senat, in that behalf enacted. And licente he had, if need fo required, to take up and foildiers from among the allies without Italy, so as he exceeded not the number of five thousand. Also agreed it was, that L. Quinctius the Consul of the year before, should be deputed lord General for that war. As for the other Consul, unto whom had been allotted the charge of Italy, he was commanded to levy war against the Boii.
Bohills and to their choice, whether army he had rather have of those two which the former Cnulia conducted: and when he had received one, to send the other to Rome, that those legions or Citizens should be in readiness for to be sent whither it pleased the Senate. This order being taken in the Senate, astonishing the appointment and allignation of those provinces, then it was thought good that the new Consuls shall call lots for their governments. To Aelius befel Greece, and Italy to Cornelius. After this by a special lot there passed an act of the Senate. That whereas the people of Rome had ordained to wage the war at that time with cloth King Antiochus, and those that were under his dominion, the Consuls should cause a procession to be illuminated. All that the Consul M. Aelius should conceive and make a vow to Jupiter, for to celebrate the great Games in his honour, and to bring offerings to every star. This vow was by him pronounced in this form, according as P. Licinius the Arch-Priest endit and prompted unto him, If this war which the people hath determined to be enterprised and made against King Antiochus, shall be performed according to the mind and consentment of the Senate and people of Rome, then shall the people of Rome celebrate unto your honour, O Jupiter, the great Games for the space of ten days together, and oblations shall be brought to every Altar, of that price and amounting to that sum which the Senate shall ordain and set down. And what Magistrates forever shall bestow those Games, or in what places, yes, and at what time forever they shall be represented, the same Games shall be held for good, and reputed as well done, yes, and the offerings accepted as rightly presented. After this, there was published and proclaimed by both Cons. a supplication for the space of 12 days. When the Coin, had call lots for the partition of their governments, the Pretors likewise went presently about the fame for their provinces. To M. Junius Brutus tell both the jurisdictions, as well of the Citizens as aliens. A. Cornelius Africanus had the charge of the Bruni. M. Eumylus Lepidus of Sicily, and L. Opimus Salvator of Sardinia. C. Libius Salinator was L. Admiral of the navy, and L. Acu-mills Pius, governor of the nearer Spain. And in this manner following, were the armies and forces distributed and appointed. Unto A. Cornelius were assigned the new soldiers which the former year L. Quintus the Consul, by virtue of an Act of the Senate, had enrolled. And his commission was to defend and keep in order all that tract and coast about Aetium and Brundesium. As for L. Eumylus Pius, who was to take a voyage into the farther Spain, he was allowed (except the army which he was to receive of M. Fulvius the Pro-Pretor) to have the conduct of three thousand new soldiers footmen, and three hundred horse: so that of them, two third parts should consist of allies of the Latin nation, and one third of Roman Citizens. The supply was sent unto C. Flaminius into the higher Spain, whose commission was renewed for to have the command therewith. M. Eumylus Lepidus had commandment to receive the government of the province, and withall, the conduct of the army, at the hands of L. Valerius, whom he was to succeed: and if he thought it good, to keep with him in the Province L. Valerius, in quality and place of a Vice-Pretor: and so to divide the province, that the one part should reach from Aetium to Aetium, the other half from Aetium to Thapsus: that L. Valerius should defend the sea-coasts and the river with a fleet of twenty Galleys. The same Pretor aforesaid was to levy and gather a double tenth of corn, and to take order for the convoy thereof to the seas, and to be embarked and transported into Greece. The like commission had L. Opimus, to exact and take another tenth in Sardinia: but that grain was to be brought to Rome, and not to be carried over into Greece. C. Libius the Pretor, and Admiral of the navy, was appointed with 3000 sail ready rigged and armed, to sail into Greece with all speed, and to receive the ships that Aelius had: likewise to repay, rigge and furnish the old vessels that rid in the harbours, or lay stone side up in dock. M. Junius the Pretor his charge was, to levy marriners and rowers from among the libertins, for to serve that Armada. And there were sent Embassadors into Afric, to Carthage, and into Numidia, three into each part, for to seek and purvey corn to be sent into Greece, for which the people of Rome would make present payment. And to wholly employed was the City to prepare and take order for this war, that P. Cornelius the Consul published an Edict, that no Senators, or any that had authority to give their opinion in the Senate, neither any inferior Magistrats, should take any journey out of the City, farther than they might have return again the same day: Item, that there should not be five Senators absent at once from Rome. C. Libius the Pretor, whilsts he used all diligence and care to prepare and provide his fleet, was impeached and hindered a time, by occasion of a debate and contention that arose between him and the Coloners of the sea-side. For when they should be gathered and sent to sea, they appealed to the Tribunes of the Com. from whom they were put over and referred to the Senate: and the Senate with one voice and accord pronounced and determined, that these Coloners were not excepted from sea-service. The Colonies that contended with the Pretor about their immunity were these, Hosphina, Perga, Castrum novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Minturnae and Stunea. This done, the Consul Aelius by order from the Senate, consulted with the collodg of the Fel-ials or Heralds at arms, and demanded their advice, Whether the war should be proclaimed and declare given to Antiochus himself in person; or it were sufficient, to intimist and denote the same to some one of his garrisons? Also whether they would advise to proclaim war against the Aetiolans apart by themselves: or whether it were not more convenient first to disclaim and renounce their societie and friendship, and then to proclaim and denote hostilities? The Felials answered, that heretofore they had determined and elected this point, at what time as their

The opinion was touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter whether the defiance were given him to his face, or only intimated to some garriions of his And as for the Etolians, this was their mind, that they had quit already their amity, and abandoned all society, in that when our Embassadors to oftentimes had demanded amends for wrongs done, they never thought good to make restitution or satisfaction. Moreover, the Etolians had themselves sent defiance first and proclaimed war against the Romans, when as by force they seized Demetrias a City of our allies, and advanced before Chalcis to affail it both by land and sea; and lastly, in that they had solicited King Antiochus and brought him into Europe for to levy war against the Romans. All things now being sufficiently provided, M. Acilius the Conful published an edict and proclaimed, That all those soldiers whom a. Q. Q. Quintinius had enrolled, likewise all those whom he had levied of the allies of the Latine nation, who were to go with him into his province, likewise all the Colonels and Marshals of the second and third legion, should render themselves, and be ready altogether at Brundisium upon the * Ides of May following. Himself upon the * fifth day before the Nones of the same month departed forth of the City clad in his rich coat of arms. And at the same time the Pretors also took their journeys into their several provinces. Much about that time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from two Kings, to wit, Philip of Macedons, and Ptolomey King of Egypt, promising their aid of men, money, and corn for that war. And besides from Ptolomeus there was brought * 1000 pound weight in gold, and the weight of * 2000 pound weight in silver; whereof nothing was received, but much thanks rendred to both the Kings. And whereas both of them offered to come with all their power into Acteia, and to be there in person, Ptolomeus was discharged of that offer of his, but the Embassadors of Philip received this answer, That he should highly please and content the people of Rome, in case he would not fail the Conful M. Acilius. In like manner there came Embassadors from the Carthaginians and Mavafus, The Carthaginians made promise of * 1 thousand and Modii of Wheat, and of barley five hundred thousand for the army, and likewise to bring half so much to Rome; praying the Romans to accept the same at their hands as a free gift and gratuity; adding moreover, that they would man out a fleet at their own charges, and were ready also to make one entire payment of their tribute behind, which they were of duty to pay by sundry terms of many years. The Embassadors of Mavafus, promisedit the behalf of their King, to send five hundred thousand Modii of wheat, * 30000 of barley into Greece to the army, besides 500 men of arms and twenty Elephants, unto M. Acilius the Conul. As touching the corn, this answer was returned to them, that they should accept thereof, so that they would take money therefore to the war. As to the fleet foresaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them clean, save as many ships as they were to find and provide according to the tenor of the accord and composition between them. Left of all, concerning the tribut mony, none would they receive before the day.

Whilesthe affairs passed thus at Rome, Antiochus being at Chalcis, because he would not sit still and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himself solicited (by sending Embassadors) the minds of the States, and partly also there came unto him Embassadors from thence of their own accord: and namely, among others, the Epirots presented themselves to the common consent of their whole nation, and the Eleusinians came out of Peloponnesus. They of Elis craved aid against the Achæans, who (they verily thought) would take arms against their City, because war was denounced against Antiochus nothing to their will and good liking. Unto them were sent 7000 footmen under the leading of Ephetaes the Cretienian. The Embassage of the Epirots, plied with both hands, meaning to deal roundly and firmly with no side, but to go between the bark and the tree. Gladly they would make court to the King and cury favour with him, but so, as they stood in good terms still with the Romans, whom they were both to offend. For their requent to him was, that he would not draw them without great and important cause into the quarrel, considering that for the defence of all Greece they open and exposed to Italy, and were lure before others to feel the Romans fingers, and receive their first affaile. But in case he were able of himself with his forces by land and sea to defend Epirus, and furnish it with garrisons sufficient, they would with heart and good accept of him and his into their Cities & port-towns: but if he be could not effect that, they befough him not to offer them, naked and unarmed men, to the violence of the Roman wars. Their drift was in that embassage (as it appeared) that if the King and his forces came not into Epirus (as they rather thought may then yea) they might reserve themselves and all they had, safe, entire, and at their own liberty for the Roman armies, and win withall the Kings good grace in that they seemed to make an offer to deceive him: or if any came indeed, yet they might conceive good hope to find favours, and have pardon at the Romans hands, in that they had not expected their succours being so far off but rather yielded to the forces of Antiochus being present there in person. In such fort they carried themselves in their embassage so perplexed and intricate, that the King knew not well how to answer them ready: but said, that he would send his own Embassadors unto them for to talk and treat of all affairs pertaining in common as well to them as to him. Then went he himself to Beatus, which country in colour and thew pretended these causes of anger and spight against the Romans, that before I have mentioned, to wit, the murder of Barcellas, and the armies by Quamvus levied against Coronea, occasioned by a massacre committed upon Roman soldiers; but in very truth this was the reason. The singular discipline and order of that nation in old time, was going downward and endlong many many years and ages already, and the popular government of many, grown to decay and ruin, which cannot possibly continue long without some change and alteration of State. Well, to The-ber he came, where all the principal and chief States of Britans came flocking from all parts to meet him. Where in the General Diet and Council of that Nation (notwithstanding he had founded the battle, and began the fray already by giving the first blow, in that he had forced the Roman army near Deltius and Chalzeus, which were no small signs nor double full overtures of war, yet he began with the same kind of speech he first used in the parle and conference at Chalzeus, and which his Embassadors had followed in the general assembly of the Achians, namely, demanding that they would enter into amity with him, without professing themselves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hostility against them. But there was no man there but soon found him and law him well enough how well there passed an act and decree in favour of the King against the Romans, under a vain and flight pretext and colourable shew of words. Having gained this nation also, he returned to Chalzeus from thence he sent out his letters before unto the States of the Achian, that they should meet him in Demetrias, where he would confer and consult with them of all their affairs to be managed, and thither he came he by at the day appointed. Aminander also was sent for out of Athamania to this consultation, yes, and Anabialt the Carthaginian (whole counsell was not required along time) was present at this frequent Diet and Assembly. Much parle and great opening there was as touching the nation of the Thessalians; and all there in place were of opinion, that they should be found out how they floods affected: but about the manner and some circumstance thereof, they were of diverse minds, while some advised it to be done and executed out of hand: others thought good to put it off from winter feast (considering now they were in the midst thereof) unto the prime and beginning of spring: others again said, that Embassadors only should be sent: and some hot-spurs there were, that gave counsell to go against them with all their forces, yes, and to fright and terrifie them if they made flight but. Now when all the heat and difficulty of this deliberation confluxeth in one point, Anabialt was requested by name to deliver his mind and speak to the cause in question: who turned the King and all that were present from other wandering cogitations, and induced them to the entire consideration of the total war; and to this effect framed his speech in this wise. If since the time that we passed over into Greece, my head had been to be called to any council, when so some question was touching Enbus, the Achæan, and the Britons, I, had delivered what advice then, which now I purpose to utter this day in the question concerning the Thessalians. Above all things my counsell is, that Philip and the Macedonians may by all means possibly be wrought to this our association.

D in the war. For as touching Enbus, the Achæan, and the Thessalians, who doubteth, but that they (as nations that stand upon their own bottoms and are of no force by themselves) will alwates flatter them that are present in place, and be ready to crave pardon upon the same fear they ever when they are to take counsell and resolute who doubteth (I say) but to soon as they shall see the Roman army in Greece, they will turn to their accustomed obedience, and that it will be imputed to them no fault at all, that when the Romans were far off, they were not willing to try the forces of you a pritifant Prince in person among them) or of your armies? How much rather ought we then, may, how much better and more important would it be, to joynt Philip unto us then thefe? For he once enter into the cause and be seen in action, he cannot possibly last from us nor draw his head out of the collar: and moreover, he brings in that power with him, which is not to be held for a simple adduction & addition to our forces, but such only of it tell without the help of others, was able to make head against the Roman puifiance. Let me have this prince on my side, and be it spoken without offence of any man here) what need I doubt of the sequel & issue? especially when those, by whole means & assistance the Romans prevailed against Philip, I see now ready to enter the field against them? The Euliots (I say) who as all the world knew with quaffed Philip, shall now together with Philip, enter into arms and fight against them. Over and besides, Aminander and the whole nation of the Athenians (whole service in the war, next to the Euliots, flood the Romans in beet (read) shall be on our side, Philip at that time (O King Antonius) jointained the fight and burden of the whole war, when you sat still and stirred not: now both of you together, two molt mighty monarchs, with the puifance of all Asia and Europe, (all wage war against one City and people, which to speak nothing of mine own fortune good or bad) certainly in our fathers days were not able to make their part good with one only King of the Epirots: how hardly ever they will be when they shall be marched with you both together. But what moved me to think yea, and assured me, that Philip may be won unto us in joynt this action? One thing is this, a common good and benefit even the greatest bond that is of society: and yet there is another besides it, namely, an inducement proceeding from you that be here of Euliota: for Thos your Embassador (who is prefent in place) among other matters that he was wont to alledged for to animat & move Aniobitus to come into Greece, evermore allured him of this principally, and vowd that Philip grumbled, bit the lip and freted, that under the colour and shew of peace, there were imposed upon him hard conditions of servitude and slavery. And he verily, I mean those, let out the fell anger of the King, and with all his words compared it to the wood rage of a wild beast bound with chains or being enclosed in some cage, would willingly break the gates and bars thereof. Now, if he be disposed thus, and of that courage, let us burst his bonds asunder, let us (I say) force open his iron cage, that his rage pent up to long may now break out upon the common enemies. And suppose suppose that our embassage effect nothing at his hands; yet may we provide and take order, that if we cannot work and win him to side with our selves, yet that he shall not combine and band our enemies. Your Ion Selene is now: Lysimachus, who shall not to soon with the forces which he hath about him, begin to invade and wall (by the way of Thrace) the confines of Macedonia, but he shall withdraw and turn Philip clean away (from giving succour to the Romans) to the defence especially of his own. Thus have you heard mine advice as touching Philip: now for the while course and managing of the war, what mine opinion was you have not been ignorant of from the first beginning. If then, I might have had mine own waijs, and my counsell had been taken, the Romans should not have received intelligences of the taking of Chalcis in Euboea, not of the facing and winning of a little pile upon Enris; but they had been heard by this, that all the coast of the Ligurians and of the Citharine was up in arms and on a light fire of war; and (which would have feared and frightened them most) that Amphil was in Italy. And (now things standing as they do) my advice is, that you lend for all your forces both by land and sea. Let your caracks and hulks with victuals and provision follow after your armado & ships of war. For in this place, like as we are too few to perform any martial exploits, so we are too many, considering our small store of victuals. And when you rallied and united all your force together, divide your navy in two parts: the one you shall keep in the rode of Corcyra, to impeach the Romans, that they shall not passe in safety and security, the other you shall cause to fall unto that coast of Italy which looketh toward Sardinia and Africa. Your self in proper person, with all your land army shall march onward into the territory of the Bylliones: thence shall ye have good means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romans believe, that you are upon the point to pass the seas, yea, and being ready indeed to crosse over if need should require. This generally is my counsell mine. I say, who as I will not take upon me a singular skill in all kinds of war, so me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby, as well to my selfe as advantage, and as much with my good as harm, & look whatsoever designement I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithfull and forward in the execution thereof: and the gods approve and blest that course, which your self shall think the best. To this effect, in a manner, was the oration of Annibal directed, which all these were in place and heard it, rather praiseth for the present, than put in practice and executed afterwards, for no one thing was done of all that he had said, save only Antiochus lent Polycenus a dour navy and army out of Asia; yes, there were Embassadors also dispatched to the General Diets of the Thessalians. A day was appointed for the Etolians and Amnion to meet the army at Phere, whither King Antiochus came freights after with his power. And whiles he stayed there, expecting Amnion and the Etolians, he sent out one Philip a Megapolitan, with two thousand men to gather out the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cyzicus, where the war with Philip was determined, and the quarter decyded by a famous battell: were it that therein he followed his own head and took a concurs, whereby to wind himself into grace and favour with the Macedonian Nation. And seeing the King into obloque and disgrace, because he left his fieldiers unburied; for that, as it is the wont (or vanity rather) engraffed in Kings by kind, he set his mind and bufied his spirits in matters, for appearence gay and goodly, but in effect fond & foolish. There he made a mount (as it were) of a number of bones gathered together in one place, that lay scattered and firedew here and there: a thing no doubt, that the Macedonians conned him no thank for, and which Philip (you may well) took in soul torment and malicious disdain. And therefore Philip, who at that time minded to take counsell of Fortune, and to be directed by her, as she enclosed now, sent to Marcus Babuns the Vice-Prent, and advertised him, how Antiochus invaded Thessaly, and if it pleased him to fit him out of his winter habour, he would meet him, that they might confer both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Phere, where Amnion and the Etolians had rejoined with them, there came Embassadors from Laris, expostulating, Wherein the Thessalians had to offended either by deed or word, that he would molest and trouble them with war? and withall becheching him to retire & withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought against them) by his Embassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in armes, well appointed, under the government of Hippolochus, to lie there in garrison, who because they could not pash either, by reason that all the avarenes were feizid and kept by the Kings forces, returned to Scoas. As for the Embassadors of the Larisians, the King made them a gracious answer, and said, that he was entered into Thessaly, not by way of hostility to divertise them, but in friendly manner to maintain and establishe the free dome of the Thessalians. Likewise he sent an Embassador to Phere, to signifie so much to them and in the same terms. But the Phereans giving him no answer again, dispatched unto the King an Embassador of their own, one Panetios, a principal man of their City. Who after he had pleaded the semblable remonstrances to thowe, that had been in the like case alleged and laid forth in the behalf and name of the Chaldeians, in that Counsell holiden near the worshipt of Enris, and besides, uttered something else with more boldness and courage; the King dismissioned him, after he had willed them to consider more of the matter, and be well advised, that they took not that counsel which soon they would repent, whiles they sought to be too wary, provident, and forsetting the future time. When this embassage was relaxed at Phere, the Citizens took no long time to deliberate, but soon resolved in the maintenance of their faith and loyalty to the Romans for to undergo whatsoever hazard the the fortune of war should present unto them. Whereupon both they addressed themselves to defend the City with all their might, and also the King began to assault and batter the walls on all parts at once. And knowing well enough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the line of the siege of that City which he first enterprised, lay the whole importance and consequence of all, either to make him defirous ever after, or feared and dreaded of the Thessalians, therefore he terrified the besieged inhabitants, on every side, and by all means possible that he could devise. The first assault they sustained stoutly and manfully; but afterwards seeing many of the defenders were either overthrown and slain, or grievously hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quail; yet restrained by the rebukes and chastisements of their captains and leaders, and animated by their earnest exhortations, to persist still in their purpose and resolution. They quit the utmost compass of their wall (seeing what default they were for want of men) and retired themselves more inward into the City, into one part thereof, which was strongly fortified with a mere and least circuit and compass than the other. At the length, overcame with travail and calamities, and fearing that if they were forced and taken by assault, they should find no mercy nor pardon with the conqueror, they yielded themselves. The King following the train of victory, delayed no time, but whiles the night was fresh, sent four thousand armed men presently to Scarpia, where the towns-men made no stay, butrendred the town and themselves incontinent, having before their cries the fiercest bleeding example of the Pelasgians, who named by force and woful miseries, were compelled to do that which they obstinately refus'd at the first. Together with the City it was surrendered into Hippolochus and the Larissæan garrison under his hand. All of them the King sent away without any hurt or violence offered unto their persons: for he thought thereby to win the hearts and love of the Larissæans. Having accomplished these exploits within ten days after his first coming into Phœna, he marched towards Creusa with all his army, and at his first coming won it. Then he reign'd and seiz'd Cyprea and Metropolis, and the boroughts & forts about them: so now all those quarters were subdued and put under his subjection, except Aetia and Greece. Then he determined to affaile Larissa, supposing, that upon the fearful terror of other Cities forced, or in regard of his desirous in dismiffing the garrisons too, and by the present example of so many Cities yielded unto him, they would not long persist in their obstinacy. And for to terrifie them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in the forefront of the vanguard, and approached himself in square battell, with four sides, in such fort as the hearts of many of the Phœnaeans wag'd in doubtfull suspense, between forced fear of present enemies, and kind regard of absent friends.

In this time Aemilius, with the whole youth and manhood of the Athamans, became master of Pelinoeum, Menippus also with three thousand Eolian footmen and two hundred horse went to Pericném, won Meline and Cyzicus by assault, and wafled the territory of Tripolis. Having performed these exploits, and made war and to the King, and arrived even then when the expedition was in conclusion what to do with Larissa: for the council was divided into diverse opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly, and not to defer and assaile the Cities wals with fabrics and engines of batterie on all sides at once, alleging that the town being fixtuated in a plain towards the champain field side, might be approached unto with ease and invad'd every way. Others again infected one white that there was no comparison between the strength of this City and of Phœna: other while that it was now winter time, and a feacon of the year far unfit for warlike executions, and most of all other for the siege and assault of Cities. As the King thus hung in the equal balleance of hope and despair, the Embassadors of Phœnaeans arrived, who, as good hap was, being come to surrender up their town, revived his spirits and mightily comforted his heart.

M. Babius in this mean while having parlied and conferred with Philip in the Dafarétians country, went Appius Claudius by the common advice of them both to the succour and defence of Larissa; who passed through Macedon, and by long journeys came to the top of those hills that command Creusa. Now this Creusa is a towne twenty miles distant from Larissa, lest the hill in the very high bights of that forsall and paffe called Tempe, who having taken up a larger circuit of ground to encamp in, was then proportionable to his number, and made more fires in thev then needed was for that company, gave semblance unto the enemy (which was the thing he aimed at,) that all the Roman forces were there, together with King Philip. King Antiochus therefore preeting unto his army, that the unseasonable winter that approached, after he had layed one only day before Larissa, dislodged, and thence departed, and to returned to Demetrius. The Eolians likewise and Athamanans repaired to their own countries.

Appius and Philip, though the siege was levied (which was the only caufe of his coming) yet down and a two-fold joy was there, both because the enemies were gone and bad quitt their country, and also for that they saw the Roman garrison within their walls. King Antiochus departed from Demetrius to Chalced, where he fell in love and love with a dam'cell of that City, daughter of Cleopatra a Chalcidian. Now after he had made means to the maidens father hirft by intercession of messengers and mediators, and after by importuning him in his own person with earnest requests by word of mouth (who was very loth and unwilling to entangle & tie himself in marching her high above his own calling) at length to overcome the man, that he obtained his desire: and as if it had been a time of settled and confirmed peace, he proceeded to confinamate and celeb brat the marriage. And forgetting clean, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two affairs so important, to wit, the war with the Romans, and the deliverance of Greece, he passed away the rest of the winter in feasts and banquets, and in those delights and pleasures, which ordinarily (you not well) follow upon the liberal drinking of wine; yes, and when he had ther-by rather wearied his body then inflamed his appetite, he gave him to leep without compeffe.
The like riot and loose life took hold of the rest of the Kings captains, by example in all places, but in Boetia especially, such as commanded the garrisons. Nay, the very foildiers were let loose and given over to take voluptuous ways, and not one of them would put on armor, keep the watch, tend the guard, or do any thing pertaining to the duty and charge of a foildier. And therefore at the beginning of the spring, when he was come by Phocis and Chersones to the Rendez-vous, where he had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, he soon perceived that the foildiers had spent the winter as licentiously as their leaders, and kept no better order and obfcrvcr discipline.
Then he commanded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the army to Stratuia, a town in Acroos. Himself having done sacrifice at Delphi to the honour of Apollo, he went forward to Naupactum. And after the Diet held of all the States of Etolia, in the way which leadeth to Stratuia, along by Chaeris and Lyjumbas, he encountered his own forces afores caid, that came by the gulf of Malia. Where Muefobochus, a Principal Acarnanian, but wroght and bought with many gifts and presents, not only himself won that nation to take part, & to side with the King, but also had drawn to his own mind and affection Clitus their Preror, who at that time had the sovereign rule there, and might do all in all. He feeling that the Leucadians (who are the chief of all the Acarmians) could not be easily induced nor brought to releivi, for the awe wherein they flood of the Roman fleet, which either was with Attius, or about Cephale nia, went cunningly to work with them. For having delivered his opinion in their generall Council, that the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended; and that as many as were able to bear arms should go forth to Medio and Tyrrephon, for fear those places should be feized by Antrocochus and the Etolians: there were again fome who made answer and faw, how there was no fuch need that all Should be raised and leived to tumultuously in faft; for a garrifon of five hundred men was fufficient. And when he had obferved that number of young & able men, he placed three hundred of them in garrifon at Medio, and two hundred at Tyrrephon: his reach and drift was to have them put into the Kings hands, for hostages. And even at that time arrived the Kings Embaffadors at Medio, whole embaffage being heard, they laid their heads altogether and confused in the publick assembly what answer to return unto the King. Some were of opinion to continue still in the Roman fociety: others were of advice again, that the Kings offer of amity was not to be refenct. The counell of Clyma was mean and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted, to wit, that they should adrefs the Embaffadors to the King, to in treat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of fuch confec quence in a full Diet of the Acarmians. In this Embaffage Mufelochus, and those of his faction were employed of fet purpose: who having dispatched meffengers covertly to King, to ad ter him to approach the town with his forces, filled out the time themselves, and made no haft to fet forward in their embaffade, Whereupon thes Embaffadors were fearely gone forth of the City, when Antrochoth was entered the borders, and soon shewed himself hard at the gates.
And whereas they that with nothing of this treafon were affifted, and in great trouble and tur moil, called the youth hastily to arm, he was by Clymas and Muefobochus let into the City. Some willingly of themelves came running about the King: thofo alfo that were of the adverfe part, for very feer joined with him, Whom he feeing to be afraid and terrified, he entertained with gracious words, and by gently handled them, that in hope of his clemency to much divulged and spoken of abroad, certain States of Acarnania revolted and turned unto him. Then from Me dio he went to Tyrrephon, unto which place he had lent Muefobochus and his Embaffadors afore hand, But the treachery and deciet at Medio being discoured, made the Tyrrephoners more wary and careful generals to shut their gates, and dipofed armed men upon their wafts. Nowit fell out very fully and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarmians, that Ca Odorbus sent by Quintus, having receiv'd a garrifon and some few fhips of A. Pafhebunus, who by Attius the Lenucian had been appointed Governour of Cephaleinia, was come to Leucus, and and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope, who also gave them to understand, that M. Accius the Confal had already paffed the fefs with his legions, and the Romans were encamped in Thesfaly. And for as much as this bruit carried a great likelihood of truth, by reafon that the refion of the yeafl served now for navigation, the King after he had planted a garrifon at Medio and in other towns of Acarnania, departed from Tyrrephon, and paffing through the Cities of Etolia and Phocis, returned to Choletis.

Much about the time M. Barcinus and King Philip, who had communed and devi'ded toge ther before (during the winter) in the Dafcarctians country, having lent Appius Claudius into Thesfaly, for corralize the fife before Laraffa: and because the feon then was unmeet and too soon for execution of any exprefs, were retir'd to their winter harbours, now in the begin ning of the Spring joyned all their forces together and came down into Thesfaly. (Now at that time was Amieobus in Acarnania.) And at their first coming, Philip began to lay fife unto Malia.
A. Malles and Babius to Phocion: which when he had forced in manner at the first assault, he won Phocion also with like expedition. From whence having retired himself to Arras, he took Chrysias, and so consequentially surpris'd Evritium; and after he had placed garrisons in those towns that he had thus recovered, he joyned with Philip again lying in siege before Malles. Upon the very coming of the Roman army, when the townsmen had yielded themselves either for fear of forces, or for hope of pardon, they marched joyfully together with one army to recover those towns whereof the Athenians were seiz'd: to wit, Evritium, Evritium, Gomphi, Skala, Troia, Melibe, and Potosia. After this they invected Pelleneum, where Philip the Megapolitan lay in garrison with five hundred foot, and forty horse: but before they gave the assault, they sent a trumpet to Philip to give him warning, that he should not adventure to try the utmost hazard. But he returned this answer again right stoutly unto them, that he would be content to commit himself to the Romans or the Thebians; he passed not whether, but put his life and estate into the hands of King Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and for that it seemed that Malles also at the same time might be assaulted, it was thought expedient that the King should go to Limnae, and Babius hard till to batter and fort: the town of Pelleneum.

It fortuned at the same time that M. Acilius the Consul, having passed the seas with a power of 10,000 foot, and 2,000 horse and fifteen Elephants, commanded certain chosen Colonels of footmen to conduct all the Infantry to Larissa, whiles himself with the Cavalry came to King Philip before Limnae. At the coming of the Consul the town was yielded ineffectually: the Kings garrisons were delivered, and the Athenians withal. Then the Consul went from Limnae to Pelleneum, where the Athenians yielded first; and afterwards Philip also the Megapolitan rendered himself. And as he came down from the fort, Philip the King chanced to meet with him: and in Korn and derision commanded his men to salute him with the title of King, and himself also by way of mockery came close unto him, and greeting him by the name of brother Philip, scoffing and jeering in broad terms, for unuttering. I wot, his royal Majesty. Then was he brought before the Consul, and put in ward, and not long after sent bound to Rome. All the multitude besides of the Athenians, as also of King Antiochus his father, which were within the garrisons of those towns that were surrendered about that time were delivered unto Philip, who amounted to the number of 3,000. The Consul departed to Larissa to consult and take advice for the general course of the whole war. And in his way there met him Embassadors from Persia and Macedon, for to render their cities Philip having courteously and lovingly intreated above all other the prisoners of the Athenians, that by their means he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceived some hope to conquer Athens. That they led his army thither, and sent his captives aforesaid into their several cities. Now they were of great account and reputation among their co-intimers, and withall made report of the King's clemency toward them, and how liberally and bountifully besides he aided them: And Aminander verily, whose presence and majesty had kept some of them in allegiance, tearing left he should be delivered into the hands of Philip (who long time had been his mortal enemy) and unto the Romans, whom he knew to have just cause at that time to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his own Realm with his wife and children, and retired himself to Ambraeia. Thus all Athens became subject to King Philip, and at his pleasure.

The Consul sojourned certain daies at Larissa, especially for to refresh his beasts, which first had been fatick, and afterwards were tired with long travel; and thus when he had renewed, as it were, and repaired his army with a little rest and repose, he marched to Crete. At his coming thither, those towns, to wit, Phoebus, Scarpas, and Phere, together with King Antiochus his garrisons that lay there, were yielded up unto him. And having put unto their choice, either to be gone or carry still with him: as many of them as he law willing (and those were about a thousand) he delivered up to King Philip; the rest he sent back disarmed to Demetrias. Then he regained Crete and the fortresses and places about it. Then began he to conduct forward his army toward the gulph of Malles, and when he saw the fruits of the siege upon which the town Thamas was situated, all the flower of the youth in their armour quit the City, and put themselves in ambush about the woods and passages; and from the higher ground charged upon the Romans in their march. The Consul at the first lent certain unto them, to parley at hand with them, and to see if they could scare them from such desperate outrage: but perceiving that they persisted still as they began, he commanded a Colonel with two ensigns of footmen to fetch a compas about; in such sort, that he got between these armed men and the town, and kept them from entrance; whereby he put fled himself of the City, being void of defendants. They that lay in the forest in ambush, hearing an outcry behind their backs of the town taken, fled backward out of all parts of the wood, and fell upon the sword. The Consul then departed from Thamas, and the second day came as far as the river Sporimbus, and so forward unto the territory of the Hyphasis, which he spoiled.

During the time of these occurrences, Antiochus lay at Chalced, who by this time seeing that he had gotten in Greece, but the pleasure of one winning, spent to deliciously in Chalced, and a dishonourable marriage: began to blame the Etrurians for their vain promises, and especially Tharist; but Annibal had in great admiration, respecting him not only for a sage and prudent man, but also for a true Prophet, who foretold him of all things that then were come to pass: howbeit for fear that his cold flackness might not overthrow that quiet, which his rash folly had begun and he undertook; he sent out his couriers into the country, to give them warning to levy all their youth and assemble them together; and himself for his own part had brought thither almost 10,000 footmen, who were made up full and furnished by them that after came out of Asia, and 500 horsemen besides. To this place perceiving that there repaired smaller numbers by many degrees than ever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles only and some few of their vassals, who professed, that they had done their endeavor to levy out of their Cities as many as possibly they could: but neither by authority, nor for love and favour, nor yet with absolute command, were they able to prevail or do any good with them that refused warfare; and seeing himself thus forsaken on all sides, as well of his own subjects who dragged behind in Asia, as of his allies who performed not those matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to assist them, he withdrew himself within the strictness of Thermopyla.

This mountain divides Greece in the very middle, like as Italy is parted in twain by the ridge of the Appennines. On the fore-part of this straight and forest and of Thermopyla toward the North lyeth Epirus and Perraebus, Magnesia and Thessaly, also the Phthiot of Aches, and the gulf of Melos; but more southward is discovered the greatest part of Eotolia and Acaarnia, Phociæ, Locriæ, and Boeotia, together with the Illiad and the Pont and the Wetter of Greece, reacheth through Eotolia to the Lacedemonians, and is full of rocks and rough crags between, that no whole armies, nor so much as single travellers lightly appointed, can find so hard to find the paths and ways to pass with, the untold hundreds and the hills of this mountain bending toward the west, they call Orestes and the highest pitch and knop thereof, is called Callidromos; at the foot whereof lyeth the valley leading toward the gulf of Melos, wherein the plain is not above three-score paces broad. And this is the only high and port-way by which an army may march, if it be not otherwise empeached; and heretofore it is, that the passage is called "Pylos: and of some because there are found therein certain natural hot waters or baths." Thermopylae: even that very place which is so famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Lacedemonians, more than for any worthy battall against the Persians. Here lay encamped Antiochus at this present, carrying nothing that mind nor resolution as those Lacedemonians did within the gates as it were of the straits, where he could and stopped the passage besides, with strong defences; and when he had cast a double rampire and trench, yea, and raised a mure and wall where need was (which to do the place afforded him great plenty of stone lying every where) and had made all sure; presuming confidently that the Roman army would never venture nor be able to break through those barricades that way: he sent of those 4000 Eotolians (for so many were met together) home to keep a garrison in Heraclea, situate even before the very guller and straight; and others to Hiipus: for that he made no doubt but the Conful would assall Heraclea, and many posts brought word that all about Hipses was already wafted.

Now the Conful having spoiled the territory of Hiipus first, and then of Heraclea, (where the Eotolians aids did no good and served to no purpose in the one place or the other) pitched his camp over against the king, even in the very mouth of the gullet, near the foot of the hot waters aforesaid: both those regiments above-named of the Eotolians were got within the town Heraclea, and there kept them there fore, Antiochus, who before he saw his enemies, thought all was done enough and sufficiently fenced, began then to fear lest the Roman soldiers would find out some privy paths and ways, whereby they might pass and get over those high hills that commanded the pass for a romout ran, that the Lacedemonians in times past were so enclosed by the Persians, and of late days also King Philip was likewise compassed and environed by these very same Romans. Whereupon he dispatched a messenger to the Eotolians in Heraclea, willing them to do him thus much service yet in thee his wars, as to seize the tops of those hills and to keep them that the Romans might have no passage that way. Upon this message received, there arose some difference among the Eotolians. Some were of mind to obey the king his will and commandment, and so to go accordingly; but others thought better to carry full fast at Heraclea, to attend upon fortune and see what would happen: to the end, that if the king should chance to be vanquished by the Conful, they might have in readiness their forces fresh and in hearts, to succour and aid their own Cities near at hand; or if his luck were to defeat the Conful, then might they follow the Romans in their chase, when they were disbanded and scattered and dissipate. Both parts, thus divided as they were, not only persisted still in their severall enufugions, but also put the fame in execution by themselves. For two thousand of them remained at Heraclea; the other two thousand parted themselves three ways, namely, to Callidromos, to Rhodanias, and Tichinaus (there are the names of three principal high hills) and each company took and held one. The Conful when he saw that the Eotolians were resolved of these higher places, sent M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus, two of his Lieutenants (who both had been Conuls) with two thousand chosen men against these holds of the Eotolians, to wit, Flaccus against Rhodanias and Tichinaus, and Cato against Callidromos; himself before that he advanced his battell against his enemies, made a brief speeche unto his fooldiers in this manner: "My fooldiers, I fee that the most part of you even of every quality and degree, are they that in this very Province sometime served under the conduct, charge, and government of T. Quintinius the Macedonian war. The straits a of that passage thence, near the river Axios, were far more difficult to gain and get over than this is; for here are very great seas, and one natural way (as it were) to pass through, as if all else were flopped up between two seas. There were more stronger defences and sconces against them at that time, and those placed in places more convenient and commodious. The army of the enemies then, was both for number greater & for men & forces much better: for therein were the Macedonians, the Thracians, and the Illyrians: all most fierce and warlike nations: in this are Syrians and Attic Greeks, or haif Alains, the venient kind of people of all others, and born to serve. The King there, namely Philip, a most noble warrior exercised and instructed ever since his youth in the neighbouring wars of the Thracians and Illyrians. & all the nations bordering upon him: but this Antiochus (to say nothing of all his life besides) is he, who being come out of Asia into Europe, for to make war upon the people of Rome, hath done all the long winter time noththing more memorable than this. That for to please his wanton heart, he had taken to wife the daughter of a privy person, a man (I say) of low degree and base quality among other Citizens: & this new married man. filled fat and franked as (I may say) with divint hugely & delicate bride-bankets. He was so forth to fight a battle. His whole strength and all his hope hath been in the Etolians; a people of all others most vain, unconstant, and unthankful, as ye have tried hereof afore, and Antiochus findeth true at this present. For neither assembled they in great number nor possible was it to keep them together in the camp: nay, which more is, they mutine an-among themselves, and having demanded and required the guard of Hyrcania and Heraclea, they have denied neither the one nor the other. Some of them are fled to the tops of the mountains; others that have themselves within Heraclea. The King himself hath conciled plainly, that he was never so hardy as to meet in plain field and afront the enemy, no, nor (much as to pitch his camp in open ground; in that abandoning all that country before him which he vaunted and bragged that he had taken from us and Philip, he hath hidden himself among the rocks.
He hath not encamped before the entrance of the gullet and straits (as the fame goeth of the Lacedemonians in times past) but pitched his tents far within. And to bewray his cowardly feat. What difference is there between fo doing, and having himself within the walls of some City for to be besieged? But neither shall those narrow straits fave him no more than those sleep hills defend the Etolians, which they have seized. This one thing hath been forecast and provided for on all sides, that ye shall have nothing to make head against, but your enemies, now mult ye resolve upon this point. That ye fight not only for the liberty of Greece (and yet even this also were a brave and honourable title, to be said fo to deliver the fame now out of the hands of Antiochus and the Etolians, which before you freed from King Philip) nor that ye shall have no other reward and recompence for your pains, but that which we shall find now in the King's camp, but also that the great provision and furniture which daily is expected from Ephesus shall be your prize and booty, and that ye shall hereafter make a way for the Roman Empire into Asia, and all those most wealthy and rich Realms, even as far as to the Levantian. And what shall us then, but that from Gods to the red sea we bound and limit our State and Dominion, even with the very Ocean that environeth and compasseth the round globe of the earth? What shall hinder us, I say, but that all the nations of the world shall honour and worship the Roman name next unto the immortal gods? Prepare your hearts therefore and courage, answerable to so high rewards, that with the leave and help of the gods we may to morrow fight a field. After this speech the assembly brake up, and the soldiers being dismiffed, made ready their armor and weapons, before they took repast or repose. And in the morning, by dawning of the day, the Consul put out the signall of battle, and set his army in array, with a narrow and pointed front, according to the nature and lengthfulness of the place. The King seeing the enigns of his enemies, led forth his forces like wise. Part of his light armes, he planted before the rampier and trench in the forefront, then he placed the flower and strength of the Macedonians, whom they call Sarissphoni, i.e. Pikemen, for the fery and safeguard of his defenses and fortifications. And to flank these on the left side, he put the archers, the flingers of darts, and slingers of stones, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might affail and pelt the naked sides of the enemies. On the right flank of these Macedonians at the very eedge and point of the mures and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the sea, and are impassable by reason of the bogs, muddy marshes, quagmires, and quickfands, he set the Elephants with their ordinary and usual guard. After them he hath ordered and men of arms. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he ranged the rest of his forces in the second ward or middie battallion. The Macedonians who were beforeworn before the camp and the trench at the first sustained the Romans easily enough (who allied on every side to make an entry) for much help they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets out of their flings, as thick as an hail storm, who lashed darts also, and shot arrows besides. But when as afterwards greater numbers of enemies pressed upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, keeping yet their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (as it were) another Pallado with their long pikes that they held out afore them. Now the height of their camp-mure was so reasonneable, that as it afforded some rife and vantage ground for their own men to fight upon, so by reason of the length of their spears, they might reach the enemy under them. Illomuch as many of the Romans approaching rashly, and venturing to clamber up, were run clean through: and either they had given over and done nothing, or else more of them had died for it, but that M. Percius Cato having beaten from the top of Callidromus the Attolians, and slain a great part of them (for he surprised them suddenly unawares, and most of them fast asleep) appeared upon the hill that commanded the camp, Flaccus sped not to well at Trichius and Romianus, who shou'der to get up those cliffs and holds, but to no purpose. The Macedonians and the rest that were in the Kings host and camp, at first, when they descried afar off nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Attolians, who having discovered the battell and fight a good way off were coming to aid them, but so soon as they beheld and discerned near at hand the enignes and armour of the Romans, they took themselves in their own errour, and were upon a sudden strucken with such fear, that they all flung their weapons away and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way, & also the narrowness of the vale through which they were to be pursu'd, hindered the Romans in following the chaise. And the Elephants above all which were in the rearward took up the ground fo, as that the footmen could hardly pass by them, and the horsemen by no means possible; so affrighted were the horses, and caused more trouble and disorder among themselves, than they did during the battell. Besides the Romans slid sometime behind, whiles they rified and ranfacked the camp. Howbeit, they had the enemy in chase that day as far as Lyons, killing and taking in the very way, not only many horses and men, but also slaying the Elephants which they could not take alive; which done they returned to their own camp, which that day had been affailed by the Attolians, who were of the garrison of Hercules: but that enterprize, as being exceeeding bold and audacious, so it took no effect at all. The Conful having at the reliefs of the third watch the night ensuing, sent before his Cavality to pursue the enemy, advanced likewise the enignes of his legions forward by break of day. The King by this time had won some ground, and got a good way before; for he never gave over gallopping with bridle in horse neck, until he had recovered Elata. Where first he gathered together the broken ends of his army thus dispersed in flight, and so having collected a small and poor troop of foUdiers, and the same armed by the galls, he retired to Cholcus. The Roman Cavality was not able to overtake the King himseU at Elata, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his army, which either for weauness refted themselves drooping behind or else were scattered one from the other, as missing their way in those unknown quarters, going as they did without their guides: and letting aside five hundred which kept about the King, there was not one that escaped of the whole army, which was but a small number in proportion of 10000. (if they were no more) for so many (according to Polybius) we have written that the King conducted over with him for his part into Greece, what were they then to that great power, which (if we believe Valerius Antias) came with the King for he writeth that he had in his host three thousand, but that forty thousand were slaves of them, and above five thousand taken prisoners, with the loss of military enignes two hundred and thirty. Of Romans there died in all a hundred and fifty.

As the Conful Marched with his army through Phocis and Beotia, the States and Cities which were privy to the revolt and partly culpable,stood without their gates with their infules and veils in token of peace: and craved mercy, fearing they should have been pill'd and ranfacked as enemys. But his host journeyed every day as in a peaceable and friend-country, doing no hurt of M wrong to any earthly creature, until they were come into the territory of Corinth: where the Statue of the Image of Antiochus erected in the Temple of Minerva Itonis kindled their choler. And the fouldiers were permitted to spoil the country lying about that Temple. But bethinking themselves that (considering the said Statue was set up with the publick content of all Beotia) it was an indignity to deal so hardly with that territory only of Corinth, the fouldiers were immediately called in and acclaimed, and so ceased the waffling and spoiling thereof. The Beotians only had a check and rebuke by words, for carrying fo unthankfull hearts to the Romans, of whom they had so lately received such high favours and benefits.

At the very time of the batrell aforefaid, there rode at an host ten ships of the Kings, in the gulph of Malos near to Thronion under the charge and conduct of Isidorus. To which place Alex and the Acramian, being fled from the conflict, fledly bleeding and full of grievous wounds, brought news of the unfortunat fight. Whereupon the ships in great fear for this late terror, made haste and away to Corinum in Euboea, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other ships which were come from Asia, and lay in the same rode, upon the news of the defeat of the army returned to Ephesus. And Isidorus crossed the seas from Corinum to Demetrias. If peradventure the King were fled thither. About that very time, A. Artihus the Admiral of the Roman navy intercepted and surprized great force of the Kings provisions, which had passed already the straits near the Island Andros. Some ships he sunk, others he boaded and took: as for those that came hindmoff in the rearward, they turned full and shaped their course into Asia, Artihus being returned to Pyreum (from whence he came) with a fleet of ships taken from the enemies, divided great flore of corn both among the Athenians, and other allies also of that country.

Antiochus somewhat before the Conful his coming, loo'd from Cholcus, and first fell with the Island Temes, and afterwards failed to Ephesus. Against the Conful his arrivall at Cholcus the gates were set open for him, and Artihus the Captain there for the King, quit the place upon the approachement of the Conful. In like manner other Cities in Euboea yielded without refistence. And so within few daies (when all troubles were appeased and set in quiet order without the hurt and damage
A damage of any one City, the army was brought back to Thermopylae, and was much more honour and commendation for the modelly used after victory, than for the victory itself.

From thence the Consul dispatched M. Cato to Rome by whose certain and true relation, the Senate and people might have full knowledge of all the affairs that had passed. Who, taking tea at Crete, (a port town of Merchants) standing within the innmost gulf of Creusa, arrived at Putea, a City in Achaea. From Putea, he coasted along the rivers of Aetolia and Acarnania, as far as Coropus, and thence over to Hydra; from whence he travelled by land, and in exceeding great haste within five days came to Rome. Early in the morning before day light he entered the City, and from the gate rode directly to M. Junius the Praetor, who attended the Senate in the beginning of the day, but yeas, by a certain messenger from Thermopylae to the Atholians at Heraclea, to advertise them that before he came they would now at last be wiser and be themselves (after such experience of the King's vanity and insufficiency) to deliver up Heraclea, and crave pardon of the Senate, either for their wilful folly, or for their blind error. Who used them in such motives and inducements unto them, namely, That other Cities likewise of Greece (during this war) abandoned the Romans and revolted from them, at whose hands they had received so many benefits: yet because that after the King was fled (upon whole alacrity they had disloyally broken their allegiance) they stood not out still, nor permitted obstinately in their fault and folly, were received to mercy and protection. The Atholians likewise, either they followed not the King, but lent for him, and were rather conductors and leaders, than companions and associats in this war, yet if they could take up in time and repent, they might be pardoned and saved. But no answyer returned them tending to peace; nay, it appeared that the matter would come to a trial by arms, and for all the King was vanquished, yet the Atholian war was behind as wholly and entire as before time. Whereupon the Consul didlodge from Thermopylae, and marched directly against Heraclea; yea, and the very same day he rode on horseback all about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Heraclea is placed at the foot of the mountain Oeta: & thence the town is itself standeth in a plain, yet a fortresit hath built upon an high ground, which, as it overlooketh the City, so it is to steep on every side, that it is altogether inaccessible. After he had diligently beheld all things that were to be marked and known, he determined to assault the town in four places at once. Unto L. Fulvius he gave in charge to plant his platforms and to batter that side where the river Aplius ran through, and where the public place of exercit hold. B. Sempronius Longus had commission to affall the Castle, without the walls indeed, but yet better inhabited and more peopled (as a man would sty) then the town itself. On that side which standeth toward the gulf of Melas, which part yielded the hardest ac-cells, he appointed M. Babius. And from another pretty river which they call Medes, he set Appius Claudius opposite against the Temple of Dana. Through the great industry and earnest labour of these four gallants, striving who could perform the best service, the work went so well forward, that within few days the frames and platforms, the Rams and all other engines of battery meet for the assault of Cities were finished. For besides that the territory about Heraclea, being a mooxy ground and full of tall trees, afforded them plenty enough of timber to frame and perform all sorts of labours: the houses also in the entry of the City without in the Suburbs stand ing void: by reason of which the Atholians had put themselves within the walls, yielded unto them not only polls, beams, joyts, planks, and boards, but brick, and tile, paper, mortar, and stone of all fizes for divers and sundry uses. So, the Romans assaulted the town rather with labours, ordnance, and artillery, than by force of arms: but the Atholians contrariwise defended themselves by main strength and their weapons. For when as the walls should be shaken with the Rams they cast not hold of them as the manner is with cords, and by plucking them aside, avoided their force; but armed in great number, they carried fire with them to fling upon the terraces and the labours, they had besides divers vaults and arches in the walls at which they could readily and safely stand: and ever as themselves closed up the breaches of their walls, or made new for the mortar, they would remember to make more of these vaults full, that in many places at once they might break forth upon their enemies. Thus for the fifl days, whilst they were fresh in heart, they siffed forth oftentimes and many together, and quit themselves right fully: but afterwards in fewer numbers, and more slackly every day than other. For being evermore employed about many things at once, nothing so much tired and wearied them, as watching. For whereas the Romans had a great number of candidiers and one guarded after another incessively by them the Atholians so few, were contrainted without any change to continue in unce

The next labour night and day. Thus for the space of twenty four days they had no rest nor repit, but day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight still, and labouring without intermission against the enemies that assailed the City in all four quarters at once. When the Coniol having once that the Ætolians were wearied and overtoiled (partly by counting the time, and partly by the which he had learned of certain ingitives) he used this policy and stratagem. About midnight he founded the retreat, and having drawn all his soldiers at once from the assailant, held them quiet in the camp until the third hour of the day. After that he began to give a fresh charge, and continued it unto midnight following, and gave over again until the same hour before noon. The Ætolians supposing verily that the cause why they so terrified the assailant, was for very weariness, (like as themselves were tired out) so soon as the Romans had the retreat founded into them, departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they also by the same signal were called away; I and I dined not themselves in armor upon the walls before the third hour of the day next. The Coniol having at one time given over the batterie to stand, began at the fourth watch a fresh assailant again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one tide, he gave commandment to T. Sempronius to keep his men together and intently to observe and wait for the signal affurint himself that in the alarm by night, the enemies would run to those places from whence they heard the noile. The Ætolians, many of them being found asleep; had much to do to rouse themselves, and were lost to rise up from their sweet sleep, their bodies being so weary with tolling and moiling, and watching before; Some of them who were yet awaked ran in the dark to the place where the assailants made a noise. Their enemies laboured to get into the town the same night, by mounting over the ruins and breaches of the broken walls, others by scaling and climbing with ladders. And against them the Ætolians ran from all parts ready to succour and help. One quarter, whereas there stood houses without the City, was neither defended nor assailed: but as there were some ready and waited for the signal to give the assailant, so there was not one of the other part for to resist and defend. Now began the day to peep, when as the Coniol put forth the signal, and the soldiers began to mount over into the City, and found none to withstand them; some entred at the walls half broken down others scaled them with ladders where they found whole and sound. And the cry was not so soon heard that the City was taken, but the Ætolians left their guards on all sides, and fled into the Castle. The soldiers that had won the town were permitted by the Coniol, to rifle and ranfack it; which was not done so much upon eager and deplite, as in this regard, that the soldiers who had been kept short & fighting thus long (notwithstanding so many towns recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in some one place take the fruition of victory. The Coniol, having called from thence about noon, the soldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commanded the one to cast about the foot of the hill up to a rock or cliff, which being in height equal to the Castle foreclosed, was not withstanding divided from it by a valley between them, seeming as it had been sometime a part thereof and cut from it. Now these two points of the hill stood up so near together in the head that from the top of the one a man might slant a dart into the Castle of fortificis. The Coniol, with the other half of the soldiers laid beneath, expecting a sign and token from them that were to get up the cliff behind, ready therupon to mount up from the town fide to the fort. The Ætolians that were within the Castle could neither abate in the first the flame of noile that had seizd the cliff, nor afterwards the assault of the Romans from the City; both for that their hearts failed them and were daintied already, and also because they were unprovided of all necessarys for to endure any long siege and assault; considering that women and children and all the other important multitude inconst to bear arms, were at thither in so great numbers that the place was hardly able to receive and contain much less to keep and maintain them; and therefore at the first assault they cast down their weapons and yielded. Among other prudential perfonages of the Ætolians, Domericius an. was delivered; he, who in the beginning of the war when Q. Quinctius desired to see a copy of the Decree of the Ætolians for the tendering for Antiochus answered, That he would shew it in Italy, when the Ætolians lay there. Amongst the proud speech of his the Romans no conquerors were the gladder that they had set him into their hands.

During the time that the Romans assailed Heraclea, Philip also besieged and battered Laminia, according as it was before agreed between them for near unto Thermopyla, at that time as the Coniol returned out of Beotia, met with him of purpose to signify his joy in the behalfe of him and the people of Rome, for their achieved victory; and also to excite himself by occasion of sickenes that he was not present with him in person in the managing of the wars. From thence they parted sundrie, and took divers waies, for to assault these two Cities (as I said) both at once; and distant they were one from the other nearer seven miles. And furthwith as Laminia was taken upon an hill therefore the town discovered and overlooked all the country about, but especially on that side toward Heracles, where, by reason that it arched a less compass it presented a full prospect to the eye. When as the Romans and Macedonians labouring and striving who could do better, were day and night employed either about their fabrics and pioners work, or else in skirmish and sight; the Macedonians found more difficulty than they. In this respect, that the Romans were busied in platformes, manlets, and works all above ground but the Macedonians were put to undermine: and oftentimes (as it fell out in such lively and craggy ground) they met with hard flints and raggs not mailable, and such as no iron or steel could be touched with and pierce. The King seeing little good done by this means, and his enterprise going but slowly forward, A ward began to sound the townmen, and to tempt them to render the City, using the mediation therein of their chief Citizens whom he had put to him rather than the Sevou; and the Consul should win all the thanks to himself for levying the siege. And nothing was left of his count for immediately upon the winning of Hercules a messenger came unto him from the Consul, willing him to eschew the affright and the siege; alleging, it was more reason, that the Romans should have the reward and remembrance of the victory. By this means Lannus was abandoned, and by the ruin of Hercules, his neighbour City aided and escaped the like calamity of her own.

Some few days before that Hercules was won, the Aetolians having assembled a Diet at Ipsa, to address Embassadors unto Antichus and Juba; among the rest, a man who at the time had been sent unto him, his commotion and charge was this, that he should keep the King that once again he would rally his forces and be as well as he, and in person pass over into Crete secondly. If any other important affairs hindered him, yet that he would lend them both men and money. For as it touched his Highness in honour, reputation, and credit, not to see his allies abandoned; so it made for the safeguard and security of his own Realm and royal city, not to suffer the Romans (after they had once defeated the Aetolians) to fall over into Africa at their ease and pleasure, with all their forces. There were no trained devils, but true remittances indeed; and therefore prevailed the more with the King. Whereupon he delivered money presently to the Embassadors, suffice to defray the charges of the war, and promised certainly to lend men to serve both by land and sea. Then done, all the Embassadors he kept with him, who was not himself unwilling to stay behind, because he might be expected at hand to call upon the King for to perform his word and believe. But the winning of Hercules killed the hearts of the Aetolians in the end: and within few days after that they had discharged their Embassadors into Africa, about the renewing of the war and lending for the King, they laid apart all delinquents of army, and addressed their Orators unto the Romans to cease peace. Who, as they began to make some speech, the Consil cut them short, and said, he had other matters of greater importance to think upon and to dispatch; and commanded them to content themselves with a true, and to return to Ipsa, and with them he sent Lusius and Flaccus, unto whom they should declare those things, that they were about to deliver unto him, and what else they had to say. When they were arrived at Ipsa, the chief and prin in all Aetolians assembled themselves in the lodging of Flaccus, confiding with him what course they were to take in their treaty with the Consil. And when they went in hand to allledge the ancient rights of the legates, and lay abroad their good demerits, and what they had done for the Romans: * Flaccus bid them lay a draw there, and speak no more of the privilege of those corenians and accord: which they themselves had broken; and in giving unto them, that they should speed better and gain more by a simple confession of their transgressions, and as an excuse to prayer and humble supplication: forasmuch as all the hope they might have of safety, relied not in their own desert and goodness of their cause, but in the meek clemency and mercy of the people of Rome; promising for his part to afford them and second their petitions as well to the Consil as to the Senate of Rome. For that thither also they must of necessity send an Embassador, this was seemed to them all, the bell simply for their safety, namely, to put themselves to the disposition and determination of the Romans: for they supposed this means to drive the Romans for very shame to have regard of them & not to offer hurt or violent outrage to them, coming to the habit of poor suppliants: and yet without any opportunity of better fortune should in the mean time & other fell upon them, to be their own Masters; never the less, and at their choice. When they were come before the Consil, Phanes the chief of that embassy, made a long Oration, couching and framing his words sundry ways with sile artificiously, to mitigate and assuage the wrath of the conquerors, which he knitt up and concluded with this speech, saying, That the Aetolians committed themselves and all that they had to the mercy and protection of the people of Rome. When the Consil heard those words:

See you do so then indeed (sd. he) O ye Aetolians; and take heed I advise you that you deal herein bonest. Then Phanes brought forth and shewed a fair instrument of a Decree wherein the State was engrossed in plain terms, since that (sd. he again) you mean good earnest, and are at our disposition, I demand that ye deliver unto me out of hand Decrees of a foreigner, and of the Senate of Rome; (who being entred into Naples with a garrison, had compelled the City to revolt) also Annul-ed all the Nobles of the Athenians, by whose counsel and suggestions we fled from us and rebelled, Phanes interrupted the Consil before he had well made an end of his speech. We yield not our selves (sd. he) to be your villains and slaves, but as slaves to be protected by you, and I am verily persuaded you know not what you do, to impose those things upon us against all the manner and custom of the Greeks. The Consil replied again: In good faith, I pass not (sd. he) greatly what the Aetolians deem well or ill done according to the fashion of the Greeks: all the whiles that I, after the custom of the Romans, have that power and command over them, whoever by virtue of their own degree ye yield unto us. And herefore by force of our arms have been vanquished and subdued by us. And therefore, uncle's thar be executed which I command, ye and with speed my will is, that presently here you be bound hand and foot: and with that you commanded chains and given to be brought forth, and the Lictors to come about them to lay hold upon them. Then the stout courage both of...
Pharsalia and the rest of the Ætolians, was well cooled & abated and so at length they saw in what poor plight they were. And Pharsalia made answer, That both himself and the Ætolians there present in place, knew well, that those things were to be performed which were imposed upon them, but (quoth he) there needs a Council of the Ætolians for to enact a decree thereof; and therefore he requested the Consul to allow a farscale of arms only for ten days. Then Flaminio began to speak for the Ætolians, and at his request the said abstinence was granted, and so they returned to Hypona. When Pharsalus had related in the privy Council of those elec. peers of that nation called Apeleius, as well the demands that were commanded, as what had like to have fall upon them else in person, the peers sighed deeply and groaned again, to see their miserable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victor must of necessity be obeyed - and a general Parliament assembled of the Ætolian Burghers out of all their towns and Cities. When I had in all that multitude was gathered together, and heard the fame related again, their hearts to fret within them at the cruelty and indignity of those Lordsy commands, that if they had been well felt in peace, yet such a fit of anger had been enough to have put them into arms. And to stir the fame and choler the more, the difficulty of effecting the things demanded, helped well: for how possibly could they compell to deliver Ammonius, being as he was an absolute King? But even then there was presented unto them by chance a new hope. For Nicander at that very time, coming from King Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vain expectation, namely, that the King made wondrous provision for war, as well by sea as land. This Nicander having accomplished his Embassage, and made return again into Ætolia, within the compass of twelve days, after he was embarked, arrived at Phœnisa in the gulf of Morea: from whence K having brought the monies which he had, down to Lamia, whites himself with certain nimble men and light appointed, travelled toward Hypona in the evening, between the Roman and Ætolian camp, through that path which he well knew: he chained to stumble, ere he was aware, upon the Ætolian guard of the Macedonians, and was brought to the King before supper was done, the table taken up, and the King then. When Philip was advertised thereof, he flew no other countenance, than if a friend or guest, and not an enemy was come; he had him down at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards he kept him there with him till in the room, and voided all the rest, willing him in no case to be afraid. "He blamed greatly the bad courtesies and designations of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted upon their own pates) who first had brought the Romans and then Antiochus into Greece. But for my part (quoth he) such things done and left, may sooner be blamed than amended. I am content to forget and put all under my foot, and will never be the man that will seem to inflect over them in their difficulties and adversity. And so he should the Ætolians likewise take up in time, and lay aside all their rancor and malice to me: and Nicander especially ought to remember this day, on which by me his life was preserved. With that he sent him away with a good convoy, until he was past all danger: and this Nicander, as is before said, came to Hypona, even as the Ætolians were in deep confusion about peace with the Romans.

M. Aëtius having either fold outright, or given away to the soldiers the booty of the country about Hercules, and hearing that the Council at Hypona nothing tended to peace, and that the Ætolians were run together to Nauplium, for to abide in that place the whole violence of the war; went Ap. Clud and there with 4000 soldiers to feare the tops of the mountains, where as the parliages were difficult and himself ascended up to the hill Odae, and sacrificed to Hercules in that very place where they call Pyra, by occasion that the most part body of that god was there consumed with fire: from whence he departed with his whole army & performed the rest of his journey well and marched with care. Being come to Coras (an exceeding high mountain between Calipolis and Nauplium) he left there many of his labouring beasts and lampetary horses, which together with their loads and lardels, as they were tumbled down headlong from the mountain, and his men also were much troubled and encumbered. Whereby it was soon seen, with how lazy and idle an enemy he had to deal, who had not better and kept with a guard that difficult parliage, to encompass and shut up the thorow-fate from the enemies. Howebeit as much roiled and troubled as his army was, he defended to Nauplium. And having erected one Fort against the Castle, he invested all the other parts of the City, and divided his forces according to the faction of the walls. This move he found as toilome and painful, as that at Hercules.

At the same time began the Achaeans to lay siege to Myssale also in Peloponnesus, for that it refused to be of their Council and assistance: For these two Cities, Messene and Elis, were exempt from the Achaean Diet and accorded with the Ætolians. Howebeit, the Eleans, after that Antiochus was chased out of Greece, gave the Embassadors of Achaea a more mild answer, to wit, That when they had discharged and lent away the Kingsgarrison, they would consider of the matter what to do. But the Messenians having without any answer at all, sent the Embassadors away, had levied war and fearing much their own estate, seeing their territory overspread with an army, and everywhere burned, yea and their enemies encamped near unto their City, addresseed unto Chalici their embassadors to T. Quintus (the very man who before hadlet them at liberty) to signify into them. That the Messenians were ready both to open their gates & to surrender their City unto the Romans: & not to the Achaeans Quintus to soone as he had heard their embassage, sent a messenger incontinently to Megalopolis, unto Diophanes the Praetor there of the Achaeans, to command him presently to retire his holt from Messene, and to repair unto him. Diophanes obeyed obeyed his commandment, and having raised his siege, marched himself lightly appointed for speed before the ret of his army, and about Anmara, a small town between Megalopolis and Megaze, encountered Quinctus. Unto whom after he had shewed the causes of the siege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuke only, for that he had enterprised a matter of so great consequence without his authority; with an express commandment also to call and discharge his army, and not to disturb and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Meffenienses likewise he charged to keep home their banished persons into their City, and to join with the Achazians in their general Diet and Affemcry. And if they either had any matters to refine, or would willingly provide for themselves against the future time, he willed them to make their repair unto him at Corinthus, and enjoyed Diophanes immediately to summon the Diet of the Achazians for him, where personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacynthii, that by fraud and treachery they had come by and kept, he required that it should be referred to the Romans. Now this isle had sometime appertained to Philip the King of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aemander, in consideration, that he might conduct his army into the higher parts of Euboea, through Attamania: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Achazians hearts were so staked and quailed, that they were constrained to seek peace. Aemander made first Philip the Megapolitan governor of this Island: but afterwards, in time of that war wherein he banded with Antiochus against the Romans, he called him away from thence to employ him in matrinal affairs, and sent Hierocles the Agrigentin to succeed him in his place. This Hierocles, after the defeat and flight of Antiochus from Thermopyle, and the expulsion of Aemander out of

Attamania by King Philip dispatched of his own motion certain messengers unto Diophanes the Praetor of the Achazians, and for a sum of money agreed upon between them, betrayed the Island to the Achazians. The Romans thought in great reason, that this Island should be theirs, in accompaniment for the wars which they had maintained; for as much as M. Aemander the Consul, and the Roman legions fought not at Thermopyle for Diophanes nor yet for the Achazians, Diophanes to these challenges and demands sometime excused himself and the whole nation, otherwise fled to it, and avowed the action, and maintained the cause by a plea of right. Some there were of the Achazians there, that both professed, how from the beginning they utterly mistilled the cause, and also at this present much blamed the Praetor for his wilful oblivion. And by their advice and authority an act was set down, that the whole matters should be referred and put to Quinctus, to determine what he pleased. Now had Quinctus this nature, if a man crostled and thwarted him, he was fierce and fell; if one yielded and gave place he was gentle again and pliable. And therefore, without vowing any sign of debate, either in language or countenance, thus he spake, "If I thought (quod hic) and were pitiwed in my heart, that it were good and commodious for the Achazians to hold and posse this Island in question. I would advise the Senate & people of Rome to let you enjoy it. But like as a Tortoise, so long as the keepeth her selfe cloe within her shell (I. (see) is sure and safe enough, against all blows and offence whatsoever; but when the once put thent forth any parts, look whatsoever is discovered and naked the same is weak and subjected to injury; even to you Achazians being enclosed round about with the seas, are able easily to adjoy unto your selves whatsoever lyeth within the prætext of Peloopenass, and to keep the same also when you have laid it to you: but so soon as for a greedy desire of having more and encroaching further, you go beyond those bounds, you lie open without, and are exposed to all hurt and damage. Thus Zacothenus was delivered to the Romans with the silent of all the Counciull there assembled, and Diophanes durst not say a word more to the contrary. At the same time King Philip asked the Consul as he marched to Naphatham. Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the mean while should recover and regain those Cities which were revoked from the association of the Romans? And having a grant and warrant from him, he led his forces against Demetraus, knowing well enough in what terms of troublest that City then flood. For being forlorn and in utter despair, seeing Antiochus had foraken them and no hope at all remaining in the Achazians: they looked everyday and might either for the coming of Philip their heavy friend; or else even the Romans themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A confuted and disordered fort there were of King Antiochus his foiards, who being but a few at first left there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more and more of them unarmed; such as after the field was lost at Thermopyle (dies necessitatis) thither chance to fly, and neither had strength nor heart enough to abide a siege. And therefore when Philip sent certain messengers before unto them, to signify, that there was some hope that they might be pardoned: they made them this answer, That the gates were open for the King, and that he might enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certain chief men of mark quit the City and departed, and Eutelchus killed himself. The garrison foiards of Antiochus (for so they had capitulated) were conducted to Lycaonia through Macedon and Thrace, accompanied with a convoy of Macedonians, for fear that any man should do them harm. There were some few ships also in the trade of Demetraus, under the command of Thiboros, which together with their leader and Captain were dismissed. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperanthus, and certain Cities of

During the time that Philip was employed in these affairs, T. Quinctius having recovered the Island Zacynthius, departed from the Diet of the Achazians, and rosted the less to Naphatham, which had been beleaguered already two months, & was at the point to be forced and lost: which if it might have been won by assault, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the Eto-lians there would have perished for ever. And albeit he had good cause to be highly offended and dispaced with the Etoilians, in remembrance that they only checked and impeached his glory, at what time as he set Greece free: and that they were nothing stirred and moved with his authority, when he (forewarning them that those things would happen which afterwards fell out just so indeed) would have disconcerted and scared them from foolish and furious designs: yet, tipping that it was a special part of his charge and work, that no nation of Greece (now freed by him) should utterly be subdued and destroyed, he began to walk up and down along under the walls, to the end that he might be seen and known of the Etoilians, and soon the very form of guards took notice of him, and noticed it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintus was there. And thereupon ran from all parts up to the walls, every man stretched forth his hands, and with one accord and copious voice called by name unto Quintus, beseeching him to help and save them. And albeit he was moved at thes their pitious cries with commiseration, yet for that time he signified by the turning away of his head, that he refused and denied them asking withall, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards, being come unto the Consul, “Know you not (quoth he) O M. Acilius, whereabout we are, and what we have in hand? or if you be a man provident enough esteem you not that it mainly con-terneth the common-weal? He let the Consul by these words a long, and caused him to give more attentive ear what he would say and withall, Why do you not speak forth (quoth the Consul) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintus: “See you not that after you have vanquished Antiochus, you spend and lose much time here in the siege and slaughter of two Cities when as now the year of your government is wellnigh come about? And Philip in the mean time without seeing a barstall or the eneigns of his enemies displeased, hath gained and joy-ned to himself not Cities only, but to many nations already, Achæania, Paphlagonia, A-perga, and Delphi. But it is not so good and expedient for us, nor standeth itus so much upon, to take down the Etoilians and purue their nails, as to look unto Philip that he was not too great: and (seeing you and your soldiers have not yet two Cities in reward and recompence of victory) not to suffer him to go clear away with so many nations of Greece.
The Consul answered henceunto: but he thought it a shame and dishonour for him to give the fire to the Etoilians and effect nothing: but afterwards, all the matter was put unto the disposition of Quintius. Who went again to that side of the wall, whereas a little before the Etoilians called and L cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earnestly and with greater affection to take away the Etoians people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediately, Phœnas himself with other principal persons of the Etoilians, went out unto him: to whom lying prostrate and groveling at his feet: “Your present fortune (quoth he) and hard effate wherein you are, caude me both to temper my choler and also to lay my tongue. Tho you now see me full of wrath, which I foretold would come to pass. And not so much as this is left unto you. That the calamities fall upon your heads can be truly laid to have light upon them that have not deserved as much. Howbeit, since it hath been allotted unto me as it were by destiny to be a foster-father (as I may so say), to nurse up Greece, I will not cease even to give you good, as thankless and ungrateful persons as you are. Send your Orators to the Consul M to intreat him to grant you a truce for so long, until you may addresse your Embassadors to have, by whom you shall wholly refer and submit your selves to the Senate: and I will not fail to be an intercessor and advocate to the Consul for you and likewise unto the Senate. And, as Quintus counselled them, so did they. Neither rejected the Consul their Embassadors, but granted them abstinence of war for such a term as within which they might have an answer of their Embaslave to Rome: so he dislodged, the siege was raised, and the army went into Phœnica. The Consul together with Quintus passed over the sea to Ætica, unto the general Councill of Achae.
There was much treaty and parly about the Elean, and the restoring of the Lacedæmonians exiles: but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans were desirous to requite that for themselves, and to win thereby a thank, as proceeding from their special grace. And the Eleans, chose rather to come and be united to the Achæan Parlia-mment of themselves, than by the mediation of the Romans. The Embassadors of the Epiroths came unto the Consul, who (it was well known) carried not themselves proud and upright in the entertaining of the Roman amity: howbeit, they had not levied a soldiers for Antiochus. Charged they were to have relieved him with money: and deny themselves they could not but they had lent their Embassadors unto the King, And when they put up a petition, that they might be accepted again into the ancient band of amity: this answer the Consul returned unto them, That he knew not yet whether to range them in the number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and thereof the Senate should be judge; and therefore he referred their whole entire cause to Rome. And to that purpose a truce he granted them of fourscore and ten daies. The Epiroths thus sent to Rome, presented themselves before the Senate, and when they food rather upon these terms in recounting those things wherein they had not shewed any open hostility, than in cleating themselves of those matters that were laid against them: they received such an answer, as whereby they might be thought rather to have obtained pardon, than to have made good and justified their cause. The Embassadors also of King Philip about that time had audience given them in the Senate, who came to congratulate with the Romans, testifying their own joy, and withing

Theirs for their victory: and upon their request, that they might sacrifice in the Capitol, and offer an oblation and present of gold in the Temple of Jupiter, Max., the Senate gave the good leave. So they presented and offered a crown of gold weighing one hundred pound. They Embassadors had not only a friendly answer and gracious dispatch: but also Demetrius the son of King Philip, who had lien as an hostage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home again unto his father. Thus was the war achieved and brought to an end, which M. Aemilius the Conful waged against King Antiochus in Greece.

The other Conful P. Cornelius Scipio, who was to govern the Province of Gaul, before he set his journey to that war in which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senate, that money should be assigned unto him for to perform those plays and games which he had promised by vow, as Vice-Foratorius in Spain, when he was driven to a great extremity in a battle. This seemed to be a strange and unreasonable demand. Whereupon the L. of the Senate ordained, that what plays the Conful had vowed on his own head without asking the advice and counsell of the Senate, the same he should exhibit and set forth either with the issue of the spoils got from the enemies, (lithaply he had reserved any money called thereunto to that purpose) or else defray the charges out of his own purse. Those plays and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten days. And near about the same time, the Temple of the great goddesses Cybele (or Idas) was dedicated. This goddes was brought out of Asia, in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (furnamed afterwards Africamus) and P. Licinius were Conuls, was conveyed from the sea-side into the mount Palantine. The Temple was set out to be built at a price (according to Canace of the Senate) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Centors, when M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Conuls. Thirteen years after the bargain was made for the edifying thereof, M. Julia Buessa dedicated it: and for the honour of this dedication were the first stage-plays exhibited, (as Valerius Antias mine author faith) called thereupon Megiselia. In like manner C. Licinius Lutullus (one of the two Duumvirs) dedicated the Temple of the goddesses Junias in the great Race called Circus Maximus. The same had M. Livius the Conful vowed fifteen years before, even that very day in which he defeated Africamus and his army. The same Livius in his Centorship went through and bargained for the building thereof, while M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Conuls. And in the honour of dedicating this Temple, the plays were set forth; and all was done with more devotion, because there was a new war intended against King Antiochus.

Thus, in the beginning of this year in which these things palled, whiles P. Cornelius the Conful flaid still behind at Rome, (for M. Aemilius was gone forth already to war:) it is found in records, that there a tree oxen climbed up a ladder in the street Corioli, to the tile-roof of a certain house there. And the foot-hayers gave express order that they should be burnt quick, and the ashes to be thrown into Tybre. Also it was reported, that at Tarusina and Amsternum, it rained fishes sundry times, Item, That in Mithrnns the Temple of Jupiter and the shops about the marketplace were blest and mittem with lightning; and in the very mouth of the river Vulturnus, two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these fearfull prodigies the December by order of the Senat went to the books of Sibylla and perused them; and out of their learning pronounced, that a foemen fault should be now instituted in the honour of Ceres, and the same to be observed and helden every fist year: also that a novendial sacrifice for nine daies together could continue: and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this procession and supplication, should wear garlands and wreathes of flowers upon their heads: Lastly, That the Conful P. Cornelius should sacrifice to what gods, and with what beattles, the December would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified, as well by the accomplish of the vowes accordingly, as by taking order for the expiation of those wondrous signes the Conful took his journey into his province: from whence he commanded Cnnti Dominii the Pro-Forator (after he had called his army) to depart to Rome; and himselfe entred with his legions into the territory of the Boians.

Within of that time the Ligurians (by vertue of a sacred law that they had) levied and assembled an army, and by night assailed the Camp near to Quintus Mamilius the Pro-Conful. Minucius kept his foeldiers in order of battell untill day within his hold, having an eye and circumspect regard, that the enemy should not mount over the trench and defences in any place. And at the day-break he fell again at two gates a once: neither were the Ligurians repulsed (as he hoped they should) at the first charge; for they fatallied and held out the skirmish above two hours, with doubtfull event on both sides. At last, when band after band illued out, and still fresh foeldiers succended in the room of the wearied, for to maintain fight, the Ligurians in the end (besides other diffilities, lost for want of fleap also) turned their backs. Of the enemies were slain above four thousand;of Romans and allies under three hundred. Two months after of somewhat lefts, P. Cornelius the Conful gave battell to the Boians and won the day; slew 5000 enemies. (as Valerius Antias writeth) took 3400 prisoners, gained 124 military enligens, 1320 horses, chariots 247: and of the winners (as he faith) there died not above 1483. Where (by the way) how little credit forever (as touching the number) we give unto this Writter. (for in that point there is none over-reacheth more than he) yet apparent it is, that a right great victory it was; both for that the camp was won, and the Boians after that battell presently yielded themselves; as for that in regard of this victory a joyful procession was by order from the Senat holde, and greater beattles slained for sacrifice.
Not much under or over this present time, M. Fulvius Nobilior returned out of the farther province of Spain in pomp of an Ovation, and carried in four thousand pound of silver in bullion; of Bigates in silver coin 130,000, and in gold 126 li., weight. P. Cornelius the Consul, having first taken hostages of the Boian nation, and disseized them of the one half of their country, to the inhabiting whereof the people of Rome might if they would send their Colonies; at his departure from hence toward Rome to an undisputed and assured triumph, licensed his army, with commandment to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he came, the Senate had immolations to assemble in the Temple of Bellona; where after he had discharged of his acts and deeds achieved, he required that he might be permitted to enter the City riding in triumph, P. Sempronius Blefas a Tribune of the Commons for the time being, stepped forth and said: That his advice was that Scipio should not flatly be denied the honour of a triumph but to put it off to a farther day. And why? The wars (quod he) of the Ligurians have always been joyed and linked with those of Gaul, which nations being so near together, use ever mutually one to succour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battle) had followed the train of victory, and either himself in proper person with his brave conquering army panted into the territory of the Ligurians, or but sent part of his forces to Q. Minucius, who now for three years (as far as) both been detained within those quarters in a war of doubtful issue; we might have seen an end ere this of the Ligurian war also. But now (forsooth) his soldiers are dismissed, and brought home to accompany him & to solemnize his triumph who might well have been employed still and done good service to the Common-wealth: yet, & may do yet (if the Senate be so dispos'd) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regain that, which by over-haste of triumph hath been over-flipped. And therefore, in my opinion (quod he) they should do well to command the Consul to go his waiés back again, and take his army with him into his Province, & to do his best and utmost endeavour to subdue the Ligurians also. For unless they be brought under and made subject unto the people of Rome, the Boians be ye sure will not long be quiet: either we must have peace or war at once in both places.

And so P. Cornelius in quality of Pro-Consul (as many others before him, who in their full Majesties triumphed not) may after some few months have his triumph, To this the Cof. answered again and said, That neither the Province of the Ligurians was any part of his charge by lot, neither warred he at all with the Ligurians, nor yet demanded to triumph over them. As for Q. Minucius (quod he) I hope that shortly after he hath subdued them, he both will require his due triumph and shall likewise obtain the same, for mine own part, I seek no more but to triumph over the Boians in Gaul, whom I have vanquished in plain battell, beaten out of the field and camp; whose whole nation within two daies after the fight and their general discoumfort, yielded and rendered themselves into my hands: and from whom I have carried away hostages for assured pledge of future peace; nay, that which is much more than all this, I have had the killing of so many Gauls in open battell and fought with so many thousands of Boians as no General either did before me: the better half of 50,000 men are slain upon the edge of the sword, and many a thousand taken prisoners: so as the Boians have none left but old folk and young children.

Can any man make a wonder then, why a victorious army, leaving no enemy behind in the Province, is come to Rome to honour the triumph of their Consul? Whole employment, if the Senate be disposed to use in any other service or Province. Whether of these two waies think they, will make them more willing and ready to put themselves into new dangers, and enter into other fresh labour and travell; either to pay them without delay & content them with the due & deferred hire of their former peril and pain, or to send them away with bare hope only instead of the substance, for to expect still without effect: since they have been once already put by and disappointed of their first hope and expectation? Now for mine own part, I obtained honour enough that day on which the Senate sent me (deemed & declared the best man in all the City) to receive that great goddess & dame of Ida. This title alone, without any other addition of triumph, shall be sufficient to recommend to all posterity for honesty & honour both, the image of P. Scipio Naevis, This said, not only the whole Senate themselves condefcended generally to grant him triumph, but also with their countenance & authority compelled the Tribunes of the Commons to give over their hold, and intercede their interception of a negative voice, So P. Cornelius the Consul, triumphed over the Boians, In which triumph he contented to be carried for shew in French chariots, armor, ensigns, and spoils of all forts: also French vessels of brays and copper. He commanded likewise to be led in pomp a number of horses taken, together with Nobleman and Gentlemen captives. Of chains of gold he made a shew of 1470. Besides, there was born in pomp, of gold 245 pound weight, of silver unwrought and wrought into plate, not unworkmanly after their manner (and namely in sundry French vessels) 2340 pound weight: lawly, of bigats in coin 224. To his foiards that followed his triumphant chariot he gave 225 Alls apiece, double as much to a Centurion, and twenty to a horseman. The next day after he called the people to a general assemblé, whereafter he had discharged again of his exploits, and complained of the wrongs that the Tribune had offended in him that he would have tied him to the war of another, with intent to defraud himself of the fruit of his own victory, he called his foiards and discharged them quite.

While these affairs thus went in Italy, Atilius remaining at Ephesus, rested very secure and careless of the Roman war, as if the Romans had no purpose nor intention to pass over into Asia. This security of his was occasioned by many of his friends, who partly upon ignorance, and
A. The hearing and whereas and and After GTbeKing war,piked to were "The Romans were a\n ready rigged and unhulled, failed to Eberchelseus, with intent to strengthen those places with good garrisons if happy the Romans should come by Land. The rest of the navy he commanded Polyxenidas to prepare and put to Sea, And all about the Iland he lent about his pinnaes and bri\ngantins as eipats to discover the coasts, C. Livius the Admiral of the Roman navy was arrive\n at Naples from Rome with fifty covered ships. At which place he gave commandment. That the open\n vessels, which by covenant were due to be lent from the allies of all that treat should meet, From\n whence he sailed to Sicily, and palled the brights by Mevans. And when he had received fix\n Carthaginian ships lent to aid him, and called upon the Rhegins and Locrians, and other a\n otics comprised in the same league and holding by the same tenure, for that shipping which of duty\n they were to find when he had also taken a survey of all his armado at Livius, he weighed anchor,\n and put to the main Sea. Being arrived at Cerys, which was the first City of all Greece, that he\n came unto, he enquired in what terms the war-affairs stood? (for as yet all was not thoroughly\n quiet in Greece) and where the Roman fleet was? After he heard that the Roman Consul and King Philip,\n were about the parts of Thermopylae, and there lay in guard; that the fleet rid at anchor in the port and harbor of Pyra\nuus; he thought it good to use expedition, and to make speed for all occasions whatsoever, and incontinent determined to sail forward to Peloponnesus. And having\n at one instant waited Sannet and Aegyptus as he went,because they chose rather to band with the\n Etolians, he fell for Malthea, and having a good wind, within few days he arrived at Pyra\nuus,\n where the elder heir anchored. At Scytherus King Eumenes met him with three ships: who had\n been a long time at Aetius, unrelaxed in himself, whether he should return to defend his own Island\n (for he heard that Aetius made preparation at Ephesus for war, as well by Sea as Land) or not to depart afoot from the Romans, upon whole fortune depended his whole flate, Aet\n us Aetius, for soon as he had delivered to his succesor five and twenty close ships of war,\n loosed from Pyramus and came to Rome. So Livius with a fleet of eighty one ships armed at their\n backheads with brazen pikes, besides many other smaller vellets (which open as they were, had bra\n zen heads, as is aforesaid; or if they were without fish pikes, served for eipats) failed to Delos.\n Much about that time the Conful Aetius affailed nonpautiam. At Delos, Livius for certain dayes\n was flained by contrary wind: (for that quarter among the Cyclices is exceeding windy, by rea\n son that these Islands are divided ainner, some with broader gulfs, some with narrower.) Polyxen\n idas being certified by the post-ships (set in divers places to discover) that the Roman armado\n rid at anchor near Delos dispatched meffengers to the King, who leaving all matters which he exer\n tripered in Hellipontus, returned to Ephesus as fast as ever he could make falf with his ships of\n war piked at the head: and presentely called a counsell, where it was debated, whether he were bef\n to hazard a barret at Sea or not? Polyxenidas was of opinion, that he should not lack the time,\n but in any wife give barret and trie a fight, before that the fleet of Eumenes and the Rhodian\n ships were joined with the Romans: for so in number they should not be much overmatched,\n and for all other things have the better, as well for nimblenes and agility of ships,as for variety\n of old-soldiers. For the Roman ships, as being unworckmanly built, they are heavy of fleerage\n and unweldy, loaden they are and fraught besides with provision of victuals, as they are com\n monly that come into the enemies courtry. But as for your ships (seeing they leave all about\n them peaceable and quiet) they shall be charged with nothing but with men and munition. Be\n side the skill of these fea and lands and of the winds in these quarters, will be a great help un\n to you: whereas the enemies must needs be much troubled, for want of knowledge in them all.\n The deviser of this counsell had credit given unto him on all partes and the rather, for that he was the\n man himselfe to put in execution the same counsell. Two daies they made falf to set all things in order and readiness, the third day they set forward with a fleet of a hundred fale, whereof 70 were covered the reft open, and all of the imaller making and for Phoca theys flaped their course,\n G. The King hearing that the Roman Armdo approched, departed from thence (for that he was not\n to be prestart in person at the conflict upon the seas) and went to Magnes neer Sipylus for to\n levy land-forces. But his navy made falt to Cyfamus, a port of the Erythreans, to attend the coming of the enemy there, as in a place more commodious. The Romans, when the Northern winds were once laid (for they were aloft for certain daies, and locked them in) failed from Delos to Pla\n nea, a haven Towne of the Chians, bearing toward the Egean sea. From thence they set about with\n their ships to the City, and there had victualled themselves, they crosted over to Phoca. Eum\n enes:
menes who went on Elae toward his fleet, within few days after, with four and twenty covered ships, and more uncovered, returned to the Romans: whom he found preparing and marshalling themselves (a little short of Phoces) for a battle at sea. Then let they all forward with a hundred and fifty clove covered ships, and more open and without hatches; and being with side Northern winds, at the first driven to the sea shore, they were forced to fall in line in rank one after another. But afterward, as the violence of the wind began to be abated, they affisted to cross over to the haven Cercus, which is above Cyprus,Polyxenidas, as soon as he heard that the enemies were at hand, rejoiced that he had occasion presented unto him of a naval battle: and himself stretched forth the left point of his fleet embattelled far into the sea, willing the Captains of the ships to display the right wing broad, toward the land; and to with an even front, he advanced forward to the fight. Which the Roman Admiral seeing, struck sail, took down the masts, and laying together at the tackling of the ships in one place, attended their coming that followed after. By which time there were thirty in a rank afront, with which because he would make them equal to the left wing of the enemy, he let up the trinkets or small falls, meaning to make way into the deep, commanding them that followed full, to make head, and direct their prow against the right wing near the land. Eumenes was the rear Admiral, and kept the rearward clove together: but so soon as they began to be troubled with taking down their tackling, he set forward with all speed and hail that he could make: and by this time were they in view one of the other. Two Carthaginian ships led before the Roman navy, which were encountered with three of the Kings ships. And considering the odds of the number, two of the Kings came about one. And first they wiped away the oars on both sides, then they threw themselves aloft with their weapons, and hoarded their, and after they had either overthrown or killed the dependants, they were matters of that ship. The other that was in single fight, and assailed but by one, seeing the other ship taken by the enemies, fled back into the main fleet, before she was environed by the three enemies, Livius chasing hereat, and angry at the heart, advanced forward with the Admiral ship afront the enemy against her, the other two which had enclosed the Carthaginian ship storeward, hoping to do the like by this came onward: which Livius perceiving, commanded the rowers to let their oars hang in the water on both sides, for the more stay and steadiness of the ship, and likewise to cast their iron hooks fashioned like hands, for to grapple the enemies ships, as they approached and came near unto them; and when they were come to close fight in manner of land-service, then to remember the valour of the Romans, and not to hold the Kings slaves for men of any worth. And with much more facility and ease, than the two ships before conquered one, this one for that gained two. By this time the main fleet on both sides encountered on all sides, and fought pell-mell. Eumenes who being in the rearward, came last in place, after the conflict was begun, perceiving that Livius had disordered the left wing of the enemies, made head against the right, where he saw them fighting on even hand, not long after the left wing began to flee. For Polyxenidas, so soon as he saw himself without all question overmatched in value of the adversaries, caused the trinkets and all the cloth he had to be let up, and purposed to flee again, Thoë likewise that were toward the land, and fought with Eumenes, within a while did no less. The Romans and Eumenes, so long as the mariners were able to plie their oars, and so long as they were in hope to annoy the tail of the enemies, followed the chase lustily enough: but after that they perceived their own ships (charged and heavily loaden with vizuals) follow after to no purpose, and to lag behind: not like to overtake them which were the swifter, because they were the lighter; sailed at length their pursuit, after they had taken 13 ships both with their sailors and mariners, and think ten. Of the Roman Armado there perished but one Carthaginian, which at the first encounter was befit with two ships. Polyxenidas never gave over flight, but made way still forward until he had recovered the haven of Ephesus. The Romans abode that day in the place from whence the Kings Armado came, purposing on the morrow to make fresh fall after the enemy. And in the mids of their course they met with those 35 Rhodian ships covered, conducted by Phiniras their Admiral: and taking those also with them, they followed the enemy even as far as Ephesus, where in the mouth of the haven, they rid in order of battle: by which bravado, having wrung as it were from the enemies a plain confession that they were vanquished, the Rhodians and Eumenes were sent home. The Romans letting their course for Chius first failled by Phancius, an haven Town of Egypt, and having cast anchor that night, the next day they weighed, and arrived within the Island, close to the City it fell, where having joined some few days, especially to refresh their rowers, they passed forward to Phoces. Where leaving four quinquereme Galeaeks, the fleet arrived at Cane, and because the Winter approached, the ships were laid up in their docks on dry land, and for their safety were trenched and palmed about. In the years and the General assembly for decision of Magnifcras was holden at Rome, wherein were created Consuls; L.Cornelius Scipio; and C.Lelius. For now all men had an eye to the finishing of the war against Antiochus. The next morrow were the Pretors also chosen, namely, M.Ticceius, L.Arunaculcns, Gnaeus Enulpus, L.Emylius, P. Jucundus, and C. Atinus Labeo.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio the Consul, having for his Lieutenant P. Scipio Africanus (according as he had promised that he would be Lieutenant to his brothers of Greece and Asia were ordained to be his Province whereas it was thought that C. Labilius for the great credit that he was in with the Senate, should have had that Province given him) took his voyage for to war against Antiochus, and was the first Roman that ever sailed over into Asia, as Captain and Commander of an army. Eumylus Regillus fought gloriously with the aid of the Rhodians before Myonnesus, against the royal navy of Antiochus. The son of Africanus taken prisoner by Antiochus, was sent home to his father, M. Acilius Glabrio triumphed over Antiochus, whom he had driven out of Greece, as also over the Rhodians. Afterwards, when Antiochus was vanquished by L. Cornelius Scipio (with the assistance of King Eumenes, the son of Attalus King of Pergamus) he had peace granted unto him, upon condition, that he should quit and forgo all the Provinces on this side the mount Taurus. And Eumenes, by whose help Antiochus was overcome, had his Kingdom enlarged. To the Rhodians also, for their helping hand certain Cities were given and granted. One Colony was planted, called Bononia. Eumylus Regillus, who vanquished the Captains of Antiochus in a naval battle, obtained also a naval triumph. L. Cornelius Scipio, who finished the war with Antiochus, had the like surname given him as his brother, and was called after Atilianus.

The seven and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

When L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Labilius were Consuls, after order taken for the service of the Gods, there was no matter treated of in the Senate, before the suit of the Aetolians. And as their Embassadors were impatient and earnest, because the term of their truce was but short, to T. Quintius, who then was returned out of Greece to Rome, seconded them. The Aetolians, relying more upon the mercy of the Senate, than the justice of their own cause, and balancing their old good turns done to the Romans, to the late harms and trepails committed, used humble supplication. But so long as they were in presence before the Senators, they were wearied with their interrogatories of all hands, who fought rather to letch and wring from them confession of a fault, then any other answer; and when they were hidden to void of the Senate-house, they caused much debate within. For in the handling of their matter it was seen that anger bire more way than pity, because they were not so much offended with them for being enemies, as they blamed them for an untruly, untamed, and unorderly nation. And after much hard hold for certain duties together, they relived at length, neither to grant nor deny them peace. Two conditions were tendered and presented unto them, either to relieve themselves wholly to the pleasure and disposition of the Senate, or else to deliver a 1000 talents: and withal to hold those or friends or foes, whomsoever the Romans reputed theirs. And when they were devisous to draw from the Senators thus much, as to know in what points, and how far forth, they should submit themselves to the discretion of the Senate; they could have no certain answer to build upon. And thus without any peace obtained, they were dismissed, with express commandment to void the City that very day, and to be gone out of Italy within 15 days following. Then they fell to consultation in the Senate about the government of the Consular provinces. Both Consuls desired to have the change of Greece. And Labilius was a great man with the Senate. Now when the house was minded that the Consuls should either call lots or agree between themselves for their Provinces, he rose up and said, That it was more decent and befitting to put the matter to the judgment of that honorable court, than to the blind hazard of lots. To this Scipio for the present made answer, that he would consider better of it: and after he had conferred secretly with his brother Spartæus (who advised him to be bold and put it to the Senate) he gave Labilius to understand, that he was content to do as he would have him. When this strange course and manner of proceeding (either new and unheard of before, or else after so long dis ease of the practice thereof, forgotten and taken up again) caused the Senate to arm themselves against a great strife and contention, then P. Scipio Africanus said, That if they would ordain his brother L. Scipio to have the Province of Greece he would accompany him in that voyage, in quality of his Lieutenant. This one word of his (accepted of them all with a general content) raised all debate: for a great mind they had to make a trial, whether Ambusc being vanquished could aid King Antiochus more than Africa, the Conqueror allsh the Consul and the Roman legions. And all in a manner aligned Greece to Scipio, and Italy to Labilius. But the Pretors had their Provinces, set out to them by lots: L. Aurunculius obtained the civil jurisdiction of citizens, and L. Fulvius of forainers: L. Eumylus Regillus was L. Admiral of the armado, P. Iunius governed Tuscanay, M. Tuccius Apulia and the

Brutus, and L. Atinius Sicily, Moreover that Conful, who was to be employed in Greece, had a commission granted, besides that army which he should receive of M. Aelius (and those were two legions) to furnish himself with a supply of 3000 footmen, and 100 horsemen of Roman citizens; also of 5000 foot, and 500 horse of allies that were Latin: and besides, granted it was in the same commission, that when he was arrived into his Province, he should pass over with his army into Asia, if he thought it expedient for the Common-weal.

Unto the other Conful was allowed an entire whole army of new footlers, consisting of two Roman legions, and fifteen thousand foot and fix hundred horse of the Latin allies. Q. Minucius had direction (by reason that he wrote how he had performed in his Province all that there was to be done, and ther the whole Nation of the Ligurians had yielded subjection) to translate his forces out of Liguria into the Boians country, and to deliver the same to P. Cornelius the Pro-

Out of that territory which he had taken away from them after they were vanquished, those City legions were withdrawn, which had been levied and enrolled the year before; and committed they were to the charge of M. Lucius the Pretor, besides 15000 foot, and 6000 horse of Latine allies: and all these forces were to be employed for so defend and keep in obedience, Apulia and the Britians country, as for A. Cornelius the Pretor of the former year, (who with an army had the government of the Brutii) he was commanded to deliver unto M. Aelius (if the Conful thought it good) the legions transported over into Eceia, if he would remain there still: but if Aelius would rather return to Rome, then A. Cornelius with that army, was to remain in Eceia. Thought it good, that C. Atinius Laboe should receive of M. Aemilius, the government of Sicily and his army: and if he pleased him, to take up and enrol out of that very Province 2000 foot and 100 horse, to supply and fulfill the broken companies. P. Junius Brutus had commandment to levy a new army for the government of Tusculum, and 15000 foot of Latine allies, and 400 horse. Alto L. Aemilius the Admiral, was to receive of M. Lucius the Pretor of the former year, twenty Gallies, and the mariners and oars thereto belonging: and besides, to levy himself 1000 mariners more, and 2000 footmen: and with those ships and footmen to fall into Asia, and to receive the fleet of C. Licinius. As for them that were already in the government of both the Provinces of Spain and of Sardinia, they were to continue there still for one year longer, and to have the same armies at command. This year were two tenths of corn levied of Sicily and Sardinia: and order was given for all the Sicilian corn to be sent into Eceia to the army: but out of Sardinia, that one part should be brought to Rome, and the other transported over into Eceia, even to the same place that the other of Sicily afore-said.

Before the Confuls went forward into their Provinces, it was thought meet, that the Pontifices should give order for the expiation of certain prodiages: for at Rome the Temple of Inna Lucina was smitten with lightning; so as both the lantern, yea, and the leaved dores thereof, were foully disfigured. Likewise at Futeoli, the Town walls in many places, and one gate, was blasted with lightning, and two men besides were drunken dead therewith. *At Norcia it was for certain known that the day being fair and clear, there arose a stormy tempest, wherein also two free men lost their lives. The Tuckulans reported, that with them it rained earth. And the men of Rome brought word, that within their territory a female mole celled Thete. These prodiages (I say) were expiated: and the Latine festival holy-dates were celebrated anew, for that the sole of flesh was not given unto the Laurens, which of duty should have been delivered. Moreover, a solemn supplication was ordained, in regard of all errors and faults escaped in divine service and Religious observances. Alto out of the books of Sibylla, the Decemvirs declared and shewed, to what Gods sacrifice should be made: and ten young springals free born, and ten Virgins likewise, who on their part, and Mothers yet living, were employed about the ministrity of those sacrifices. The Decemvirs also by night sacrificed younguckles, and P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before he took his journey, erected an arch in the Capitol (over against the high street that leadeth thither) with 7 gilded statues and 2 horses: and before that arch, he set up two cestrons or layers of marble. About this time, 43 principal persons of Eceia, (among whom were Democritus and his brother) were conveyed to Rome, by two Squadrions or cohorts sent of purpose from M. Aelius: and there were laid in a prison called "The Stone quarries": which done, the cohorts afore said were commanded by L. Cornelius the Conful, to make return to the army. From Ptolemaion and Cleopatra (King and Queen of Egypt) there came Embassadors, testifying their joy which they conceived in the behalf of the Romans, in these terms, That M. Aelius the Conful had chas.

K. Antichus out of Greece exorthing also the Romans to transport an army into Asia for more of that not in Asia only, but likewise in Syria, all men were smitten with fear and amazement. As for the KK. of Egypt, they were ready to do for their parts, whatever the Senate should let down. Thanks were returned to the K. and Q. afore-said, and order was taken, that to the Embassadors for a reward should be given 4000 brazen Asses apiece.

L. Cornelius the Conful, having accomplished all things to be done at Rome, published an Edict in a general assembly, That all those footlers whom himself had enrolled for supply, as they who were with A. Cornelius in the Brutians country, should all meet at Brundisium upon the Ides of Q. Quintilius, Moreover he nominated three Lieutenants, Sex. Digeius, L. Appius, and C. Fabricius Luscinus, to gather ships together out of all the Sea-coasts into Brundisium. And when he had prepared and let all things in good order, he departed from the City, clad in his rich A rich coat of arms, There presented unto the Conful as he went north, to the number of 5000 vop lunabilities. Romans and allies together, who had sever'd their civil years in the war, under the conduct of P. Africam, and now were exempt from fouldiers, who all offered to go with him and to be enrolled as preti fouldiers. Much at the time that the Conful took his journey (during the festival Appollinarine games in the honour of Apollo, upon the first day before the Ides of July) it chan-ned, that in the day time, when the air was clear and fair, there rose a sudden darkness during the Eclipse of the sun, by reason that the body of the moon was directly under the Circle and rundle of the sun. L. Emilius Rhambus also Admiral of the war, at the same time went to Sea, L.
Aemilius was charged by order from the Senat, to build 50 Galleys with five banks of oars, and 30 Gallies with three banks, because a brisk was blown and hazzed abroad, that Amarnus upon the late battaile at sea, was about to prepare a much greater armado.

The Tholans, after their Embassadors were returned from Rome and had made relation, that there was no hope of peace, albeit all their Sea-coasts (especially toward Peloponnesus) were spoilt and wasted by the Athenians, yet minding more their profit like to come than remembering their loves received, seized the montan octa. intending to impeach and stop the passage of the Romans. For they made no question not doub't, but that the next spring, they would return to be-fiage and affniss Naupactum, Aetolus, who with what they expected, thought it better to go in hand with an enterprise unlook'd for, and namely, to affal Lamos for thus he thought, That feeling they had been already brought to a great fright and extremity by King Philip; now they might be taken sufficiently and impris'd at unawares, because they stood in fear of nothing less.

Whereupon, removing from Elatus, he encamped first in the country of his enemies neer to the River Sperchius from whence by night he dislodged, and advanced forth with his ensigns, and by the day break had invest'd their walls round about. Great fear and hurry there was, as in an accident unlook'd for: yet all that day they defended the City more resolutely, than a man would have believed and thought they could have done in so fudden a danger: whiles men robbed at defence upon the walls. Women set up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and darts of all sorts, yea, and stones up to the walls unto them. Aetolus, after he had disposed the retreat, brung back his men into the camp about moon; and after they had there refreshed their bodies with meat and rest, he gave them warning (before he dismissed the forces in the) that ere night the next morning they should be ready in arms: for that he would not come back again with them into the camp, before they were masters of the Town. At the same time as the day before, he gave assail in many places: and as much as the Townsmen strength decay'd, their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts were, within few hours he was in the City. After he had made a riddance of the pillage, sold some part, and given away the rest, he fell to take count what to do afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go against Naupactum considering that the Tholans held and kept the pal of octa. Howbeit Aetolus, to the end that he would not keep the field in summer without doing some exploit and that the Tholans might not enjoy that peace by the slacknes of the Roman fouldiers, which obtain they could not at the Senats hand, he purpoused to besiege Amphipolis: and so the army was conduc'd thither from Heraclea, by the mountain octa. When he had encamp'd himself under the Town walls, he began too inuess it round with men as he did Lamos, but with ordnance and engines to batter it. In every places at once he ran with the ram against the walls: and albeit they were shaken, the Townsmen went not about either to make ready, or to devise and invent any means of defence against that instrument or engin. All their hope was in truth amill and hardly valour. And do often they fell'd to'th, that they disordered and troubled not only the guards of the enemies, but also thioe that attended about the fabricks and artillery. Howbeit, in many places the wall was basted and breaches made: and even at that very instant news came unto him, that his succesor had landed his army at Apolloclis, and was coming by the way of Ephruss and Thessaly. Now came the Conful with a power of 3000 foot, and five hundred horie. And by this time was he paf'd as far as to the vale and level of Miles: and having sent certain afores to summon the City Hypnta, and received answer again, that they would do nothing but by a publick decree of the Tholans: because the siege of Hippo should not stay him, and Amphipolis not yet won, he led his forces against it, and sent his brother Africam before. Ere they came, the Oppidans had quit the Town, for by this time the wall in many places lay open and naked, and were all fled armed and unarmed into a Castle which they had, impregnable. The Conful pitched his tents six miles from the Town.

Thither arrived the Athenian Embassadors, and first they repaired to P. Scipio, who, as we have said, was gone before the main army, and afterwards to the Conful, intreating for the Tholans.
Of the twain they received a gentler answer at the hands of Africam, who seeking some honest occasion to leave the Tholans war, set his heart and eye wholly upon Aeta and King Antiocbus: and to this purpose he willed the Athenians to perivade not only with the Romans but also with the Tholans, to prefer peace before war. And speedily, through the motion and petition of the Athenians there was a solemn embassage of the Tholans dispatch'd from Hippia. Indeed they were the rather to hope for peace by the speech of Africam (for to him they came first) who discourse'd unto them, how that many Nations and Cities in Spain first, afterwards in Africk, had put themselves under his protection, and in them all he had left greater refinements of his clemency and bounty, than of his warlike valour and martial prowess. Thus they had

brought the matter (as they thought) to a good issue, and made it sure: but when they came before the Council, they had the fame answer of him, with which they were sent away from the Senate, and commanded to avoid. The Athenians wounded therewith anew, seeing they could win nothing neither by the mediation of the Athenian embassage, nor the gracious answer of Africanus, said, they would make report thereof unto their States and country-men. So, they returned from thence to Hispanta, where they were to seek what to do, and could not resolve: for neither had they whereof to raise a thousand talents: and again, if they should absolutely put themselves into their hands, they feared to learn the utmost thereof in their bodies. Therefore they commanded the same Embassadors to go again to the Council and to Africanus, and to exhibit a petition, that if they were minded indeed and verity to grant them peace, and not by vain threats and semblance only to frustrate and delude the hope of poor suppliants, they would either rebate them a quantity of that grand sum of money, or else accept of their abstinence, that no free citizen might be touched thereby in his person. But nothing could be gotten at the Council hands, for to alter or relent any jot: thus was this embassage altogether cast away as it came, and nothing done. The Athenians came after them in place, the principal man of whole embassage, Eche- demus, seeing the Athenians wearied with so many repulses, and lamentably to no purpose bewailing the melancholy estate of their country, put them full in some new hope, and gave them counsel to crave truce for six months, that they might address their Embassadors to Rome and receive an answer from thence: doing unto them, that this delay could not augment their present calamity, which could not worse be; but contrary-wise, time and space coming between might afford them many accidents whereby their present miseries might be mitigated and allayed. So by the advice of Echecdemus, the same men were sent once again who had commended before with P. Scipio and by his means obtained of the Council a truce for that term; which was the thing they craved. The fleet being raised before Amphiors, M. Aemilius, after he had delivered up his army into the hands of the Council, resigned his government, and departed out of the Province: and the Con- ful likewise from Amphiors returned into Thessaly, intending through Macedonia and Thrace to conduct his army into Asia.

Then Africanus entered into speech with his brother, and said: "The journey which you en- terprised L. Scipio, for my part approve and think well of; but all refresh in the will and pleas- ure of Philip: who if he be faith and faithful to the state and Empire of Rome, he will grant us a passage, he will afford us victuals, he will furnish us with all things, which in so long a voyage are necessary to the help and maintenance of our army: but if he fail and forsake you, you must make account of no safety and security throughout all Thrace: therefore I am of advice that the Kings' affection be not bound, and that will be done if the messenger who shall be dispatched unto him, may come upon him a sudden, and take him unprovided and ha- ving no time to put any premented plot in practice, T. Sempronius Gracchus, a most nimble and active young Gentleman, was at that time chosen for the intell percorn to perform this action: who taking forth four Horses all the way as he rode, with incredible speed made it, in speed, that from Amphiors (for thence he had his dispatch) in three days space, he arrived at Pella. The King was at a feast or banquet when he came, and wine he had taken full liberally. And finding him thus disposed to solace and recreating his spirits, he had no reason to suspect that he was misplaced and inclined to any change or alteration: and so for that time this guest was hidden wel- come, and had good cheer made him. The morrow after, he saw the provision of victuals in great store ready for his armies, he beheld the Bridges made over the Rivers, and the high ways mended and prepared; where passage was difficult. With these intelligences he returned to the Council, with as great speed as he went and met him at Thessalia. From whence, the army in much joy, and with greater and more allured hope, entered into Macedonia; where all was provided to their hands. The King at their coming received them right stately, and at their departure conducted them on the way as royally. Very willing, ready and courteous he shewed himself; which Africanus much liked and highly commended, being a man, as in all other things singular, so in allowing of elegance and humanity, if it were without superfluity and excess, nothing neat and upright-squared. Thus they held on their journey unto Hellas, passing through Macedo- nia and Thrace, and Philip still accompanied them, and provided all things for their life abroad.

After the battle fought at Sea near Cosœmum, Antiochus having had all the winter time free without any empeachment to furnish himself with forces both for Land and Sea, above all things studied and devised how to repair his fleet, for fear he should be quite disfigured and disposed of the Sea. And even more this ran in his mind, that he had an overthrow, and yet the Rhodian fleet was away. For thus he cast with himself; that if they also should be present at the next con- flict (and surely the Rhodians, thought he, will not for any thing be behind again) he then should have need of a mighty number of ships to match the enemies Armada as well in greatness as good- nes. And therefore he had both sent Annibal into Syria to take up the ships of the Phri- cians, and also commended Polycrates to repair those vessels which he had already and to make and rig others; with so much more diligence as his flight fore was less fortunate. Himself passed the winter in Phrygia and seeking for aid out of all places, he went out as far as into Galatia and Thrace. The people there at that time were great warriors; keeping still the courtesies of Greeks, for that the race of that nation was not yet extinct and worn out. His son Seleucus he had left in Libya with an army to keep the maritime Cities in obedience, which \(\text{Eumenis} \) from \(\text{Pergamum} \) on one side, and the Romans from \(\text{Phocaea} \) and \(\text{Erythrae} \) on the other side, solicited to rebellion. The Roman fleet, as I said before, wintered at \(\text{Cana} \). Thither in the midst almost of winter came \(\text{Eumenis} \) with two thousand foot, and a hundred horse. Who having given out unto \(\text{Livius} \), that great prizes might be raised out of the enemies territory about \(\text{Tipasa} \), had so persuaded and wrought with him, that he sent with him five thousand f cudgellers: who being first to this rode and expedition, in few days drove away a mighty booty. Amid these matters, there hapned a mutiny in \(\text{Phocaea} \), by occasion of some that would have withdrew and turned away the hearts of the multitude unto King \(\text{Antiochus} \). The winning of the fleet was chargeable to that City. The imposition of a tribute was heavy, in regard that they were put to the finding of five hundred side caskets, and as many coats for liveries: the fear of corn also was grievous unto them; for which default the ships and the Roman garrison abandoned the place and departed: whereupon on that faction which in all their speeches and assembles drew the common people to side with \(\text{Antiochus} \), was rid of all fear. The Senat and the principal citizens of \(\text{Phocaea} \) were of opinion to continue to the last, in the association of the Romans: but the periwaders and cowillers of a revolt were of more credit with the multitude.

The Rhodians were not so flow the summer fall, but they were as forward now in the spring: for before mid-March, they sent out the same \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) Admiral of a fleet of six and thirty sail, And by this time \(\text{Livius} \) proceeded from \(\text{Cana} \), and sailed toward \(\text{Hellæontus} \), with thirty ships, and seven Galles of four banks of oars, which King \(\text{Eumenis} \) had brought with him, to the end that he might prepare things necessary for the passage of the army, which he supposed would come by \(\text{Land} \). And first he fell with the bay or port which they call, The rode of the \(\text{Achæans} \), from whence he went unto \(\text{Ilissos} \), where, after he had sacrificed to \(\text{Minerva} \), he gave gracious audience to the envoys of the neighbors bordering, which came from \(\text{Eleusis} \), \(\text{Dardæon} \), and \(\text{Rhæmus} \), who committed their Cities and unto his protection. From thence he directed his course to the eight W. of \(\text{Hellæontus} \) and leaving ten ships in the rode over against \(\text{Abydos} \), with the rest of the fleet he passed over into \(\text{Europe} \), to assault \(\text{Séfeas} \). As the armed cudgellers approached their walls, the famel Priests of \(\gamma \text{Cybél} \) called \(\gamma \text{Gallo} \), bereft of their wits presented themselves first unto them before their gates, in their solemn habit and veiments, saying, That they being the envoys and ministers of \(\gamma \text{Cybél} \) the mother of the Gods, were come by the intimation and commandment of that goddess to beleech the Roman General to spare the walls and the City. And not one of them had any harm done unto them, Anon, the whole body of the Senat with the Magistrates came forth to yield the Town. From thence they crossed over to \(\text{Abydos} \), where (after many particulars, in which they had founded their minds: and could have no answer tending to peace) they addressed themselves to lay siege to the City: and to assault it.

While these thinges lay about \(\text{Hellæontus} \), \(\text{Polyxenidas} \) a Rhodian born, but banished his country, and a Captain or King \(\text{Antiochus} \), hearing that a Rhodian fleet was gone to \(\text{Sea} \), and that \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) their Admiral had in open audience given out certain proud and disdainful speeches against him, entred into a privat quarrel with him, and provoking in his mind night and day nothing else, but how he might by some effectual and worthy deeds, check and confute thole brave and glorious words of his. He dispatched therefore unto him as a messenger, a man well known unto him, with credence and inducements: to give him to understand, that himself would (if he might) hand both \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) and his country in good seal: and that \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) (if it pleased him) had means to restore him again into his native country. When \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) marvelled hereat, and was very inquisitive to know how this might be effected: and gave him his faithful promise (as I say) either to join with him in the action, or else to conceal all and keep counsel: then the messenger declared, that \(\text{Polyxenidas} \) would make over unto him the Kings navy either entire, or the greater part thereof: and in consideration and recom pense of this so great demerit, he desired no more but that he might return into his country. The importance of this matter was so great, that he neither believed his words, nor yet negleected and disdained the same. So he went to \(\text{Pamminus} \), a place in the Land of \(\text{Samos} \), and there he abode to view and see the thing that was offered unto him. Courriers there ran between, and never would \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) give credit to the party, until \(\text{Polyxenidas} \) wrote a letter with his own hand in the presence of his said messenger, that he would perform whatsoever he had promised, yea, and sent the same letters sealed with his own sign Manual. By this sure pledge or write, \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) made full account that he had the traitor surely bound and obliged unto him. For thus he thought, that \(\text{Polyxenidas} \) living as a subject under the King, would never hazard the danger of such pregnant matter to appear against himself, testified under his own hand-writing: so from that time forward the means of this pretended and counterfeit treason was devized and agreed upon, \(\text{Polyxenidas} \) gave him to understand, that he would of purpose lay aside and neglect of preparation of all furniture, that he would neither have rowers nor other mariners in any number about his fleet: moreover, under a colour of calling and caltrefting he would lay up some ships on dry Land: others he would send away into the havens near at hand, and keep some few riding at anchor before \(\text{Ephesus} \) in the haven, and those (if he were forced to bartall) he would let out to fight. The same negligence that \(\text{Pausilipæus} \) heard say \(\text{Polyxenidas} \) would use in his fleet, the same himself presently shewed in his own. For some of his ships he sent to \(\text{Halicarnassius} \) for victuals, and other to \(\text{Samos} \) the City, to the end that he might be in readiness when the traitor gave the signal of assault, Polyxenidus still by tale semblance encroached the errors and vain imaginations of Polyxenidus: for he some ships indeed he drew aland and laid up day: and as if he meant to hale up more, he repaired and amended the docks. Oremen and mariners he sent not forth out of their winter harbors to go to Ephesus, but secretly assembled them to Magnesia. Now it followed that a certain soilder serving under King Antiochus, who was come to Samos about some private affairs of his own, was apprehended there for a spy, and brought to Panormus before the Admiral Polyxenidus. Who believing demanded what they did at Ephesus? I know not whether for fear, or upon small loyalty that he bare to his Prince and country, discovered all: namely, that the fleet rid in the haven rigged, decked andtrimmed in readiness: items, that all the rowers and mariners were sent to Siphnus in Magnesia: items, that some veles, and those very few, were drawn up to land, and the docks and harbors were shut up close: and lastly, that never at any time before, the navy was so carefully looked into, nor Sea-affairs so well managed. But the mind of Polyxenidus was to proceed before, with foolish conceits and vain hopes; that he would not believe these informations and intelligences for true. Polyxenidus having let all things forward and in good readiness, by might sent for the rowers and mariners from Magnesia: and having in great hait shot to sea, and set aloft those veles which lay at one side upon the land, after he had spent the whole day, not so much in making provision, as tailing out the time on the purpose, because he would not have the fleet to be taken when it set forth, weighed anchor and closed after the sun was down: and with 70 fail of covered ships, because he had a contrary wind, entered the Bay of Pygale before day, where retting all the live-long day for the same purpose as before, the next night he failed to the nearest coasts of Samos. From whence he gave commandment to one Nicander an Archipiret, to sett for Peloponnes, with five close covered ships, there to land: and from thence to march with his armed soildiers over the fields the nearest way to Panormus, and to come upon the back of the enemies: himself in the mean while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Panormus, there to keep the entry and mouth of the haven on both sides. Polyxenidus at first was troubled for a while at this unexpected occurrent: but afterwards, as one that was an old beaten soilder, he quickly took heart again, and calling his wits together, supposied that he might more easily repel the enemies by Land than by Sea: and led his soildiers in two Squadrums unto the promontories which bear out into the Sea like two horns, to force the haven: from which two capes or heads he supposied that he might easily set back and put by the enemies with shooting darts from both sides. But Nicander who was sent by Land, impecied this design of his, so that he was forced suddenly to change his mind and alter the course, and therefore commanded all his men to go a shipboard and away: Hereupon exceeding fear there was both among the soildiers and also the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by Sea and not to fight, seeing themselves in- vironed at once both by Land and Sea. Polyxenidus supposing the only way to escape and save themselves, was to make way through the mouth of the haven, and so to recover sea-room: after he had taken all his men embarked, commanded the reft to follow, and himself first plying and la- bouring hard with oars, fennaded amain with his ship to the entrance of the haven. Now when the was once past the freight and come into the open Sea, Polyxenidus was there to welcome him with three Galeases of five banks of oars and to beate him. The poor ship was wounded with the iron pikes bearing out in the beam heads of the Galeases, and so buoyed and sunk withall. The defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with shot of darts, and among the reft, Poly xenidus himfelf manfully fighting left his life. The reft of the ships were boorded and taken, some before the haven, others within: and some there were that by Nicander were feldaz as they laboured to loose from the land, and to lanch forth. Five ships only of Rhodes, and two of Cnos escaped clear and fled, which made themselves way even among the thickest of their enemies: by the means of a fearful burning flame of fire that they had with them. For they set me two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two sirit-fails, in very ship, carrying iron pons and pans afore them full of light fire, The Gallies of Ephesius, meeting the Rhodian ships not far from Samos as they fled, the which were coming to help them, turned their course backward into Hellaspuntus, unto the Romans. About the same time Seleucus gained the City of Phocas by treachen, entring in at a gate which the warders let open of purpose for him, and for fear, Cyrus and other Towns of that coaft revoled unto him.

Whilesthe things thus paffed in Ephesus, and that Abydos had endured the siege for certain days by the defence of the Kings garrison that manned the walls: now that all were ovetossed and wearyied, the Magistrates of the City (by the permiffion of Philoras Captain of the garrison) articled with Livius upon conditions to render the Town. The only point whereupon they ftood, and which played the conclusion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the Kings soildiers should be taken away armed or difarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, news came of the Rhodians defeat and in the opportunity of gaining the Town flipt out of their hands. For Livius fearing, left Polyxenidus paffed up with the succeds of fo great an exploit, would purrize the fleet that rid at Cane, leaving presently the fiege before Abydos, and the garding of Hellasport, put to Sea after those ships that lay day at Cane. And Eumenes came to Eles: But Livius went to Phocas with all his fleet, to which he had adjoyved two trireme gallies of Mytilene. But when he heard it was kept with a strong garrison of the Kings, & that Seleucus was encamped not far off, after he had pilled the flat-coat, and charged hardly his ships with a good booty, & those were prizes of men especially, he stayed no longer there than till Eumenes might overtake him with his fleet, but.
but directed his course straight to Samos. The Rhodians upon the first news of this their overthrow, feared much, and withal mightily sorrowed: for besides the loss of their Sea-foudiers and ships, they lost also the very flour and strength of their youth: for inasmuch as many young Gentlemen of their nobility, accompanied Pausilipus, among other motives, in regard of his authority, which was right great and for good defers among his country-men. But afterwords considering how treatably they were over-wrought, and namely, by one of their own citizens, born among them, their melancholy turned into choler, and their sorrow into anger. Whereupon they sent forth ten ships immediately, and few days after other ten, under the conduct of Endymius the Admiral over them all; who albeit he were not for other feats of arms and martial skill equal to Pausilipus, yet they supposed verily he would be a leader to much the more wary and circumstanced, as he was the leisibard and courageous. The Romans and King Eumenes first fell with the Island Erythrae, where they stayed one night, and the morrow after gained the point of Cospus, a promontory of the Ticians. From whence when they purposed to cross over to the nearest parts of Samos, not waiting for the fun-rising, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they hoisted up sails against a very doubtful and dangerous tempest: for the wind turned from North-east to full North, as they were in the midst of their course, whereby they began to be mightily tossed among the lurching billows of the rough and angry Sea. Polyxenidas supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Samos, there to join with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Ephesus, and first anchored at Myconius: from hence he failed to an island called Macris, to the end that as the enemies fleet failed by him he might take advantage to set upon either some ships singled and sever from the body of the fleet or play upon the sail and rearguard thereof. After that he perceived the whole fleet to be dispersed by force of the tempest, he thought fit to take that occasion to fall upon them: but the wind rising still more and more, and raising greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come near to hoosti them: he cut over to the Island Ethalia, minding the next day to catch the ships in the main Sea as they passed to Samos. Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samos, which they might with ease pass and empey: the rest of the fleet after they had been tossed and tormented all the night long in the deep, a length light upon the same harbor. Where being advinrented by the peacans of the country, that the enemies ships lay in the road of Ethalia, they fell to consult, whether presently to bid battle and put it to the hazard, or expect the arrival of the Rhodian fleet. Deferring therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed) they traveled to Cospus, from whence they came. Polyxenidas likewise, having faild at anchor in vain returned to Ephesus: and then the Roman ships, while the Seas were thus clear of enemies, faild over to Samos, Thither also arrived the Rhodian fleet few days after: and that it might appear how long looked for it was, they all presently let fall for Ephesus, with purpose either to try an issue by a battle at Sea, or else if the enemy refused the trial, to express and wroung from him a plain confesion of cowardice: which was a material point and of great importance to move the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Being arrived to the very haven mouth, they embattled their ships and stood directly affront oppoed unto it. And when they law none make tail nor set out against them, the one part thereof rode alioe at anchor still in the very haven mouth: the other discharge the foudiers and set them a land. Upon whom (as they were driving a mighty boat which they had raised by foraging all the country over) andronicus a Macedonian, who lay in garrison at Ephesus, failld forth, even as they approached the walls of the City: and having ealdeed them of a great part of their prey aforesaid, he chased them to the Sea unto their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having bestowed an ambus about the mid-way between, marched in order of battle against the City, to see if peradventure they could train forth the Macedonian again without the walls: but perceiving that no man durst come abroad for frepition and fear of an awhit they returned to their ships again; and when they law their enemies would not abide them neither at Sea nor on Land, in the end the fleet faild again to Samos from whence it came. Therein the Praetor made out two Gallies of Italian confederates, and as many Rhodians under the conduct of Epirastes the Rhodian Admiral, to defend and keep the strong-huts of Cephalenis, which Hibisbus, the Macedonian together with the youth of the Cephalenis, infelcted with his roving and robbing in so much as there could no ships pass by Sea to and fro with victuals between Italy and that coast. At Pyrrhus Epirastes met L. Aemilius Regillus coming in succed the Admiralty: who hearing of the deat of the Rhodians, and having himself but two Quinqueremes Alieaces, brought Epirastes back with him into Asia with four ships. There accompanied them also the open ships of the Athenians, And he passd over by the Sea * Aegaeus, Thither also arrived Transiles: the Rhodian in the head of the night with two Quadrireme galiies from Samos, who being brought unto Aemilus, declared how he was sent to quiet and defend that Sea-coast, which the Kings roving ships and men of war by their often extusions from Hellas points and Asia did made too hot for the Hulks and other ships of burden which used to pass that way. As Aemilus faild from Chios to Samos, two Rhodian Quadrireme Galilees were sent by Levis to meet him: and King Eumenes also with two Quinqueremes alsoe presented himself into him. Being all arrived at Samos, Aemilus after he had received the navy of Levis, and sacrificed order as the manner was, called a council, at which C. Levis (for his opinion was asked first) spake and said,* That nothing giveth more end and faithful counsel then he who perwadeth another man to that which himself would do in the same case. As for me, my intent and purpose was to go against Ephesus with the whole armado, and thither to bring with me the vessel of burden if charged with heavy ballast of gravel and sand, and to sink them in the very haven mouth or to chock it up. And to make this bar against the haven, it was a matter (said he) of great difficulty, for that the mouth and gulley of the haven was in manner of a river, long, narrow, and full of shells and shallows. By which means I should have cut off the benefit of the Sea from the enemy, and make him lose the life altogether of his navy. But no man there besides himself thought well of this device. King Eumenes demanded, what they would do then after this chocking up and stoppage of the haven passage, by sinking the ships? whether they would depart from thence with their own navy at liberty, to help their allies and terrify and estrange their enemies; or never the less still, keep the haven (as it were) in siege with the whole fleet? For if they departed, who could make doubt but that the enemy would pluck up those dams and bars that there lay I drowned; yea, and with less ado and trouble, open the haven again, than it was stopped? and if they meant to tarry there nevertheless, to what purpose was the whole haven shut up? But contrary-wise, they within Ephesus (quoth he) being in security for any danger from their haven and having a most rich and wealthy City of their own, furnished with all things of use, would pass the summer season in rest and repose; whereas the Romans, flitting in the open wide sea, exposed to the violence of waves and lying at the mercy of tempests, should be driven to keep a continual guard, disturbed with very thing, and rather tied up and debarr'd themselves, for being able to effect those things that were needful to be done, than in case to embarke and shunt up their enemies. Then Eudamus, the Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, opined for his part, and spake to the question saying, That he rather disliked of that course, than knew himself a better or could advise what was to be done. Epebrotes the Rhodian was of mind, to leave Ephesus for the present, and to send part of his ships into Lyca, to join or to associate unto them Patara, the capital City of that nation; showing two things of great consequence, that hereby would ensue. For both the Rhodians allured of peace, and secured from all associates of those quarters that lie about their Island, might thereby attend wholly, and employ all their forces upon the regard of this only war against Antiochus, and also the Armada which was prepared in Lyca might be hopp'd and embassaged for ever, joyning with Seleneus. This opinion importuned and prevailed most. Howbeit, being good it was and agreed upon, that Rhodos should present himself before Ephesus, with the whole fleet, to strike terror into the enemies. And C. Livius was sent with four Rhodian quadrireme Galleys, and two Smyrnaen open ships into Lyca, with direction to take Rhodes in the way, and let with them there to communicate with all his complices. The Cities which he pass'd by, namely, Adana, Myndus, Halicarnassus, Citidos and Cesus, performed willingly what ever was enjoined and imposed upon them. Being arrived at Rhodes, he declared unto the Rhodians the effect of his commission, and withal required their advice. They all approved the design and when he had taken of them the fleet that he had of his own, three quadrireme galleys more, he failed to-ever for ever joining with Seleneus. This opinion importuned and prevailed most. Howbeit, being good it was and agreed upon, that Rhodos should present himself before Ephesus, with the whole fleet, to strike terror into the enemies. And C. Livius was sent with four Rhodian quadrireme Galleys, and two Smyrnaen open ships into Lyca, with direction to take Rhodes in the way, and A proper person to make a voyage thither with his whole fleet, and to assault the City with all the force he could possibly, and having fallen along _Miletus_, and all that coast of the ancients, they disembarked from the gulf or creek of _Bargentia_, and came a land near _Iasius_. The City was held by a garrison of the Kings: and the Romans waited by way of hostility, the territory about it. Then _Emilius_ sent certain to parle with the chief citizens and the Magistrates, to find them how they were disposed, and also to solicit them to revolt: but being answered again that it lay not in their own power to do as they would, he marched forward to give an assault to the City. Now there were certain Sallians, banished persons, in company with the Romans, who in great number befought and importuned the Rhodians, not to suffer a City, to near a neighbour and linked in blood, to come, for perih and come to ruin, especially having no way offended; alleging

B that the only cause of their banishment was their loyalty unto the Romans; and by the fame violence of the Kings garrison foundiers, were they also held in awe who remained in the City, by which themselves had been expelled. For all the Sallians in general were of one mind, most willing and desirous to avoid and hide off the servitude under the King. The Rhodians were moved in comparision with their prayers, and joining unto them _Emilius_ also, partly by showing the contangunity and kindred between them, and partly by pitying and lamenting the disquieted state of the City (befeged as it were, already by the kings garrison) they prevailed so much that they forbare to assay it. So they departed from them, and because all other parts were peaceable, they sailed along the coast of _Afia_, until they arrived at _Lyamines_, a port of haven town even a against _Rhodes_. There in the _Principis_ began first a secret whispering among the Colonels (which afterwards came to the ears of _Emilius_ himself), namely, That the navy was led away far enough off from _Ephesus_, where by right and of duty he was to war; to the end, that the enemy being left at liberty behind their backs, might begin to do what he list without controulment, against so many Cities and States of the Roman allies nearer unto him. _Emilius_ was moved herewith, and calling unto him the Rhodians, demanded of them, Whether the whole armido might reside contently within the haven of _Patara_? And when they answered No, he took that occasion to pass no further, but to give over the voyage, and to bring back his ships to _Samor_.

In this same time _Seleucus_, the son of _Antiochus_, after he had kept his army all winter-time in _Eolis_, employing it partly in succouring his _Seleucus_, and partly in laking and pillage them who he could not draw into association, intended to invade the coines of King _Eumeneus_ his Realm, whiles he (together with the Romans) was busied far from home, in assailing the maritime parts of _Lycaea_. And first he approached _Elea_ in counuence of an enemy, with banner dispiated: but afterwards, leaving to besiege the City, after spoil made in hostile manner of the territory, he marched forward to besiege and assault the head City and capital strength of all his Kingdom _Pergamum_. _Attalos_ at the beginning seemed rather to brave and provoke him unto fight with his strong guards that he had placed without the City, and executions with his horsemen and light armours, than to stand upon his guard and defence, and to receive the forces of his enemy; but at length, seeing by these light skirmishes that he was in no respect able to match _Seleucus_, he retired himself within his walls, and to the City began to be besieged. And much about the same time, _Antiochus_ also being near _Apamea_, first lay embacped at _Sardis_, and afterwards, not far from the camp of _Seleucus_, near to the head of the souther of the river _Cestrus_, with a mighty army composed of divers and many kinds nations. The greatest fiew of terror in this army was a redoubled Regiment of _Gauls_, to the number of four thousand, hired for wages, whom with some few other among them, he sent out to wait and destroy all parts of the territory about _Pergamum_.

When news hereof came to _Samos_, _Eumeneus_ at the first, being called away by this war, (begun at home, even at his very dores) made haste with his fleet to _Elea_; where finding in readiness certain horsemen and footmen both lightly appointed, by their sure convoy and safe conduct, he came to _Pergamum_ before the enemies had knowledge thereof. or enterprised anything. Where once again they began to make light skirmishes by way of executions, for truth _Eumeneus_ lay off, and was not willing to hazard the main chance upon a throw. Few dayes after, both the Roman and Rhodian fleet came from _Samos_ and were arrived at _Elea_ to sue the King _Eumeneus_. When _Antiochus_ was advertised that they had landed their forces at _Elea_, and that so many armadoes were met together in that one haven, and hearing within about the same times, that the Conful was already with a power in _Macedony_ making reparition of all things for his passage over _Hellespont_; he imposted now it was high time (before that he were profled at once both by _Land_ and _Sea_ to treat for peace, and therefore he seized a certain hill over against _Elea_, to fortify and encamp in. Where, leaving his whole power of infantry, he defended into the plain, under the very walls of _Elea_, with all his Cavalry, to the number of his thousand Horse. And sending an herald to _Emilius_, he gave him to understand, that he was defious to have a treaty of peace, _Emilius_ sent for _Eumeneus_ from _Pergamum_, and they both, together with the Rhodians, debated in council what to do. The Rhodians refused not the offer. But _Eumeneus_ laid it was neither honourable to parle of peace at that time, nor yet possible to conclude thereof, if they went about it. - For being as we are (quoth he) pinned up within our walls and besieged, how can we receive from another, conditions of peace, saving our credit and honour? and who will hold that for a firm and assured peace, which we shall contract without the presence of the Conful, without the authority of the Senate, and without the grant of the people of _Rome_? For I demand of you, when ye have made a peace, whether you will return presently into _Italy_ or no? whether you will withdraw. withdraw your fleet and army? or rather wait and expect to know the Consul his mind and advise, the Senators' pleasure and ordinance, and the general consent of the people in that behalf? It remaineth then after that is done, that you stay till in Antioch, and that your forces being brought back again into their wintering harbors, (after they have done with warlike) fall to consume and eat out our allies by charging them with provision of victuals: and afterwards, if it shall so please the higher powers, and those that are in authority (to ordain, we must begin that war anew, which now we are able: if we flack not the time nor stop the forward course wherein we are) before winter come, with the favor and power of the Gods: to finish and bring to a final end. This advice took place; and answer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treaty of peace before the Consul his coming. Antiochus having thus in vain sought for peace, when he had first foraged and watched the territory of Elaea, and afterwards of Pergamus, left his son Seleucus there, and went himself in person to Adranostium, pillaging and spoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of holiness. Now this territory is a rich country, called, The camp plain of Thebe: much renowned by the Poet Homer in his poem: and in no one place besides of all Agea got the Kings soldiers greater booty and more pillage. Thither arrived also to Adrianostium both Amyclus and Eumenes (having set a compulsion by sea) for the defence of the said City. During this time, they sent for a thousand horse, and a hundred horse out of Achaea to come unto Elaea: all which forces were commanded by Captain Diophanes. So soon as they were disembarked and landed, there were ready to receive them certain men sent from Attalus of purpose to meet them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus. They were all old soldiers: and well experienced in feats of war: and their leader Diophanes had been brought up and trained under Philip, the greatest soldier in those days of all the Greeks, who took but two days for to reit his horse and men, and to take view of the enemies guards, namely, in what places and at what time they used customably either to come forward, or to retire. The Kings soldiers were approached almost to the very foot of the hill, where the City is sittuate. By means whereof at that time they were not to be made unerringly to know, whether they were to go forth and make their encampment under covert shade, or to proceed forth into the City to make a most valiant and direct assault against the corps de guard of the enemies. After they were once to see that no enemy was near, that they were fain to keep themselves close within the walls, the Kings soldiers without began first to contemn, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had not their horses so much as faded and bridled, and some few were left in arms and in ordinance of battle: the rest were gone aside and sped over all parts of the champain: some went to play and took themselves to youthful sports and wanton fior: others fell to feeding pampering their bellies, and making good cheer under covert shade: and many were laid along asleep. Diophanes beheld all the manner of such a thing from a high turret of the City Pergamus, and presently gave commandment to his soldiers to take arms and be ready at the gate. Himself went to Attalus, and told him, that he purposed to assail the enemies corps de garde. Attalus (although he were very loth) gave him leave: for he saw well, that he was to fight with one hundred horse against three hundred: and one thousand foot against four thousand. Being out of the gate, he set him down not far from the enemies corps de garde, waiting when some good opportunity and occasion would offer it him. Both they within Pergamus of one side, deemed this to be folly rather than hardiness: and also the enemies on the other side making towards them for a while, and perceiving them not to stir, altered nothing of their usual negligence, and that which more was, made a mockery and scorn of their small number. Diophanes kept his men still a good time, as if he had brought them forth only for a show, to see and be seen: but after he perceived once the enemies to be disband out of their ranks and ranges, he commanded the footmen to make all the haft they could after, whiles himself leading the way first among his horsemen, ran with his whole troop upon the spur as hard as ever he could, and setting up a shout and cry aloud on all hands, as well with foot as horse, charged suddenly upon the enemies guards, ere they were aware of them. Man and horse both were greatly feared: and the horses especially having broken their collars and halters wherewith they flood tied made foul work and much trouble among their own party. Some few of the horse kept their findings still unfrighted, and even those they had much ado to faddle, to bridle, and to mount upon; with great terror came the Achaeans, and with much more than small number could be thought to make. And as for the footmen in order arranged and well provided they fell upon those that were negligently dispersed abroad ere they looked for them, and in manner half asleep. Great execution and but small harm was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fled amain. Diophanes having followed the chase as they ran away in scattering wise, so far as he might well with safety of himself, returned to the guard and defence of the City, having great honor to the nation of the Achaeans by this exploit: for not only the men, but women also beheld this service, and looked on him from the walls of Pergamus. The next day after, the Kings corps de garde were better ordered and kept closer together, yea, and tired half a mile farther from the City, where they encamped themselves. The Achaeans likewise much about the same time advanced to the very same place. Many hours together they looked one upon another who would begin first, expecting every minute when the charge should be given, but after the sun was near going down, and that it was time to return into the camp, they of the Kings part began to ruffle their ensigns and guidon together, and set forward with their hands, ordered in manner of a match for the way, more like than marstilled for to fight a battail, Diophanes sat still so long as they were within sight: but then he charged upon their recondi-
A ward, with as great violence and fury, as the day before, and put them again into so great affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would stay to make head and resist, but trembling for fear, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were beaten into their camp. This boldness of the Achæans forced Seleucus to dislodge and remove out of the territory of Pergamus.

Antiochus after he heard say that the Romans and Eumenes were come to the defence of Adæmytum, medled no more with the town it self, but after he had laid the fields waste, departed from thence, and forced Peræa, a Colony of the Mitylenæans. As for Cato and Cynæus, Aphrodias and Pryneus, they were at the first affait, and to he returned to Sardes by that Syriarch, Seleucus remaining still upon the sea-coasts, as he afofcribed them. So he defended others. The Ro-

B man fleet together with Eumenes and the Rhodians failed first to Mitylæan, and back again from thence, returned to Eles from whence the came. So they held on their course to Phœoes, and fell with an Island called Bœakbin, futur above the City of the Phœceans: and after they had pill’d and rifed by way of hotlisty the Temples, which heretofore they had forbear’d, and taken away the Images (for the Island was magnificently adorn’d and beautified them with) they crof sed over to the City it self, which they had in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three parts; but feeing that it might not be won with bareScaling and strength of arms, without planting engines of battery and other fabrics; and besides, three thousand ar-

C med men fent from Antiochus for defence, were entered into the City; pretendely they gave over the siege, and the fleet retir’d to the Islands, having done no other exploit, but only pill’d the terri-

D city about the City. This done, it was thought good that Eumenes should have licence to depart into his own kingdom, that he might provide for the Conful and the army, all necessaries toward the passage over Hellepontus: also that the Roman and Rhodian fleets should return to Samos, and there remain guard, and have an eye unto Paphiæan, left he removed from Ephesus and made some attempt that way. So the King returned to Eles, the Romans and Rhodians to Samos, where M. Eumelius the Prætor his brother departed this life. The Rhodians, after his funeral obsequies, performed, failed to Rhodes with thirteen ships of their own, one quinquerem galæae of Couts, and the other of Giritus, there to lie in rode, ready to make head against the fleets, which as the brute braced, was aloft and coming out of Syria. Two days before that Eumenes loofed from

E Samos with the Armado, thirteen ships fent from Rhodes under the conduct of Admiral Pamphilus to encounter the fald Syriack fleet, taking with them four other ships, which were for the guard of Caria; delivered from siege Dedalia, and other petty forts which the Kings fouldiers af-failed. Then it was advised that Eumenes should incontinent set forward on his voyage. And to that fle fo, which he had under his charge, he adjoyneyed all four open ships. Being departed, he made fail in all haste that he po{iblycould, and arrived at the port called Mogila; where he or-

F vertook thofe that were gone before: from whence they came in one band and train joyntly to-gether unto Phæfis, and then they judg’d it the best way, in that place to attend the coming of the enemy. This Phæfis standeth upon the confines between Lydia and Paphysia. It lieth far from the sea & is the fift land that fewitheth it, to them that fide from Ciliciæ to Rhodes. Eumenes with an armado of three ships went from Eles, to attend the coming of the enemy, and to prepare against them. This Phæfis standeth upon the confines between Lydia and Paphysia, and being arrived in the river Erymæon, they received an advertisement from the Aphabetians, that the enemies were already before Sidæ. Those of the Kings fide had failed but slowly in regard of the adverfer than of the winds named Etesia, which kept their fift and certain time, like as those do which they call Favonius. Now of the Rhod-

G ians there were 32 quadrireme Gallies, and 4 other triremes besides, The Kings fleet confifted of 50, and thofe of greater burden and bulke among which were three mighty Galæaces of 9 banks of oars on a fide, and four of 6 besides 10 ordinary trireme gailies. There were others also that knew by a fentinel or watch-tower standing on a certain high place, how the enemies were at hand. The next morning by break of day both these fleets fet forth of the haven, as if they would have lodought that very day. And after that Eumenes had pafte the Cape, which from Sido hangeth over into the sea, then prettily were they discovered of the enemies, and the enemies likewise defiryed by them. The left wing of the Kings fleet, flank’d with the main fift, was commanded by Arnauld; and Apollonius one of his gallants and couriers led the right: so as now they had ran their fhips broad in a front rank. The Rhodians advanced forward ordered in length and calling their batells into files. In the vanguard the Admiral fhip of Eumenes was form’d; Caraciltus governed the rear-guard; and Pamphilus had the conduct of the middle way, Eumenes f czy-

H ing the enemies batells arranged and ready for conflict, put forth into the open sea, commanding thofe that followed after in order to keep their array, and so directly to affront the enemy; which at the first caused some trouble, for he was not so far advanced into the deep, that all the ships could be fet in array along the land fide: and besides, himself making too much haste, with five ships only encouneter’d Arnauld, for the reft followed not after him, because they were hidden to range afloat. Now the reeward had no room left them toward the land: and thus whiles they hastily were jumbled together, the fight by that time was begun in the right wing against Annibal. But at one instant the Rhodians call off all fear, as well in regard of the goodliness of their ships, as of their own experience and skill practice in service at sea. For their ships with great quickness and agility making fall into the main sea, made room for every one that came after along the land side: and within an hour happened to run upon a ship of the enemies with her piked beakhead, either first the prow, or wiped away the oars, or putting clear through, between the ranks and files turned again and charged upon the poop. But the thing which terrifie the enemy most was this. That a great gallease of the Kings which had seen banks of oars on a side, was bogued and took a leak with one only knock, that it received by a Rhodian ship far leis: whereupon the right wing of the enemy doublets esclined to fly away. But Annibal I pressed Endomn very much in the open fiesmoll with all multitude of ships: for otherwise in all respects Endomn had the odds and better hand of him by far: and certainly he had compassed and enclosed Endomn round, but that a flag was put out of the Admiral. (by which I gann the dipered ships were wont to rally themselves together:) whereupon all those that had got the better of the enemy in the right wing, made hale to joy in one for to incite our fellows. Then Annibal also and the ships about him, took their flight: but the Rhodians were not able to make way after them and to maintain the chase, by reason that the towers many of them were stuck, and therefore the sooner hurry. Whereupon they call anchor in the main sea, and laid to eat and take some refection for to strengthen their bodies. And in this while Endomn stumped and beheld the enemies how they halted and towed by ropes at the tail of the open ships (that went only with oars) certain other which were show manned fore brinded and craked: and might see 20 or others not much fonder than they, to leave the rest and depart: whereupon casting an Opes and silence to be made from a high tower in the fore-caste of the Admiral, Ask me thy heart (saith he) and see a pleasant sight yonder and a goodly spectacle. So they all arose at once and beheld how the enemies were afraid and what poor shift they made in hale to fly, and with one voice they all in a manner cried out to follow after and pursue them. Now Endomn his own ship was shaken in many places and fore brinded; whereupon he commanded Panphilus and Chelrabius to make way after them, so far forth as they thought they might without danger. And in a good time they held them in chase: but seeing Annibal approaching near the shore and fearing left the wind would lock them within the enemies coast, they returned toward Endomn and drew along with them the great gallease which they took, and which at the first encounter was pierced, and with much ado trained it to Patar. From thence they retired themselves to Rhodos, not to joy out of this victory, blaming another that they had not either sunk or taken the whole fleet of the enemies, having so good means as they had to do it. Annibal darts at with the same insatiate and must be batted, that not even then pals along the river of Lysia, but stayed to make him to the old fleet of the kings so soon as possibly he could. To impeach him for effecting that the Rhodians set out Chelrabius and twenty war ships with piked oars, toward Patar and the Port of Magis; and commanded Endomn to return unto the Romans to Somer with seven of the twelve ships in all the fleet whereof he had the command: to the end, that he might induce the Romans with his counsell and advice, and with all the countenance and authority that he had forced to lay siege unto Patar and to attack it. The Romans took great joy and contentment, first at the news and report of this victory, and afterwards at the return of the Rhodians. And it seemed if that one City stood not in their way to lay them, and that on whose side rid of that care, they would without any let and employment make all the seas distressure for any danger and danger from those quarters. But because Anastochus was departed from Sardis, the Romans held them back, and would not suffer them to abandon the guard and defence of Aeolis and Ionia, for fear left the Cities upon the sea-side might be surpris'd. And so they sent Pentaphilus with four covered ships to the fleet that lay about Patar. Anastochus gathered together not only the garrisons and aids of all the Cities that were about him, but also addressed his Embassadors with letters to Penthia the King of Bithynia, wherein he gave out hard words of the Romans for their passage into Asia; namely, That their coming only was for this to demolish put down, and overthrow all kingdoms: and to let up the only Roman Empire that none else might stand in the whole world. Philippus and Mebon already were subdu'd and deposed and now himself was to make a third against whom they were come. Nei ther would they make an end there but go on still, like a continual fire that burneth forward, and take all afore them and ever as they vanquished one, proceed to another that is next. And he tells them, that they would make a bridge of them to pass over unto Bithynia, now that Eumenes hath gently taken upon his neck the yoke of a servile subjection. Penthia was somewhat touched with these letters, but when there came others written from Seipis the Consul, and his brother Africanus specially he was wholly averted from entertaining any such suspicion. For Africanius besides the contumblulculcnone that the people of Rome had, to advance and amplify the Majesty of KK, their allies and confederates with all kind of honours, soledgeled for his part, the domestic examples of their own house and family: {include} Penthia thereby to enter into a desire to win his love and friendship. For he discharged & laid, *That those Princes and petty KK in Spain, whom he had receiv'd into his protection, he left behind him when he went away mighty monarchial, that he not only had plac'd & establisht Marsafin in his fathers realm & throne, but A but let the him in the kingdom alfo of Syphax, who before had chafed & expelled him: fo as now he was not only the chief poftmortate and moft wealthy K. of all Africa, but also formality & punitive forces a paragon equal to any other K. in the whole world, As for Philip and Nicias, the enimies they were and vanquifhed by T. Quinctius, howbeit they remained KK. afterwards within their own Realms. And Philip verily the year that he had his tribute forgiven him and his fon an holage delivered unto him: yea, and some Cities without the dominion of Macedon, have received them as their K., and the Roman Generals have winked thereat and been contented. And farely Nicias had been likewise grace and honoured, but for his own peevish folly first, & the treacherous falfhood afterwards of the Erolians, which was his utter undoing and overthrow, but the chief thing of all that most confirmed the mind of K. Prusias, was the coming of Livius unto him in embalage from Rome, he who sotetime in quality of Prætor, had been Admiral of the navy. Who fhewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much more allur'd to the Romans than to K. Antiochus: and withall how the Romans would be the father and furer friend of the twin yea, and make more confidence of keeping amity.

Antiochus being put besides all hope of the association with Prusias, departed to Ephesus from Samos, to visit and see the fleet, which for certain months had been rigg'd and in readiness: and this he did the rather, because he knew that he could not hold out with the Roman army and the two Seipotes the commanders thereof, than for that his art-service in itself at any time before iped well, or could afflige how of great and certain success. Yet some little dram he had of good hope for the present in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian fleet was about to remove their fleet from Samos to fupport that affociate City of theirs: and to Polyxenides might thereby take his time and good opportunity to execute some notable exploit. Whereupon he went in hand to plant fabrics against Colophon, and having raised his rampiers, and cast trenches on both fides alike, even to the very sea, he approached with manflets and terraces, as well the one part as the other, into the waters, and under the roof-works, laid upon them with the path & force of the ram. The Colophoniens much troubled and affrighted with these dangers and diftraffes, sent their Orators to Samos unto L. Aemilius, to crave in humble manner the aid and fupport of the Prætor and people of Rome. Aemilius was much confounded and offended in his heart, that he had made to long abode at Samos and performed no service. Nothing less thought he than that Polyxenides, whom twice already in vain he had challenged and hindered battle, would now offer

E to fight. He reputed it also for a di grace and famefull indignity unto him, that Aemilius his fleet affilied the Conil to wait over the legions into Asia, and himfelf was alligned and enjoyed to fupport and aid the City of Colophon befieged, the ifle whereof would be to doubly and uncertain. Uncertainty the Rhodian, who was the man that had daireted and kept him till at Samos, when he was diuerous to pass over into Hellas: yet all the rell were intent with him fhewing and declaring how much better it was, either to deliver his fhips from fledge, or to defteaf the fhips again, which had been once vanquifhed, and fo to put the enemy quiet besides the poffeffion of the ifle; than with the abandoning of his confederates, and betraying Asia both land and fhip into the hands of Antiochus, to depart into Hellas (where Aemilius with his fhips was fufficient to hold him play and to quit that part of the war which was committed to his charge. Welf they looked from Samos to provide widhawks for that all their own provision was spent, felfshaped themselves to cross over unto Chios. That was the garner and flourhouse of the Romans, and the very place unto which all the fhips of burden, and the bulks fent out of Italy, used to fee and direct their course. So they fet a comple of about, toward the coaft of the Ifland that lay fartheft off from the City, opposite to the Northeast, in regard of Chios and Ephraim. And as they were about to pass over therewith the Prætor was certified by letters, that great flore of corn was come out of Italy to Chios; that the fhips which were charged with wine, were kept back by contrary and crofs winds. Likewise, reported was, that the Tyrians had furnifhed King Antiochus his fhips with viufts plentifully and liberally, and had promifed alfo unto him five thoufand vellums of wine. Whereupon he fliffed all suddenly in the midst of his direft course, and made head for Teos, intending either with their good wills to ferve himfelf of the provision prepared for the enemy, or else to hold them for no better than enemies. Having directed the prows of their fhips toward the land, they might defcry, as it were, fifteen fhips near unto Myrounis. Which the Prætor, appounding at the first tofe of the King's fhips, resolved to make way after them: but afterwards it appeared, they were brigantines or pinarnes, and certain small farks of rovers and men of war. These rovers having harried and spoiled all the maritime coasts of the Chians, were upon their return with great flore of prizes and pillage; but when they discovered alveet in the deep sea afar off, they made all the sail they could, and fled. Yare of fleerage they were and well good ordial, by reason that their vessels were more light, and made of purpose to ride ways and besides nearer they were to land. And therefore they had recovered Myonetus, before the fleet could come any thing near unto them. The Prætor thinking verily to force them out of the haven made after without direction of a skillful pilot, and knowledge of the place. Now this Myonetus is a promontory or cape between Teiss and Sumera, a very mountain made in fashion of a steep broad enough at the foot, but rising narrower still, and meanest up to the top sharply pointed. On the main or land side it hath one passage by a straight and narrow path, from the sea it is founded up on rocks highest, and eaten with the continual lusing waves of the sea, in some such as in some places the cliffs that hang over, bear more into the sea than the vessels that lie under the harbor, take up of the sea. The Prætor with his ships durst not approach near unto those large stages of fear of being within the shot of the pirates, who were perched upon the top of those steep rocks, and so they spent that day and lay off. At the last a little before night they gave over that vain enterprise without effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teiss; and having lodged their ships within the harbor which themselves call Geranus, (and it lieth out at the back side of the City) the Prætor there set out his field officers to labour the territory about the City. The Teians seeing their lands spoiled even under their very eyes, addressed certain Orators to the Roman Admiral, arraigned all in white, after the manner of humble suppliants. And as they would have seemed to excuse their City for having done or said any thing against the Romans, the enemies to country; he both charged them directly that they had relieved the vessels of the Prætor with victual and all so told them what quantity of wine moreover they had permitted to POLYXENIDAS, But if they should be content to do the like by the Roman fleet, he would recall his field officers from pillage, otherwise he would reproach them for their enemies. The Embassadors before made relation of this heavy answer. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City assembled the people together, to confess and conclude about this matter what they were bent to do. Thither as it happened, was POLYXENIDAS, arrived with the king's Armado; who having looked from Celephas, when he heard that the Romans were departed from Sumera, that they had chased the Prata as far as Myonetus, and were now waiting and harrying the lands of the Teians, also that their shipsanchored in the promontory Geranus, himself also called an her or argosin of Myonetus, hard by an island which the sailors and mariners called Macera, in secret bay hard by, excuting and clipping from this near harbor, what the enemies did and intended. And in the first good hope he was to distract and L occult the Roman fleet, as he had beforetime the Roman Armado near unto Sumera, by opposing the mouth of the haven, and embattling their sullen forth. For this day was in all respects like unto the other lying just between two steps, which meared near and in manner en the mouth thereof, that hardly two ships at once could go for together. And to this purpose POLYXENIDÆS intended in the night season to take possession, and mark himself sure of the said strait, there to place ten galleys under each Cape which banding there at a vantage they should from both points flark the broad sides of his enemies' ships in their going forth; and withall out of other vessels to disturb land armed field officers, like as he had done at Pandarins, and to out to still them both by sea and land, and make an end of them for all. Which being brought of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romans, after that the Teians had promised them to do whatsoever they should command, thought it more commodious for the receiving of their provision of victuals, to pass with their ships unto the other harbor which was before the City, to the open sea. Some say that ENDYMUS the Rhodian, moved the inconvenience and commodity of the other harbor, of occasion that two galleys, routed in that strait to be so intangled, that they brake one another's ears with juggling together. And among other motives the Prætor was induced to change the harbor, because from the land side there he should lie within danger, considering that Ammonius himself was encamped not far off. Thus the fleet being brought about close to the City side the field officers and mariners (without the knowledge of any commanders) were disbarred fur to divert & open the victuals and wine especially to every ship. But about noon a certain priest of the country chanced to be brought before the Prætor, who gave intelligence, that there was a fleet of ships which two days already rode at anchor under the island Macera; and that but a while ago certain vessel of them were seen to seize anchor as if they would hoist up sail and be gone. The Prætor moved at this sudden occasion, commanded the trumpets to sound the alarm, and to give knowledge and warning, that in case any were flagging abroad in the fields they should retire. The Colonels being sent into the City to gather the field officers, and the mariners, that they might repair to ship-board. This alarm caused a great trouble and confusion, as usually is seen in a sudden carefire, or when a City is surprised by the enemies. Here was flocking into the City to recall their fellows, and was running out of the City to recover their ships; not knowing who commanded, by reason of the dissonant noise of men and found of trumpets howlere, as ship was, at length they ran all toward the ships, but in such a hurry-hurly and disorder that they scarcely knew their own vessel nor if they did they could hardly for the crowd and press get thither and embark themselves. Neither had this affright passed clear without danger both by sea and land, but that ENDYMUS gave direction to every one what to do, and put out of the haven first himself with the Admiral ship into the open sea, & there received every vessel as they followed one another in their order, & ranged them all about and set ENDYMUS also with the Rhodian fleet had not faild at the shore to see good order, that the field officers...
A soldiers might be set aboard without burying in tears full haste, and every ship go forth as it was fitted and made ready. By this means both the foremost of the vanguard were arranged in the right of the Praetor, and the Rhodians also kept their order in the rear guard, as such as they put themselves into the open sea in as good array, as if they had seen the Kings fleet under full. But they were between the two promontories, Agyèus and Cyprus, before they despaired the enemy. The Kings Armado came forward in long files, two and two in a rank, who displaced and spread themselves also affront towards the wing in such wise that they might be able to compass and enclose the right wing of the enemy. Which Eutæmus the same admiral perceiving, and seeing with all that the Romans could not possibly make head alike and extend themselves as broad as the enemy, and were at the point already at the right wing to be environed, made haste with his own B vessels (for the Rhodian banks were of all other in the whole fleet (as well by far) and after he had fronted equally and ready for wing for wing, he made head with his own ship against the very admiral of the enemies, wherein Polyxenides himself was aboard. By this time the battell began between both the main fleets, all at once from every part. Of the Romans side there fought four in all, whereof two and twenty were Rhodians. The enemies armado confuted of four score and nine, all ships of great bulk and making, and had among them three galleons of six banks of oars on a side, and two eftren. For goodnes and strength of ships as also for valour of soldiers, the Romans far surpris'd the Rhodians. But for agility and nimbleness of their vessels, for skilfull knowledge of Pilots, and expert cunning and readiness of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And these above all the rest that carried fire before them in their noxes C troubled and feared the enemies most; and that stratagem and device which had been their only help and means of safety, when they were surpriz'd and beate at Patroonys, was now the thing that load them in both head to win the victory. For the Kings ships leaving the fire that threatened their very faces, turned aside, because they would not run about with their prow's so as they neither could them selfes miscite and hurt the enemies with their brach pikes in the back head, nor yet avoid them, but expose their own broad sides open to receive all pithes and violence from them. If any one fortunat to encounter and run upon them fire was sus to be paid and sped with fire that was flung and cast into her: and more running there was to quench the same, than other wife to fight. Howbeit, the resolute valour of the Roman soldiers (which ever in war prevented most) was it that did the deed. For after the Romans by mere force had broken and cloven the main battallion of the enemy in the very midl, they turned about again and presented themselves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the Kings ships whilst they fought affine and made head against the Rhodians: and thus at one instant the battallion in the midl, and the ships in the left wing that served King Antiochus were beft round about, and link to the bottom of the sea. The right wing as yet entire and found, was more terrified at the los and overthrow of their fellows than for any proper danger of their own. Howbeit, after they saw the other inveted, and the Admiral full with Polyxenides in her, to abandon her companions and to hoise up falls, they likewise in haste set up all their cloth and small trienquet falls (for a good forewind they had for Ephesus) and fled as fast away as they could. Two and forty ships they left in this fight: of which thirteen were boorded and taken for the use of the Romans, the rest were either E consumed with fire, or devoured of the sea. Two Roman ships were shattered and broken in pieces, and some other hurt, bruised and cracked. One Rhodian chanted to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked back head thrice a Sidonian ship, with the violence of the blow the shoke out her own anchor, which by one of the flocks took hold as if it had been a grappling hook by the prow of the other ship. The Rhodians much troubled hereafter, gave over rowing, first, as willing and devisor to be loole and parted from the enemy: and whilsts they were busie thereabout, the cable which the anchor drew with it caught among the oars of her own ship, and swept them clean away, and so left one side of it naked, where the ship being much weaken'd and encealed, was taken by the other that was sitten to, and tied fast unto her. Much after this manner was the battell fought at sea near Agyæus, Whereupon Antiochus was sore affrighted: for being thus dispoofled of the sea, he disfrusted himself that he should not be able to hold and defend the places farther off: and therefore commanded the garrision to retire from Lyfamachia, for fear it should be surpriz'd there by the Romans. But this was but a bad piece of counsell as the lequel and idle proved afterwards. For it had been an eafe matter not only to defend Lyfamachia against the first assault of the Romans, but also to hold out the siege all winter: yea, and by drawing out the time on length, to bring the very affailants themselves lying in leguer, to extream necessity and want of all things during which space they might have some occasion and opportunity, to find a mean and make way for peace. Neither did he only quit Lyfamachia and leave it for the enemies after this unfortunat battell, but also raised his siege before Colophon and dislodged ye, and retired himself to Samos, from whence he sent into Cappadocia: to despatch for aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces: and now was he upon no deign of his, but to give battell, and to hazard all upon the fortune of the field.

After this Navall victory, Regillus Amylius failed directly to Ephesus, where he embattel'd his ships in array even before the haven, and when by this bravado he had as well wrung again from the enemies a plain and evident confession that they had abandoned the sea unto him, he left for Chios, unto which he had intended to shape his course from Samos before the late battle upon the sea. There he repaired and called his ships which were broken and crack'd in the foretop fight, which done he sent L. Aemilius Scipio with thirty sail toward Hellas, to transport the army. And when he had rewarded the Rhodian ships with part of the pillage, and honoured them with the naval spoils, he gave them the revery, and sent them home. But the Rhodians, in full of the Scipio, and prevented his ships to let over the forces of the Con def, and after they had performed that service also, they returned to Rhodes.

The Roman Armada failed from Chio to Phoca, this city is fested far within the gulf of the sea, bound to it, as it lieth out in length. The wall contineth in compass the space of two miles and a half: and from both sides it groweth narrow still, and meeteth in the middle, resembling the form of a wedge or coin, which the inhabitants themselves call Lampert, in which place the city is a mile broad and a quarter with the vantage. From which canton or corner there is a bank of land and running a mile on end into the sea like a tongue, which divideth the haven just in the middle, marked out (as it were) by a certain line. Where it joyneth to the narrow straits is both two most sure harbors of both sides, and those two contrary ways. That which looketh toward the south, is called according as it is indeed, Nus fretor (namely, a Ship-rode, or harbor,) for it is able to receive a great number of ships: the other harbor is near unto the very Lampert aforesaid. When the Roman fleet was once possest of both these most sure and fast harbours the Praetor thought good before he set in hand either to raise the walls or to raise any fabrics and plant engines against the City, to send certain of purpose to found the minds and affections of the principal Citizens and the Magistrates within, but after he perceived they were obstinately bent, and would not come on, he began to lay battery against it in two several quarters. The one part was not much people, and had but few dwelling houses in it; and the Temples of their gods took a good place there; and these began to fight to approach with the ram and therewith to batter the walls, and make the turrets: and by that time that the multitude ran thicker in great numbers, and presented themselves ready to defend, the ram was pulling alive at the other part: So now the walls were laid along in both places: and upon the fall thereof whilst some of the Roman soldiers presently gave the alant in at the very breach, mounting and marching upon the ruins of the houses that were slain: others also did assay to gain the top of the upright walls with scaling ladders. But the towns men withfood to them, to fliify, and with such resolution, that it was well seen they repose more hope of defence in arms and valour, than in the strength of their walls. Whereupon the Praetor seeing in what danger his soldiers L indian and fearing to expose and disfigure them ere they were aware to the fury of these people to charge like desperate and mad persons, commanded toound the retreat. And notwithstanding the alant ceased and was given overtaken at first not the townsmen themselves to rest and repose, but ran from all parts every one, to raise countermarches, fill up the breaches, and repair the ruins of the wall were done. As they were wholly employed about this business, Q. Annius sent from the Praetor came toward them: who, after he had reproved and rebuked their wild obstinacy, and made remonstrance unto them, that the Romans had more care and regard than they themselves of the City that by continual assaults and batteries it should not utterly be destroyed: and how if they would be reconciled and forgo their outrageous folly, he would make them this offer: That they should yield under the same conditions and in those very terms, as aforesaid. They told the Praetor, when they came under his protection: At the hearing of that, they demanded and had five days space to consider of the matter; during which time they made means to receive some aid from Antiochus: but after their Embassadors whom they dispatched to the King had made relations, that there was no presents to be expected from him: then they set open their gates, having artillery and capitated be horned, that no outrage by way of hostility should be exercised and committed upon them, as the Romans entered into the city with banners displayed, the Praetor declared with a loud voice, That his will and pleasure was they should be spared, so much as they had yielded. Whereas the soldiers on all hands set up a great cry That it was an intolerable shame that the Romans, (who were never true and loyal confederates, but always dogged and malicious enemies) should go away to free and not fetch their own law At which word (as the Praetor had given them a signal of ram mack) they ran into all parts of the city to rifle and spoil. Confort at first laid them what he could, and rekindled them again saying: That it was not the manner of such cities rendered by composition but such as were forced and won by assault, and even those also were at the disposition of the General and not of the soldiers. But seeing that they, in their arrogant mood of revenge and covetous desire of goods, were of more power than the respective reverence of his person, his quality and commandment: he sent out belettes and trumpeters throughout the city, charging all persons of free condition whatsoever, to repair before him into the market place, to the end, that no villany and outrage might be done upon their bodies, and to the Praetor did he best to perform his word and promise in whatsoever lay in his power: for he refused unto them their city, and their own laws. And for that the winter approach, he made choice of the two harbours of Phoca to befowl his ships there for the winter time.

Near about that time the Consul having passed beyond the borders of the Adriatics and Maronit received news, that the Kings navy was defeated at Myonius: and Dyrrachia was discomfited of the garrison: and this latter ridding was more acceptable and pleasing unto him than the other of the naval victory; and especially, when they came thither where in very truth the City
A (plentiously stored with all sorts of viuitals, as if they had been provided of purpose against the coming of the army) received them unerringly; whereas they made no other account, but to endure extremity of want and painful travail in beholding thereat. Their men were few in number as it were in camp, until such time as their carriages and bulky portions of their train might reach unto them; such as they had left behind in all the forts and castles of Thrace, wasted with long journey and enfeebled with divers infirmities. When all were come and well refreshed and recovered, they put themselves again in their journey, and marching through Chersonesus, they came to Helespont, where finding all things in readiness for their transporting, (such was the indolent care and diligence of King Eumenes,) they passed over with little trouble and molestation into the practicable ways of their allies and friends, without any empeachment or any resource, notwithstanding some ships arrived in one place, and some in another. And this was the thing that much contented the Romans, and mightily encouraged them to see they had no need to pass into Asia, which they made full reckoning would have been a matter of great difficulty and trouble. At this they encouraged and made their abode a certain time near Hellespont, by a certain of those days which happened then to be wherein the Sabines danced with their dances called Asculapii, during which time they made triple of consecration to take any journey [until their vessels were re-arranged again in the temple of Mars.] By reason of which errors, by Segesta, withdrew himself apart in the army upon more (thick regard of consecration & religion) which troubled him nearer than other, because he was himself one of the Salii, and was the cause that the army (lay behind) and came not forward to overtake the camp.

C. And then there happept to come into camp from Astabry, one Herodes, a Byronian, the king in charge to treat as touching a peace: and good hope he conceived to obtain the same where he, resolution of the long abode and stay of the Romans in that one place: of whom he had looked for no other, but that as soon as they had set foot in Asia, they would have marched space (straightways) against the Kings camp, Howbeit this course he took, not to go directly unto the council before he had spoken and conferred with Segesta, (and indeed such direction and charge he had from the King himself,) in whom he had repose his greatest hope: for besides his magnanimity and noble courage, as also the tattiness of glory and honour, whereof already he had his full (great inducments unto the king that he would be easily wrought and made mall pliable to hearken after peace,) all the world knew well how lofty he had carried himself in his victories in Sparta, and afterwards in Affricke: and more than this, a son of his was captive in the laid Kings hands. But where, when, and by what chance he was taken prisoner, writers agree not no more than in many things else. Some say, that in the beginning of the war he was better and more rated round within the Kings ships, at what time as he failed from Chilone to the Ocean. Others write, that after the Roman army was passed over into Asia, he was sent out in epigall with a troop of Frigian horsemen to view and differ over the Kings camp: and when the Kings cavalry made out to charge upon them, he made haste to retire, and in that hurry his horse fell with him and [he and two other men of arms with him, was surprised taken and brought to the King. This other thing is for certain known, that it there had been sure and firm peace between the King and the Romans, nay, if it there had been familiar acquaintance and hospitality between him and the Segesta, this young Gentleman could not possibly have had more friendly entertainment, nor been more kindly interested, liberally used, and honorably regarded than he was, for those causes the Embassador attends the coming of Segesta: and to soon as he was arrived, presented himself unto the Council, requesting that he might deliver his message and be heard. Whereupon in a frequent assembly he had audience given him, and thus he spake: "Whereas (quoth he) there have been divers and sundry embassages parted to and fro as touching peace, and no good as yet done: I lay this for a ground and allure my self now to speed, because the former embassadors hitherto have effectually and obtained nothing: for in all these treaties and agreements the question was about Sicyonia, Lampsacus, Alexandria in Troas, and Lysimachia, which is in Europe. Of which Cities the King my Master hath already quit Lysimachia, to the end you should not fly that he hath any one City at all within Europe, and as for those other in Asia he is ready to attend them altogether: all the rest whatever, the Romans would recover out of the Kings hands and dominions in regard they had sometime tided & taken part with him. And for the charges which the Romans have debated about this war, the King will be willing to dispute and make good the one moiety unto them again: And thus much I spake concerning the articles and conditions of the peace. The rest of his speech behind, was followed in a gravizing and putting them in mind of the extensive revolution of this world and the affairs thereof: that as they should use their own good fortune and prosperity with measure and moderation, to they ought not to press down others in their adversity; but hold themselves contented within the bounds and limits of Europe, and that was a dominion sufficient in a man world think) and exceeding great: considering this, that it is an easier matter to win one thing after another by way of conquest, than to hold and keep them all together when they are won To consider, if the Romans were minded to dismember any part from Asia, so they would make an end on it, and limit out the same within certain preciapses without any further doubt and difference, the King for the love of peace and concord, would suffer the Romans in their immeasurable desire and appetite, to immount and outgo his temperance and moderation, but those matters which the Embassador supposed were of great importance and effectual to obtain obtain peace, the Romans made a pith at it, and lightly regarded: for they judged it but meet and H reason, that the King should discharge all the expences they had been at in this war, considering through his default it first arose: also that he ought to withdraw his garrisons not only out of

Romans) he promised him a mighty mafs of gold, yes, and to be made equal companion in the government of the whole kingdom (the Kings name and royall style only reserved) in case he

The Conhil having given order for the execution of all his plots and designs, dilferod from thence, and marched first to Dardanus, and after to Rhoeum: the inhabitants of both which Cities came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence he went forward to Hymn, and encamp'd in a plain under the very walls: then he entered into the town, and ascended up into the Caile, where he offered sacrifice unto Minerva, the patroness of that City. The Ilions entertained them with all fiew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the Romans were defended from them, and the Romans again were as joyous and glad to see the place of their first original and beginning. From thence they removed, and the six day after arrived at the head or spring of the river Caicus, Thither also Emumus the King (who at first affaid to bring his fleet back from Hellespontus, to winter before Ele- and afterwards, when he could not for certain dais double the point of Lles, by reason of the contrary winds, went a land) because he would not fail but be present at the beginning of these great affairs, made haste the next way with a small power to the camp of the Romans. From the camp he was sent back to Pegarnas, to give order for purveyance and provision of vioals, and after he had delivered out corn to those whom the Conhil had appointed to receive it, he returned again to the same leaguer, The Conhil his purpole and intent was to be provided aforehand of vioals sufficient for many dais, and together in one train to go against the enemy, before the winter surprized them.

Now the Kings camp lay about Thypad, where Antiochus hearing that P. Scipio was carried sick to Eleas, sent certain Embassadors of purpose to present and deliver his fon again unto him. At which present of his, he took not only great contentment in his spirit, as a father might do for receiving his dear son, but much easement also and comfort to his sick body. After he had satisfied himself at length with much embracing of his fon, ‘Ye shall (faith he) recommend me unto the King your Master, and tell him from me that I love him most heartily, and that I have no good thing at this time to send to him again but only this, That I advise him to make haste that he enter not into the field to give battle, before he hath heard for certain, that I my self am returned to the leaguer. Upon relation hereof, Antiochus albeit he was in camp seventy thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse and above (which puiffant power otherwise animadverted, and fed him with the hope of good issue of battle) yet moved with the authority of so great a perfo-nage as Scipio was in whom he reprost his whole reign against all doubtfull events of the fortune in war, he retired back, and passed over the river Eryphius, and pitched his camp about Manner fla near unto Syphilum. And fearing left (if he should be minded to make long stay and abide there)

A there the Romans would assay to force his defences, he call a trench, fix cubits in depth, and twelve in in breadth; and this trench he environed with a double bank and course of strong stakes and pales, and upon the inward circuit and enclosure he apposed a mane with main stakes, for the more ease emplacement of the enemy, when they should pass over the trench. The Conul apposing the King to be about Thyataira, marched continually, and upon the fifth day came down into the plains of Hircuma. And when he understood that the Romans were dislodged and departed hence, he followed him by the tracks, and on this side the river Planger, sent four times from the enemy, where about a thousand horsemen flewed themselves (for the most part) Galatians, some Dacians, with certain archers on horseback other nations intermingled among them who in great haste having passed over the river, charged upon the camp and guard of the called Galata.

B Romans. At the first they put the Roman to some trouble, finding them out of order and astir, but as the skirmish grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romans soon increased, (by reason their camp was so near to yield them for courses) they of the Kings side being wearied and not able to make their part good against so many of them, began to retire; and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by those that followed west the chaise, and killed outright. For two days after they fired but no hand, for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The third day after the Romans all at once passed over, and encamped about a mile from the enemies, but as they were pitching their tents, and busied about fortifications and enceases, three thousand chosen horsemen and foot together from the Kings Camp came upon them with a great trouble and affray. The number of them that were inguarded was a good deal; howbeit, of themselves alone, without calling to help and aid the fouldiers from their work about the fortification and defence of the camp, they not only yet at first received the charge with equal labour, but also after wards, as the fight entailed, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed some hundred of them, and taken prisoners almost as many. For the space of four days next ensuing, both armies stood embattled on either side before their Camp. And upon the fifth day the Romans advanced both into the middle of the plain. Atrochus came not forward with his enemies, inso much, as the hindmost were not an hundred foot off from the trench. The Conul receiving that he fell off and would no battle, called a council the next day, to be advised and resolved what he should do, in case Atrochus would not be fought withall. For considering that the winter approached the fouldiers were either to lie in the field under their tents, or else it they minded for the winter season to retire unto their garrison towns the war must be put off until the next summer. Now the Romans never made so small reckoning of any enemy as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole assembly they called upon the Conul with one voice to lead forth to battle out of hand, and take the fouldiers whilst they were in this heart ready. If the enemies would not come out into the field, to pass over ditch and rampier, and break into the camp amongst them; making account, that they were not to fight with so many thousands of enemies, but rather to make a slaughter and butchery of so many beasts, Whereupon Con.Dionisius was sent to discover the way, and to view the place where was best entering upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certain relation of all things, it was thought good the next morrow to approach near unto their camp; and on the third day the enemies were dispersed forth into the midst of the plain and they began to range the army in battalarray. Atrochus likewise hoppeth it was not expedient to lie off and stay any longer, for fear left in refusing still to fight, he should either abate the courage of his own men, or in the least the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces and advanced to force forward from his camp that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Roman army stood embattled in order of manner as well for men, as munition and armor; for of Romans there were two legions, and of Lateines allooSists as many, and every legion consisted of five thousand four hundred, The Romans put themselves in the main battall, and the Latines kept both the points. The Haftati were placed with their enemies for moli in the vanguard, Atthem the Pernipercip in the middle and the Trivies in the rearguard, Without this compass battall thus marshalled, the Conul let to the right point the auxiliary fouldiers or Eumeives, mingled together with the targetteers of the Achasian the number almost of three thouland, whom he rang out equally afront, and beyond them more outward he opposed about three thousand men of arms; whereof eight hundred were sent from Eumeves, the rest were the Cavailry of the Romans. Without all these in the outmoist place, he put the Trallians and Canditars, who in all made up the number of five hundred. As for the left wing, it seemed to need no such succours, by reason it was flanked with the river and high steep banks, howbeit in that side there were planted four troops of horsemen. Thus you see all the forces that the Romans had besides two thouland Thracians and Macedonians mingled and blended together, who followed as volunteers, and were left for the guard of the Camp and sixteenElephants, which they betwixt in the rearguard for the defence of the Trivies. For, over and besides that they were not like to hold out against the Kings Elephants, which were in number fifty and four, you must consider that those of Alfrieb, are not able to match them of Inda, say they were in number equall: either because in bigness the Indians exceed the other (as in tenth they are much greater by odds) or surpass them in courage and stomack. But the Kings army was composed of divers nations, different as well in arms as in fouldiers. He had of Macedonians fifteen thouland footmen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phalanx: these made the main battall, and in the front foot divided in ten squadrons, squadrons, parted and fevered one from the other by two Elephants placed between. More inward behind the forefront, the battall was dispalied in two and thirty ranks of footsoldiers. This was the strength of the Kings army, and as in other respects, so especially in regard of the Elephants furmounting aloft over the souldiers, represented to the eye a fearful and terrible sight. For besides that they were high and lofty of themselves, their crested headstalls, with plumes upon them, their turrets upon their backs, and in every turret four men standing in glittering armour besides the Maiter and governour himself, made the appearance and their force greater. On the right wing, he placed close unto the Phalangites, a thousand and five hundred horsemens of the Gallegrooe: unto whom he adjoynd three thousand lances in compleat armour, mounted upon bard horses; and those men of arms they themselves called Caraph rats. To these were added another wing of a thousand horsemens, which they named Agenas. Medes they were, elect and chosen men, together with more horsemens of the same region, mingled of many nations one with another. Close unto them in the rearguard was set a troop of sixteen Elephants. On which side also in a wing somewhat further drawn out stood the king his own cohort, bearing the name of Argyrapides, by occasion of the siluered shields which they bare. After them followed 1500 Da-ians, archers on horseback. Then, three thousand footmen lightly armed and composed partly of Cadians and partly of Trelëans, in number almost equal, and 2500 Mylianis attened upon the archers. And the utmost side and tail of that wing was guarded with four thousand Cyreni.

A with the strange and uncouth noise which they made, that suddenly as if they had been unbridled and without their gaits, they flung out every way, and ran at random; which violence of theirs the light armed fouldiers, the nimbleflingers, and swift running Candiots avoided easily with a trice. And the horfemen withall following the chafe, redoubled the fright and hurry amongst the horfes, yes, and the dromedary camels too; which likewise were unruly and let a maddening: and this hurriedly, the manifold cries from the multitude all about, helped well forward. Thus were the chariots chained in the middle of the plain between both armies: and when these vain bags were once rid out of the way, then the alarm and signa was given on both parts, and they charged one another in battell-wise. But as foolish an occurrence as that was, it called anon a discomfiture and overthrow indeed. For the auxiliaries and aids behind which were

B placed next unto them, terrified with the fear and affliction of the chariots, fled, and left all naked and dismiffed even to the hard horfes, in which sort that the rearward was in disarray, The Roman Cavalry entered upon the foal laden horfes, and charged them to holpily, that part of them was not able to endure the frift shock and encounter: some were put to flight, others were born down with the noise and weight of their harness and weapons. And presently thereupon the whole left wing of the battell began to retreat. And after that those losses were disbanded and in disarray which were between the Cavalry and the heavy armed men called Phalanx, the disorder and fear went on; as also to the midst of the main battell: wherefoon as the ranks and files were broken and shuffled together, by reason of the entrance of their own fellows among them, they had none at all of their long pikes, which the Macedonians call Sarisses. Then the Roman legions advanced their engines, and lanced their darts against those disordered ranks shuffled together. The very Elephants that were placed betwixt, nothing troubled and affrighted the Roman fouldiers, as who had been used in the African war, both to avoid the fudden rage of those beasts, and also either with their javelins to flank and hurt them overthrow, or else if they could come near unto them, to hew them and cut their hamstrings with their swords. By this time now was the front of the main battell detacted and beaten down: and the rearguard behind environed and cut in pieces: whereas the Romans withall, might perceive their own fellows flying from the other part, and hear the cry of those that were affrighted, even asmult as far as to their camp. For Antiochus keeping the right wing, seeing in the left point of the Romans no other defence (by reason that they troubled upon the river) but only four troops of horfemen, and those also by drawing themselves close to their fellows, to leave the bank-side void and naked, charged that point with his Auxiliaries and lances upon hard horfes, and not only made head and pressed them afore, but from the river also let a compas and enclosed them; and flanked that wing so long, until the horfemen were first discomfited, and then the footmen next unto them were put to flight, so as they ran amain toward their camp. M. Emilius a Colonell, and sonco M. Licinius, who a few years after was created the High-Priest, had the charge of the camp: he with his whole guard came forth, and where as he saw them flee, there he opposed himself, and first commanded them to stand, and afterwards to return to battell, checking and rebuilding them for their bashfully fear, and shambling running away. Moreover, he proceeded to mimatory words, saying, That in case they would not be ruled by his direction, they should run ahead like blind beetles upon their own mutchies: and in the end, he gave a sign to his own company, for to lay upon the forrord of them that thus fled, and caused the multitude that followed, with dint of sword and drawing blood of them, to turn their face again upon the enemies. Thus the greater fear overcame the less: for seeing danger before and behind, first they laid their flight, and afterwards returned to the battell. Emilius also with his own regiment (which for the guard of the camp had 5000 tall and valiant men in it) withflood the King right stoutly as he followed hot in chase upon those that fled. Moreover, Artabas (brother of King Eumenes) in the right point of the battell, who at the first charge had discomfited the left wing of the enemies, perceiving that his fellows fled in their left point, and hearing a great fear about the camp, came to the rescue in good time with 300 horsemen, Antiochus, when he saw them turn head again whose backs were toward him, and began to fight aileft, and perceived withall a number coming against him, both on the camp and also from the battell, turned his horf head and took himself to flight. By this means the Romans obtained the victory of both the wings, and pressed directly to the rifling of the camp over the dead bodies, which in the main battell most of all were massacred and lay by heaps: where the strength and flower of the hardiest men ranged close together and the weight besides of their heavy armor would not give them leisure to fly away. The horse men of Eumenes were the first of all the others that putd the enemies: after them, the reit of the Cavalry followed the chafe all over the fields: and even as they overtook any of the hindmost, killed them outright. But that

G which troubled and plagued them in their flight more than all besides, was their chariots, elephants and camels, intermingled among them as they fled; forasmuch as being once disband ed and put out of their ranks, they tumbled one upon another like blind men, and were bruised and crushed under the beasts feet which came running upon them. Great execution also there was committed in the camp, yes, and more in manner than had been in the battell; for the first that fled, and those that fought in the vanguard, took in way most of them to the camp, and upon aput confedence of this multitude, the garrison within fought more vaiently, and held out longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being thus laden in the gates and kept out of the rampart which they thought verily to have forced and won at their first assault, when they were once at length broken through and got in, made the more bloody slaughter amongst them, for very anger and delight that they had kept them forth so long. It is said, that there were slain that day about fifty thousand footmen and 4000 horsemen, 1400 taken prisoners, together with fifteen Elephants with their governors. A number of the Romans were hurt and wounded, but there died not in the field above 3000 footmen, and 24 horsemen: and of the regiment of King Enemenos not paid five and twenty. And for that day verily, the conquerors after they had ransacked only the tents and pavilions of their enemies, returned to their own camp with great plenty of pillage: but the next morrow they fell to looting the bodies of the dead and gathered their prisoners together. And upon this victory, there came Embassadors from Thynastrae and Magnesia unto Syilus, for to surrender and deliver up their cities.

Antiochus, who fled accompanied with some few, having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themselves unto him, arrived at Sardis about midnight with a small power of armed men; and hearing that his son Seleucus and some other of his friends were gone before to Apanaca, himself also at the fourth watch departed thence with his wife and daughter toward Apanaca; after he had committed the charge of guarding the City Sardis unto Zeux, and appointed Timon governour of Lydia. But the inhabitants of the said City and the garison fowlers within the castle, deipted their governours, and by general consent addressed Embassadors unto the Conuli.

Much about the same time also, there arrived Embassadors from Toul's, and Magnesia (which K flannedeth upon the river Meander) and likewise from Ephesus to yield up their Cities. For Polycemis (advised of the issue of this battle) had abandoned Ephesus and having failed with the fleet as far as Patara in Lydia, for fear of the Rhodian ships which rid in guard within the harbour of Magnesia disembarked and put himself a shore, and with a small company marched by land into Syria. The Cities of Asia were surrendered into the hands and protection of the Conuli, and submitted to the people of Rome. By this time now was the Conuli possessed of Sardis, and thither repaired unto him Scipio from Elasjo soon as ever he could endure the travail of journey.

At the same time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Conuli, who by the mediation of Scipio, made request and obtained thus much, That the King might send his Orators and Embassadors unto him. And after few daies Zenois (who had been governour of Lydia) together L with Antipater (Antiochus his nephew, or brothers son) arrived. Who first dealt with King Enemenes and communed with him, whom (by reason of old jars and quarrels) they supposed verily to be the greatest enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to hear thereof: but him they found more reasonable and inclining to peaceable terms, than either the King their Masters or themselves hoped and looked for. So by the means of Scipio and him together, they had access unto the Conuli; who at their earnest petition granted them a day of audience in a frequent assembly, there to declare their Composition and what they had in charge, "Then (quoth Zenis) we are not so much to speak and deliver outhe of our owne selves, as to ask and be advised of you (Romans) what courie to take, and by what means of satisfaction we might expiate and lattisfe the trepals of the King our Master, and withall obtain grace and pardon at your hands who are M the victors? Your manner alwayes hath been of a magnanimous and haughty spirit to forgive Kings and nations by you vanquished: How much more then is it decent and becomming you to do the like: yea, and with a greater mind and more generous and bountifull heart, in this victory and conquest, which hath made you LL of the whole world? For now it behoveth you to lay down all debate and quarrel with mortal men here upon earth, and rather like the immortal gods in heaven, to provide for the good and safety of mankind, and them to pardon and forgive. Now was it agreed upon before the coming of the Embassadors, what answer to make unto them; and likewise thought good it was that Africenus should deliver the fame, who spake by report in this wise: We Romans, of all those things which are in the power of the immortal gods, have that measure which they vouchsafed to give us: as for heart and courage which de- N pendeth upon our own will and mind, we have born (and ever will) the same without change and alteration in all fortunes: neither hath prosperity raised and lift it up aloft, nor adversity debarred and put it down. For proof whereof, I might produce your friend Ambelus witness, to testify nothing of others, but that I can report to you my own selves. For after we had passed over Hellespont, even before we law the Kings camp and army, when the hazard of war was in- O fered on even hand, and whiles we were equal one unto the other, and good upon terms of e- vantage the fame and no other we present unto you at this time, now that we are conquerors, forbear to meddle within Europe, depart wholly out of Asia, more as is on this side Tauris. Moreover, in regard of the expences defraided in this war, ye shall pay fifteen thousand Ta- N lents of silver according to the computation of Ephesos five hundred in hand, two thousand and five hundred at the assurance and making of the peace, by the Senate and people of Rome and a thousand talents yearly for twelve years next ensuing. Also ye shall make payment unto Enemenes of four hundred talents, and the remnant behind of the corn and grain which was due unto his father. And when we have contracted and concluded these covenants, to the end that we may rest satisfied that ye will perform the same, we demand for a gage and sufficient pawn at A "at ye deliver into our hands twenty hostages, such as we shall like well of and chuse. And for as much as we can never be persuaded that the people of Rome shall enjoy long peace there, where Amilus is, we demand above all things to have him in our custody. Also you shall deliver into our hands Tiber the Aetolian, the principal author and firebrand of that war with the Etruscan, who ruled you to take arms against us, upon promise that he gave you of your old and likewise armed them upon the truth they had in you. Item, together with him you shall deliver Maenius the Aetolian, the servant, together with Philo and Enobarbus the Chalcidians. The King shall now contract peace in worse estate than he was, by reason he makes it later then he might have done. But in case he hold still and delay, know he well thus much, that the royal majesty and part of Kings is with more difficulty stated & taken down from the high pitch and degree until the midst; then from that mean estate, walk down headlong to the lowest. Now these Embassadors were sent from the King with this charge, to accept of any articles of peace whatsoever. And therefore it was decreed that Embassadors should be directly sent to Rome. The Confal divided his army into garrisons for to winter, some in Magnesia upon the river Meander others in Travissis and Ephesus. After few daies the hollage above said, were brought to Ephesus from the King, and Embassadors also came who were to go to Rome. Ennomus like wise went to Rome at the same time that the Kings Embassadors: and there followed embassies moreover of all the States of Asia.

While's the sith of Asia pasled thus in these terms, there were two pro-consuls returned out of their severall provinces, both in manner at once, upon hope to obtain triumph, to wit, Q. Menenius out of Lycia and M. Aquillus out of Asia. When the exploits were heard, as well of the one as the other Minucius was flatly denied triumph, but Aquillus had it granted with great content of all men: who rode into the City triumphant over K. Amintus and the Etruscan. In which triumph there were carried before him 230 enlagns, 3000 pound weight of mallei silver in bullion; of coin in Attick Tetradrachms 113000 in Attick Drachms 24000. In place any vessels engraven and chaised, of great weight. He carried also in pomp the implements of the King, horse all of silver, with rich and sumptuous apppellare. All crowns of gold 45 presented unto him by Cities subiect & besides all sorts of rich spoil, and moreover he led divers noblemen prisoners, and left of all 36 captains, as well Etruscan as those that served under the King. As for Demetrius, a great commander of the Etruscans, who some few daies before had broken prison and escaped by night, he was by his keepers that made fresh fire after him, overtaken upon the bank of Tigris that before he could be attached by them, he fell upon his own sword, and ran himself through. Only there warned them that should have fed after his chariot; other wise the triumph and been magnificant and flatly, both for the pompous shew and also of the honor and renown of exploits achieved. But the joy of this triumph was blemished with heavy tidings out of Spain, of a lease and overthrow and the re-occupation of the Portugals in the country of Valcetanis, near the town Lycus, and the conduct of L. Aemilius: where 6100 of the Roman army were lost dead in the place, and the rest discomfited and beaten back into the camp; which they had much ado to defend and hold, and were forced to retire in manner of flight, and by long journeys recovered the peaceable quarters of their friends. And this was the news out of Spain.

From out of France the Embassadors of the Placentins and Cremonians, were brought by the Pretor L. Aemilius into the Senate: where they made much meat and complaint for default and want of inhabitants, whereas some were devourd by the edge of the tward in wars, others consumed by in lady and sickness, yes, and certain of them departed out of their colonies and wandered in the Gauls their near neighbours. Whereupon the Senate ordained C. Latius the Consul to enroll the thought to good, 600000 families, for to be distributed among these Colonies aforesaid. L. Aemilius the Pretor to create three Commissions called Triumvirs, for the conducing of the Colonies and inhabitants aforesaid. And created there were M. Acilius Severus, L. Valerius Flaccon the son of Publius, and L. Valerius Toppus the son of Caius.

Not long after, against the time of the Consuls election which approached near, C. Leitus the Consul returned out of France to Rome, and he not only by virtue of the act of the Senate made his absence, enrolled certain Colonies to supply the want in Placentins and Cremonians, but also proposed a bill, and according to it the L. of the Senate ordained, that two new Colonies should be conducted into the lands appertaining to the Boians. And the very same time were letters brought from L. Aemilius the Pretor, as touching the battell at sea fought near to Minucus: which letters also gave intelligence, that C. Scipio the Consul had transported his army into Asia. For the joy of the safe naval victory, there was ordained a solemn procession for one day, and in regard that the Roman army was then foot on foot in Africa, the said procession continued another day with supplication to the gods, that this voyage might turn to the prosperity and joy of the Commonwealth. And the Consul was enjoyned at such procession and supplication, to offer twice twenty head of greater beasts. After this ended the solemn assembly for the churing of Consuls, which was holden with great fire and devotion. For M. Aemilius Lepidus had to be Consul, as he was grown into an ill name, and hardly spoken of among the people, in that he had left his government and charge in Sicily for this occasion and business only, without making fault into the Senate and craving leave to do. Together with him were competitors in election, M. Fulvius Nobilior, Cn. Memmius Volfus, and M. Valerius Messala. But Fulvius was chosen alone, because he had left not sufficient voices of the Centuries, and he the morrow after nominated Cn.
Manlius for his colleague, and gave the repulse unto Lepidus; for M. Scaurus kept silence and held his tongue. Which done, the Prior were elected, namely, the two Quinti Fabii, the one named Laber, the other Pistor (who had been consecrated that year for the Flamin Quirinalis). M. Sempronius Sabinus, Sp. Pojliamius Albinus, Lucius Planinus Hypsaeus, and L. Babinius Divus.

During the time that M. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Volo were Consuls, Valerius Antonius wrote that there was a idle rumour raised at Rome, and held for certain, that L. Scipio the Consul, together with P. Aemilius, were called forth to a parley with King Antiochus, as touching the enlargement and delivery of young Scipio the son of Africanus, and by that means were both of them arraigned and taken prisoners: also that when their chief commandes were under arrest, the Kings army incessantly advanced against the Roman camp, the same was surprised and forced and the whole power of the Romans utterly defeated. By occasion whereof, it went I currant also, that the Etoilians began to look sly, refused to obey, and shook off their allegiance, also that their Princes and chief States were gone into Macedonia, Dardania, and Thrace, to levy and wage auxiliary forces: moreover, that A. Terentius Varro, and Marcus Claudius Lepidus were sent unto out of Eolos, from A. Cornelius the Proprietor, for to report these news at Rome. Last of all, to make up the tale, he addeth and saith that the Etoilians Embassadors among other things being examined in the Senat about this matter, and demanded of whom they heard and understood that the Roman Generals were taken prisoners in Asia by King Antiochus, and the whole army overthrown Fins answered directly, that they had advertisement thereof by their own Embassadors, who had been with the Consul. But because I find no other author besides him that makes mention of this rumor, I dare not for any thing that I can say of my self, report it for a certain truth, nor yet omit it as a meerable or loud lie.

The Etoilians Embassadors were permitted to come into the Senate house; and being induced in regard of their own cause and present condition, to confess a truth, and as humble fapplicants to crave pardon and forgiveness either for their fault, or misprision and error, began with a bedroll of their favours and good turnes done unto the peoples of Rome, yea and in manner to upbraid the Romans with the valour which they shewed in the war against Philip. But with their arrogance and in olent language they offended the ears of the Senators: and by ripping up old matters done and past (time out of mind and utterly forgotten) they piled their own cause to, and brought it to this pass, that the LL. of the Senat began to call to mind much more harm and mischief contrived and practised by that nation, then kindnesses and civilities received at their hands: insomuch as the Etoilians having need of their mercy, incurred their heavy displeasure, and provoked them to anger and hatred. Being asked this question by one of the Senators whether they would rather and submit themselves to the censure and judgment of the people of Rome? and likewise of another, If they could be content to hold them for their friends or enemies whom the Romans do accounted; they answered not a word: and thereupon immediately were commanded out of the Court and presently all the Senat began to cry out with one voice, that the Etoilians were all still for Kings Antiochus, depending wholly only upon that hope, and therefore they ought to war against them as undoubted enemies, and to take down and tame the proud and feironious hearts of their own. Over and besides all this, another thing there was that incited and kindled the flames of the LL. against them, because at the very same instant when they seemed to require peace at the Romans hands, they warred against Dolopia and Athamania. So there passed a decree of the Senat, (and the same was moved by M. Aelius, who had varisched and induced Antiochus and the Etoilians) that they shall void that very day out of the City of Rome; and within fifteen days next ensuing out of all Italy. As Terentius Varro was sent to enforce them on the way: and this warning they took with them, that if ever after there came any Embassadors from the Etoilians, with the warrant, licence, and permission of the chief Generals who governed the province or not accompany with a Roman Legate, they should be repelled all of them for no better than enemies. In this matter were the Etoilians disinclined & sent away.

After this the Consuls proceeded unto the Senate, as touching the government of the provinces. And thought good it was that they themselves should cast lots to be Etoilians & Sp. Eton. Uno him whole it should be to govern Asia, was appointed that army which L. Scipio bad. And for to furnish it fully up and make up the drosed bands, he was allowed to have four thousand foot men of Romans who were six hundred and two hundred of others that were Latinis, eight thousand foot and four thousand men of armes, and with these forces he was to make war against Antiochus. The other Consul had assigned unto him the army which was Etoilia: and liberty he had for supply of that broken army to levy the same number of Citizens and allies that his command in government had enclosed. To the same Consul was granted a commission likewise to set in order, furnish, and take with him those ships which the former year were prepared and rigged, and not only to make war with the Etoilians, but also to sail over into the Ille Cephalonia. And withal, the said Consul had been in charge to return home to Rome for the election of Magistrates, if he might so do conveniently with the good of the Common-wealth. For besides the small Magistrates (who were to be chosen one under another) it was agreed upon, that Censors also should be created. But in case his affairs detained him, that he might not return in person, then he was to give advertisement, and signify so much to the Senat, that he could not possibly be present at the time of the aforesaid election. So Etoilia fell by lot to M. Fulvius and Aetius Cn. Manlius. Then the Prior took their provinces. Sp. Postumius Albinius had the jurisdiction over Citizens.

A citizens and foreigners both: M. Sempronius Tudscanus governed Sicily: and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinal Plamin, Sardinia: Q. Fabius Leo was admiral of the navy at sea: and L. Plautius Hypsias was allotted to the rule of high Spain, and L. Babinius Drusus of the lower. For Sicily one legion was appointed, together with that fleet which was already in that province. Allo there was order that the new Pretors should impose two tenths of corn upon the Sicilians, and send the one into Italy, and the other into Eolia. The like imposition was laid and exacted upon the Sardines; and the laid corn to be conveyed into the same armies that the Sicilian corn was. A supply was granted unto L. Fabius for Spain of a thousand Roman footmen and fifty horse besides besides six thousand Latin foot, and two hundred horsemen. Unio Plautius Hypsias for the higher Spain were allowed a thousand Roman footmen: with two thousand Latin allies, and two hundred horse. Besides these supplements, both the provinces of Spain were allowed each of them one Pretor. The Magistrates and governors of the former year continued full in place of command for one other year, to wit, C. Lutius with his army, and P. L. Lutius also the Propretor in Etruria with those forces which were in the province M. Thecorici wife in the Brittan country and Apulia.

But before the Pretors went into their provinces, there happened a variance between P. Licinius, the Arch-Pontifex, or chief Preist, and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinal Plamin, like unto that which sometime fell out between L. Metellus and Posidimus Albinus. For at what time as Ptolemy the Conful was upon his departure and journey to his fleet in Sicily, together with C. Licinius his colleague, Metellus the Archbishop for the time being, kept him back upon occasion of certain sacrifices to be celebrated: tembly, when as Fabius the Pretor would have gone into Sardina, P. Licinius the high Priest detained him. Much little and hard hold there was hereabout, as well in the Senate house, as before the people. Inhibitions palled to and fro. Cautions and pledges were disdained: since they imposed one upon another head; the Tribunes were called unto on both sides for to interpole their authority, and they appealed both unto the people. In fine, religion, and the regard of holy rites took place, and caried it clear: and the Plamin was enjoined to obey the chief priest; and by order and expexte commandment from the people, all fines were taken off and forgiven. And when the Pretor for very anger and spire that he was debarred from his province, would have surrendered and resigned up his government, the LL. of the Senate impeached and terriffied him by their absolute authority, and ordered that he shoul minister justice, and exercise civil jurisdiction between aliens. After that the mutters were ended within few days (for many lounders were not to be levied and enrolled) both Confuls and Pretors took their journey into the provinces. After this, there arose a bruit concerning the occurrants and affairs in Africa, blown and spread abroad I wot not how, nor from what author it proceedeth: but after few days there came certain messengers with letters from the Generals of the Roman army, bent of purpose to the City, which caufed not to great joy presenti enuating upon the enic lexis aforelaid (for why, they were no more afraid of Africa by them already conquered) as daigned quite the same and opinion that went on Antonius, whom in the beginning of this war they appoposed would have been a dangerus enemy unto them, as well in regard of his own excellency, as for that he had the direction and conduct of Ambient in the war: bothe, they thought good to alter nothing, either as touching the tending of the Conful into Africa, or diminishing his forces, for fear they should have war with the French.

Not long after M. Aurelius Corvinus, a lieutenant of Scipio, came to Rome with the Embassadors of King Antiochus, and likewise King Ennemos and the Rhadians. Corvin reported and declared first in the Senate, and afterwards in a full assembly of the people (by order and commandment from the LL. of the Council) what affairs had palled in Spain. Whereupon ordained it was, that there should be holden a solemn procession for 3 days together: and order was given, that a head of greater cattle should be killed for sacrifice. This done, the Senat assembled for to give audience to King Ennemos; first above all other matters: who briefly in few words having rendred thanks to the LL. of the Senat, for that they had delivered him and his brother from fiege, and protected his realm against the wrongs and outrages offered by Antiochus: also having testified his joy by way of gratulation for their prosperous and fortunate affairs achieved both by land and sea: namely, in that they had disemboced and put to flight K. Antiochus, & driven him out of his camp, that he could not keep the field; and withal deferred and dispasnded him sight of Europe and afterwards of all that part of Africa which lieth on this side the mountain Taurus: he concluded and knit up with this, That as touching his own demerits and employments about their affairs, he had rather they took knowledge by their own generals, captains and lieutenants, than from his mouth. They all approved well of this speech of his, and willed him to speak boldly without bafhe modelly in that case. What he thought in equity and reason the Senat and people of Rome was to yeeld unto him by way of justly remonstrate: alluring him that the Senat would do it more willingly and liberally (if possibly they could) according to the worth of his deserts, of the Roman Senat (to he might have the means and liberty to ask their advice) to this end that he would not be thought, either to exceed measure in covetous desire, or pasce the bounds of modelly in craving a remonstrate. But now considering they are themselves to give that reward, much more reason it is that their magnificence and bounty to him & his brethren should be re.

"S"tired to their own arbitrement and discretion, The J.L. of the Senate were nothing moved at this language of his, but urged him still to speak himself in his own cause. And after a certain time that they had tried a -vie, the J.L. in courteis and kindness, the King in modesty and thesamefilings, yielding one unto the other reciprocally, in such amiable and mutual manner as hardly can be expressed, Eumenes, departed out of the temple. The Senate perished nevertheless in their resolution saying, it was very abrid and undecert that the King should be ignorant upon what hopes he was come, and what he purposed to make suit and petition for: and himself mult needs of all others know best what was meetest and most expedient for his own Kingdom: yes, and was far better acquainted with the citate and affairs of Asia then the Senate was. And therefore no remedy, but he must be call'd again, and compelled to declare and deliver what his will, desire and mind was to have. Hereupon the King was brought back into the temple by the Preators, and urged to speak. I

Then at last, my L.L. (q.d.be) I would have perished still in silence, but that I knew that anony ye or will call the embassage of the Rhodians in place, and that after audience given unto them, I must not either will nor choose but make some speech of necessity & verily with so much more difficulty shall I speak, because their demands will be such, as if they would seem not only to require nothing prejudicial and hurtful unto me, but all (which more is matters little or nothing pertinent to themselves. For plead they will and maintain the cause of the Cities in Greece, saying, they ought be free and at liberty: which being once obtained, who can make doubt but rather they will withdraw from our obedience, not only the Cities which shall be freed, but also those which have been homsgers and tributaries unto us of old time? yes, and will keep them as subjects in very deed and wholly at their devotion, whom being thus bond and obliged K to them by to great a benefit, they call by the name of Allies, and would make the whole world be heave they repuse them for no other: Yet forsooth (I wrought well): in affecting and sparing to this to great power & puissance, they will carry it to cleanly & make semblant, as though this in no wise touched and concerned them: but it is befitting you alone, corresponding & answerable to other former deputies of yours. But he ye well advised, and let not their gloating words deceive you: ye take heed, I say that ye go not with an uneven hand nor hear your felves equally, while you depresse and abate too much some of your allies, in promoting and advancing others beyond all measures; and above all beware that they who have lift up their spears and born wars against you, be not more kindly intreated & in better condition, than your loving friends and faithful confederats. For mine own part, in all other things I would gladly be thought of every man, rather to keep within my compasse; yes, and yeild somewhat of my right whatsoever it is, then to strive too much in the maintenance and holding thereof: but in the question of your friendship, my affection towards you, and to the honour which shall come from you. I cannot endure with patience that any one should out-go and tum-turn my left. This I account the greatest inheritance left unto me by my father the Trit, (of all those that inhabit in Greece and Asia) who was entertained in your amity and continued in the same always most felt, most constant and faire ever to his dying day: who only theewed bound affection and loyal heart unto you, but also was in person employed in all your wars which ye made against me, as well as land as sea: affilict ed and aided you with all kind of provisions, in such sort, as none of all your allies besides was any where comparable or came near to him. And finally, as he earnestly exhorted the Romans to accept of your society, he sunk down, swooned in the very assembly & not long after yielded up his spirit and dyed. His footsteps have I trod, and followed his good example. For affection verily and fludious desire to honour you, I could not have more then he had (for I suppose it was impossible to uperlap him therein:) but in kind pleasures, effectual services, offices, courtesies, and favours, to firmament and go beyond him; the goodness of fortune, the occasion of times, King Antiochus and the war of Asia, have minified ample and sufficient matter unto me, Antiochus King of Asia and part of Europe gave me his daughter in marriage, and with her endowed me with the repoffition of those Cities which had revoked from us. He fed me moreover with great hopes of encreasimg my dominion in time to come, if I would have sided with him against you. I will glory and vaunt of this, that I have done nothing to offend and displeace you: I will rather redace those pleasures and services which are becomming the ancient amity and friendship between our house and you. In forces as well for land as sea, I have friended and helped your Generals in such wise, as I forbid all your allies besides to do the like: ex跟我 them I have with victus on the land, with provisions at sea. In all the battels and conflicts by ships (which were many and in landy places) I was present in person. I undertook all travels, I ad ventured all perils, and no where favoured my self and thought much of my pains: nay, that which is the greatest calamity and misery that followeth wars, I was besiegued, and endured it: enclosed I was and shut up within Pergamus, to the utter hazard of my life and of my realm and royal dignity. And after I was delivered from that danger and the siege raised, albeit Antiochus on one side and Seleucus on another, lay encamped about the principal forreile of my Kingdom, I quit mine own affairs and laid all aside to come with my whole fleet into Hellespont, & there to meet with L. Scipio your Conial, and to aid him in transporting and waiting his army into Asia. And when your forces were passed over, I never afterwards departed from him: there was not a Roman soldier more reliant ordinarily in your camp then my self and my brethren.No expeditions no rode, no exploit of horie service was there without me. In battle have I stood on foot & guarded that quarter which the Cofabath appointed me to keep. I will not lay my L.L. what loyalty, and shewed his prowess in your behalf against Philip, and the Carthaginians in Africa, tell ye, that of your allies, (and put them all together) there is not one more worthy then my self to have and hold that which you have won by conquest. But an honourable deed it is and magnificent, to let free and deliver Cities out of this prince and servitude. True and I say last of the same opinion, provided always, that they had attempted nought by way of hostility against you. But in case they had taken part and sided with Antiochus, ho he love so much to endeth it with wisdom, say, with equal and reason, to be restored of your allies who have so well defered on your hands, then to regard your enemies. This Oration of the King much pleased the LL of the Senate, and loom it was seen by their countenance that they would deal bounteous and liberally with him, yea, and gratifie him in what they might. Then audience was given to a brief embassay of the Smyrnes, by whose reason that forms of the Rhodians were absent, came between and delivered their meadage: Highly were they Smyrnes commended, in that they chose rather to ensure all extremities then to yield themselves unto King Antiochus. Then the Rhodians entered in place, and the chief men of their embassay, after he had declared the first occasion and beginning of the anger which they had with the people of Rome, and declared with all the good delights and assurances which the Rhodians had performed in the war against Philip and then against Antiochus, went on and passe with followeth. Right honourable, there is nothing more difficult and troublesome unto us but the business that we have in hand, then this one thing, that there is some variance and matter divided between us and Emmeret, the only K. of all others, with whom especially every one of us in privy, and that which toucheth us more, an City in publick, doth enthrall the bond of friendship and mutual hospitality. Howbeit no reproach, nor any that so farre as their affections (say LL.) but even the course of this world and nature it fitted the mightiest thing of all) which didst us, and caught us of all: this may we (being men once born) to defend and maintain the freedom of all of others: this is it, that moveth K. K. to be defireous to all have in liberty and subjection under them and at their command. But howver it is, our modelly and the reverent regard we have of the King performeth us more, then either the debate of our cause with him is otherwise difficult unto us, or the deciding thereof like to be intricate and troublesome unto us. For in case it were so, the LL could not honour and reward a King, your allie and friend for his good service done in this war (for recompence whereof you have in consideration) by no other means, unlese you deliver free Cities into his hands, to serve in bondage; then were it hard for you to resolve; for fear lest either ye should send away a prince (your friend and confederat) without guerdon and honour; or seem to change that laudable enterprise of yourselves which you have begun, to flain and blench your glory now (which you have acquired by the war against Philip) with reducing to many Cities and states into servitude. But your happy fortune saeth you right well of this difficulty and necessity, that you need not fear either to empower your credit and favour with your friends, or to endanger your reputation and honour among men. For (the gods be thanked therefore) you have achiev'd a victory, no lesser then glorious, and sufficient (If I may so say) to discharge all your debs, and let you clear with all the world. For Lycania, Phrygia both the great and the lefe, the whole Pisidia, Ciliceto, and in brief all the confines of Europe are under your dominion. Of all which provinces, if you lay one by another (which you will ye selves) for K. Emmenes, you find mightily enlarge and amplitie his Kingdom: but, give him Ill, you will make him equal to the most powerful princes and monarchs that are. You see then by this, that you may recompense and en-rish your allies out of the conquest gotten by war, and nevertheless hold out your good example that you have begun, remembering always what title you pretended first in your war with Philip, and now lately with Antiochus; disordering withal, what you did then. After Philip was vanquished, & what is required and expected at your hands now: not so much because you have used it already.

...and thus it may be that many causes have led to this event, such as the sudden change in the political situation, the rise of new powers, and the general desire for peace and stability. The Senate was then called in consultation to decide on the best course of action.

After long debates and consultations, the Senate decided to accept the peace terms offered by Antiochus. The peace was signed on the thirtieth day of the previous month, and the terms were as follows:

1. The Romans recognized Antiochus as king of Asia and Syria.
2. The Romans acknowledged the independence of the Greeks.
3. The Romans paid a large indemnity to Antiochus.
4. The Romans agreed to the restoration of the temples of Athens and Alexandria.
5. The Romans agreed to the repatriation of Greek slaves.

Antiochus was pleased with the terms and agreed to sign the peace treaty. The treaty was ratified by both parties, and the peace was declared to be for all time.

The Senate then announced the news of the peace to the people, who were overjoyed at the news. The peace treaty was seen as a victory for the Romans, and the Senate was hailed as the victor.

In conclusion, the peace treaty with Antiochus was a significant event in Roman history, as it marked the end of a long and costly war. The treaty was seen as a major victory for Rome, and it set the stage for future Roman expansion and influence in the region. The Senate was praised for its wisdom and foresight in accepting the treaty terms.
A client cutum of their ancestors, to hear, decide, and compose all their affairs of Asia. But the final conclusion of all should be this, That whatsoever pertained to the dominion of Antiocbus on this side the mountain Tauros, should be assigned to King Eumenes, excepting the countries of Lydia and Caria, so far as the river Maeander, all which must lie to the signory of the Rhodians. As to the other Cities of Asia, which had been tributaries to Attalus, those also were to pay tribute to Eumenes: but such as were sometimes homagers to Antiocbus, those should be unencumbered and remain free. The ten commissioners whom they appointed were those, to wit, Q. Minucius Rufus, L. Furia Purpureo, Q. Minucius Thermus, App. Claudius Nero, Cn. Cornelius Merulla, M. Iunius Brutus, L. Antistius Balbus, L. Aemilius Paullus, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Tubero. These men had plenary power and full commission to take order and determine as they thought good, in all the occurrences that were presented in their haunts. But they had direction from the Senate as to the principal points:

Imprimis. That all Arabia and Phrygia, both the more and the less, that Myrina, with the Kings' chains and forests, that the Cities of Lydia and Ionia, except those that were free at the day of the battle fought with Antiocbus, and expressly by Magnesia near Sipylos, together with Caria, which is called Hydrela, and all the territory of Hydrela lying toward Phrygia, moreover Telmessus and the forts of the Tellmessians, receiving only that territory which belonged to Ptolemaeus the Tellmessian, that all these countries, I say, and Cities above written, should be given and granted to King Eumenes.

Items. That the Rhodian should be enfeoffed in Lydia, without the foresaid Telmessus the forts and territory, appertaining sometime to Ptolemaeus Telmessus: which parcels, I say, were reserved as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians.

Item. To the Rhodians was granted that part of Caria, which lieth beyond the river Maeander, near to the isle Rhodes, together with the towns, villages, fortes, and lands bounding upon Phrygia: except those towns which were free the day before the battle with King Antiocbus in Asia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senate for their graces, were in hand with them for the City Soli in Cilicia: they alleged, that they like wise as themselves, were descended from Pegas: by occasion of which confederation and near alliance, they loved together as brethren by nature: in regard whereof, they made petition that over and besides other donations, they would do them this extraordinary favour, to except that City also from the servitude and subjection of Antiocbus.

Then were the Embassadors of King Antiocbus called for, and treated with all about this matter, but to no effect.

For Antipater, being violently upon this point, pleased hard, that the accord was past already, and might not be revoked or altered: and that against the tenour of the articles and covenants therein comprised, it was not the City Soli, but Cilicia that the Rhodians demanded; and never would they rest till they were gotten over the mountain Taurus. Then were the Rhodians called back again into the Senate, unto whom the L. of the Senate, after they had made resolution how earnest the Kings Embassador was with them upon the point, added thus much moreover and laid, That if the Rhodians deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honour of their City and State, the Senate would work all possible means to exalt the Kings Embassadors to reseat, how high and obtinate forever they stood. For this courteous, the Rhodians thanked them much more heartily than for all the rest before, and said withal, that they would yield and give place to the arrogant spirit of Antiocbus; rather then seem to give any cause or occasion of troubling the peace. And so, by astonishing the City Soli, there was no alteration made.

White these matters were thus debated and passed, the Embassadors of the Mæsullians brought intelligence, that L. Babelius the Pretor, being in his journey towards his province of Spain, was seized and enclosed by the Ligurians, and many of his men killed outright in the place, that himself mortally wounded fled without his hastors and serjeants into Mæsulia, and within three days left this life. The Senate upon the advertisement ordained P. Iunius Brutus the Pro-pretor in Hetruria to go in person into the farther Spain, and govern the same as his own province: but first to leave Hetruria and the army there to one of the Lieutenants whom he pleased to make chief of this. This decease of the Senate, together with letters from Spanis Phorminius the Pretor of the City was sent into Hetruria: and fo P. Iunius departed as Pro-pretor into Spain. In which province L. Iunius Paulus (who afterwards won a right glorious victory of King Perseus) having the former year fought unfortunately, now a little before the arrival of his succour, gave battle to the Lucullians with an army rallied and assembled in half in which the enemies were put to the work and driven to fly. One thousand eight hundred of them well armed were left dead in the field, 3300 taken prisoners, and their camp forced and ransacked. The fruits that went of this victory let all matters in Spain in greater quietness.

The same year upon the third day before the Calends of January, L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Aemilius Servianus, and L. Valerius Tappe, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senate, planted a Latin Colony at Boldea: and three thousand people were thither sent to dwell. Every gentleman by calling that served on horseback had 70 acres of ground let out to him, and the rest of the colonists fifty. The land divided thus among them had been conquered from the Boiotians in Gaul: and those Gauls first had dispossessed the Thracians of the same.

This year there were many men of mark and name that were to be Centors: and this composition as it had not been of sufficient importance it fell to move matter of debate, was the occasion of a contention and variance much greater. The competitors were these, T. Quinctius Flamininus, P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneus; L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Porcius Cato, M. Claudius Marcellus.

Maccelles, and M. Atilius Glabrio, even he who had vanquished Antiochus and the Ετολιανος at Θερμοπύλη. To this man last referred the peoples favour and affection most enclined, by reason of many congiaries and largesses which he had given amongst them in publick, by means whereof many a man was obliged and bound unto him. The rest, being so many and nobly descended with all, took it to the heart, and could not endure that such a person as he newly risen and come up, and a gentleman of the first head, should be preferred before them; whereupon P. Sempronius Gracchus, and C. Sempronius Euchi us, two Tribunes of the commonalty, conndered against him at once, lying to his charge that there remaineth a surplusage of the Kings money and other largesses gotten in the camp of Antiochus, over and above all that he either carried and showed in triumph, or brought in accompny to the City chamber. Many, and sudden depo- sitions there were to prove this inditement, as well of lieutenants as of colonnels. But, M. Cato above all other witnesses was most noted: whose great authority acquired in the whole course of his life (which he had passed hitherto in all upright conversation and constant gravity,) was much emparied and discredited now, with his white robbethat bare on his back. He being produced as a witness, deposeth and gave evidence, that he had been certain plate as well gold as silver, among the rest of the largesses found in the Kings camp, which he never could let eye on in all the triumph above said. In the end, Glabrio because he would bring some displeasure particularly, and most of all upon Cato, said, he would give over his suit for the Censorship, since that there was another competitor as newly come up as himself, (whereat the Nobles indeed took indignation inwardly, although they said against him, even with incredible and ineffable perjury. Well, a fine was let upon his head of a thousand sicles. And twelve K was the matter traversed, whether the multip should be taken off or paid. But when the third day was come, and the party in trouble (Atilius) had quite interceded to sue for the dignity, the people would not give their voices as touching the payment of the fine aforesaid, and the Tribunes also themselves let fall their action. So T. Quintins Flaminius, and T. Claudius Maccellus were created Censors.

About the same time the Senate sent within the City in the temple of Apollo, in regard of L. Escamius Regillus, who had vanquished the Admiral of King Antiochus in batell at (as) where he had audience, and when he had declared what exploits he had done, namely, against how puissant Aranados of the enemies he had fought, and how many ships of theirs he had either sunk or taken; the L. of the Councell withone generall consent and accord, granted unto him a navall triumph. And he triumphed upon the Calends of February. In which triumph there were born in shew fifty crownes sive one, of beaten gold; but nothing that flower of coin as such a royall triumph required only there were carried in pomp 33700 Attick tetradrachms, 33250 cortphors. After this (by decree of the Senate) there were proceedions celebrated in consideration that L. Escamius Paulus had brought his affairs in Spain to an happy issue.

Not long after L. Scipio came also into the City, who because he would not be inferior to his brother in the honourable addition of his name, called himself to be innamed Africani. He discoursed before the Senate, and in the publick audience of the people, as touching his worthy acts. Divers there were who confirmed the thing thus and said, That the war was greater in name then difficult unto him in the managing: for with fighting one only memorable batell the matter was achieved and ended, but the glory indeed of that victory was begun unto him and prepared for his hand at Thermopylae. But, if a man should judg hereof, wise, and according to truth, the batell of Thermopylae may rather be accounted an exploit against the Ετολιανος then King Antiochus. For what great forces I pray you had Antiochus there in the field of his own? But in the last batell litten in Asia, the whole power and puissance that he had in all Asia, could not be conceived, and all the sids and factours which he could levy out of the nations as was to the utmost parts of the Efp. Great cause therefore they had both to render much praise and thanksgiving to the immortal gods, in as ample manner as possibly they could devise (for vouchsafing unto them to brake a victory as it was, and the fame with such eale and expedition) and also to grant a triumph to the General. He triumphed upon the last of February, even in the very day that made the leap year. This triumph of his was much greater then that other other of his brothers in regard of the magnificent pomp and shew represented to the eye: but if one call to mind the subsance of the things themselves, and compare the dangers, the conflicts and difficulties of the one war with the other; there is no more equality between them, then if a man should in comparision of captain with captain, set Antiochus to match with Amibal. He shewed in triumph two hundred thirty four field ensigns and standards: he carried before him the portraits of two hundred thirty four towns and Cities: a hundred thirty four teeth of ivory: two hundred thirty four crowns of gold: 337200 pounds weight of silver: 334000 Attick tetradrachms: 33100 cortphors: 33000 Philip-preces of gold: of silver plate, and that was all graven and chased: a thousand four hundred twenty four pound weight: of golden plate as much as weighed 1204 pound. Moreover there were led before his chariot 32 great commanders; either governors of provinces under the King, or attendant in his court. Every foilder serving on foot, had given unto him 25 deniers every centurion had double to much, and the gentlemen or knights triple. After the triumph done, the fouldiers had their pay double in monye, yea, and the portion of corn like wise was doubled. He had moreover given them already a double proportion in Asia, preferably upon the end of the battell. A year it was almost after his Consulship expired ere he triumphed, And
And much about one and the same time, both Q. Marius and the Consul entered into Asia and Q. Fabius Labeo the Pretor repaired to the fleet. Moreover the Consul had worked enough; and wanted not matter of war within France. The seas were quiet after that Antiochus was defeated and subdued: Fabius therefore studied which way to take, and how to employ himself and his forces at sea, because he would not be thought and reputed idle in his province: so he resolved at length to put over with his fleet into Crete. Now they of Cydon were roused at that time against the Cretans and the Cnossians: and the voice went that there was a great number of Romans and Italians, captives, living in slavery and bandage in every quarter of that land. He looked therefore from Ephesus and set sail for Candia; and so soon as he was arrived and set anchor, he sent his messengers about to the Cities, willing them to abandon their armor and retire from war, and to search and seek throughout all the Cities and territories those captives and prisoners at sea, to bring them to him: and moreover, to send their Embassadors or agents, with whom he would treat concerning the affairs that in common touched as well the Cretians as the Romans. The Cretians made small regard of these messengers; and unless it were the Cretians, there was not one that delivered the captives. Valerius Antias, that recorded, That out of the whole land there were rendered to the number of four thousand; because the inhabitants were frightened with threats of war. And that this was the cause why Fabius, although he performed no other exploits, obtained of the Senate a naval triumph. From Crete, Fabius returned to Ephesus; from whence he sent forth three ships to the coast of Thrace, and commanded that the garrisons of Antiochus should quit Armis and Marona, to the end, that those Citieslikewise might be set free and enriched.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the eight and thirtieth Book.

Marcus Fulvius the Consul besieged the Ambracians in Epirus, and received them upon composition to mercy. He subdued Cephallenia, vanquished & brought under his subjection the Aitolians and made peace with them. The Consul Cn. Manlius his colleague, overcame the Gallo-Celtic, the Thracians, the Thessalians, and the Trocmians, who were passed over into Asia under the conduct of Demeus: the only people that within the mountain Taurus yields not obedience to the Romans. The first beginning and rising is set down: also the time when at their seiz'd first of those places which they hold. Here is recounted also the example of the rare valour and chastity of a woman, who being the wife of a certain King of the Gallo-Celtic, chose to be taken prisoner: and when a Consul was forced and abus'd her body, she kill'd herself with her own hand. The Cenfors held a session of the City: in which by computation were numbered 25,838 souls of Roman citizens.

Amis was contrived with Ariarathes King of Cappadocia. Cn. Manlius triumphed over the Gallo-Celtic, notwithstanding the contradiction of these ten Commissioners, by whose advice and assistance he had assisted and engross'd the accord of alliances with Antiochus, and pleaded his own cause himself in the Senate against them. Scipio Africanus was invested at some city, by Quintus Petilius Ataecus, a Tribune of the Commons: at others, by Naevius, for that he had defended the City Chamber of some part of the Village which he got from Antiochus. When the day was come that he should make his answer, he was called up to the public pulpit and place of audience, and with a loud voice paid unto the people: My masters you that are Citizens of Rome, this very day have I won Carthage: and with that he ascended up into the Capitol, and the people accompanied him thereto: and from thence because he would avoid these hard and innumerable coast of the Tribunes, and be no more tormenting them, he retired himself to Liternum, as it were into voluntary exile: and whether he ended his days there, or at Rome, it is not well known: for his tomb and monument was to be seen in both places. L. Scipio Africanus (the brother of Africanus) was accused of the same crime of embezzling the public treasure and robbing the common-wealth, and thereof condemned: but as he was led to prison, he had been laid up in bonds and iron, Titus Sempronius Gracchus Tribune of the Commons, who before-time had been an adversary and enemy unto the Scipios, interposed himself and saved him: and for that pleasure done, he took to wife the daughter of Africanus. When the Pretor sent the treasurers of the City, so far off, they were from finding any remnant or token of the King riches and money, that they could not meet with as much as would satisfy the fire wherein he was condemned. And when his kinfolk and friends had contributed and raised an infinite mass of money for him, he would not receive the same: and as much only was redeemed and bought again, as might serve for his necessities to find and maintain him.

During
During the time of the wars in Asia, the affairs also in Aetolia were in small rest and quietness; which troubles arose first from the Athenians, who, after that Aminander was dispossessed of his kingdom, were held in obedience by garrisons under the captains of King Philip, and they bare themselves to proud, insolent, and outrageous in their government, that the Athenians found a great mischief of Aminander, and were desirous of him again. Now remained he at that time as a banished person in Aetolia; and upon letters received from his own nation (conceiving the late wherein Aetolians then stood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again, whereupon he sent the messengers back to Argos (the chief City of Aetolia) unto the principal men of the country, with this credence, That if he might be assured of the affection and love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Aetolians and come into Aetolia, accompanied with the elect personages (and those are the council of that nation) and Nicander the Pretor, When he understood and perceived that they were prel and ready to do him all service, he advertised them oftentimes upon what day he would enter with his army into Aetolia. At the first there were but four personages that espoused against the Macedonian garrison and these took every one of them more unto them for to be assiduous in the execution of their complot. But afterwards troubling but little in this small number of their adversaries and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep counsel and conceal a matter secretly, then to perform any action valiantly) they adjourned unto them the like number unto the other: so as now they were two and fifty in all, and they divided them elves into four companies. One crew of them went to Hercules, another to Terephylis, where the Kings treasure was usually kept, a third took their way to Thesprotia, and the fourth to Argos. But they all agreed upon this course, to hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converse in the market place of those Cities, as if they were come about some particular negociation of their own: and upon a certain day appointed to let to it at once, and to raise the whole multitude for to expel the Macedonian garrisons out of their fortresses. Now when the day was come, and Aminander ready upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Aetolians, the garrisons of the Macedonians were at one instant chased out of those same Cities aforesaid, like as it was completed before hand; and letters were dispatched from all parts into other Cities, advising them to deliver and free themselves from the tyranny of Philip, and restore Aminander into his lawfull kingdom and throne of his father. That the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter; only the town Thessim made resistance and held out some few days against the siege, by occasion that Zeno (captain of the garrison there) had intercepted the letters, and that they fled with Philip were put to flight of the castle. But in the end they rendered it was likewise unto Aminander, and all Aetolia reduced unto his obedience excepting only the fort of Kastrus, which Philip upon the marches of Macedonia. Philip advertised of the revolt of Aetolians, accompanied with a power of six thousand fighting men, put himself in his journey, and with exceeding expedition, marched as far as Gomphi, where he left the greater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure to long a journey) and with two thousand came to Aetolians, the only place held by his garrison to his use. And from thence, after he had founded the next neighbours, and soon found that there was nothing but hostility among them, he retired to Gomphi, and joined with all his forces together returned into Aetolians. Then he sent Zeno before with a thousand footmen, and gave him in charge to seize upon Ethiopia, a place that directly for his purpose commanded Argos, and seeing that his men were put in possession thereof, himself set him down, and pitched his tents about a certain temple dedicated to the name of Jupiter. There he was forced by reason of the foul and stormy weather to stay one whole day, and the morrow after he went forward with his army to Argos. As they marched, behold they discovered the Athenians, running from divers parts to the hill tops, which foid over the way along. They had no sooner espied them, but the foremost ensigns made stay, and all that regiment of the vanguard was surprised with fear and fright. Every man began for his part to cast many doubts, and think with himself what should become of them, in case their companies were entred once into the valley, so checked by those rocks above-said. This tumult and trouble caused the King perforce to call back those in the vanguard, and to retire the same way that he came, notwithstanding he was very desirous (if they would have continued him) to have made quick speed, and gotten through those frights. The Athenians at first followed after them shoot quietly enough: but when they had once joined with the Aetolians, leaving them behind to come upon the tail of the enemy, they spread themselves all about and flanked them on the sides: some of them also got store of their head by the next waies which they were acquainted with, and beset the passageways innumerable, as the Macedonians were to greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fled in distress, than marched in good order) to leave much of their armor, and many of their men behind, to pass over the river; and there the chase ended. From thence the Macedonians returned hastily to Gomphi, and to forth into Macedonia.

The Athenians and the Aetolians assembled from all parts to Ethiopia for to surprize and defeat Zeno and that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedonians reposing no great trust in that place, retired from Ethiopia, to an hill much higher and steeper.
the eight and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A steaper on all sides, and therefore lesse acceptable. The Athenians having found out diverse palisages unto it, enforced them to forgo that boldall. And when they were dispers'd among the blind rocks, and unto them unknown, and could not readily find the way out, some of them were taken prisoners & other slain. Many for fear tum'd down headlong from the pitch of the cliffs, and brake their necks, and very few escaped with Zeno to the King. The next day after they obtained truce, until they had committed their dead to earth.

Aminoder having thus repoll'd his renial, sent Embassadors to Rome unto the Senate: likewise unto the Seipges in Asia (who after the great battell with Antiochus, tojourneied to Ephebos.) He craves peace and pardon, he excuses himself in that he had recover'd his fathers Kingdome by the means and help of the Atheniots, and withall laid great fault and blame upon King Philip.

B As for the Eoliots, they departed out of Athamania, and made an expedition against the Ambochians, and by content of the greater part (reduced the whole nation under their purulence and subjection. Having thus regained Ambochles (or in times past it appointed to their regnoiny) upon the same they pass'd over in Aperanassa which yealded also for a great part thereof, and came under their obedience. As for the Dolopians, they never belonged to the Eoliots, but unto Philip. And at the first they assembled together in arms, but understanding once that the Ambochians took part with the Atheniots, that Philip was fled out of Athamania, and that his garrison was put to the sword, they revolted likewise from Philip, and turned to the Atheniots. Who months now full account that they were fare enough on all sides from the Macedonians, by reason of the many nations which environed them about, they took knowledge (by the common broit) of the death of Antiochus by the Romans in Asia, and not long after their own Embassadors returned to Rome without hope of peace relating withall that Ennius did the Conful had pass'd the seas already with army. Upon these nears, they were much troubled and afraid: and in this perplexity, they proceeded and occasion'd the Rhodian and then the Atheniots Embassadors, to the end that by the credit and command of these two States, their prefiers lastly rejected, might have more ease access to the Senate: and with them they went to Rome once again the principal personages of their nation, to try their last hope of obtaining peace; and never forcast to prevent war, before the enemy was come wellether within their sight. Now had M. Ennius transported his forces to Aetolia, and deviled with the princes and states of the Epirots, where to begin war.

The Epirots advis'd him to sall Ambracia, which as then was united to the Atheniots. And

Why if either the Eoliots should come to the defence of the place, they 'had a goodly large and open plain all at once to bid them battalion; or if they related the field, and would not fight, they should find no great difficulty to attack and force the town. For not only there was a had five more of timber and other matter to raise mounts, mantelets, and other fabricks, but Arbracia a river navigable, very commodious to transport all necessaries unto them, runneth under the walls of the City; and besides, the summer was a fit season for war-service. With these reasons he persuad'd the Conful to conduct his army through Epirot. But when the Conful was come before Ambracia, he found it was no easy piece of work to beleaguer and assault the town. This Ambracia is shut under the lofty and craggie hill, which the inhabitants call Periboea. The City it selfeth looketh outon the Welt whatsoever way as the wall reacheth toward the fields and river. The fort and castle thereof stand upon the hill, and regardeth the Epirots. The river Arbracia running out of Acrarama, dischargeth itself into an arm of the sea, which beareth the name of the City near adjoining, and is called Ambracia. This town, besides that it is well guarded with the river of one side, and defended with walls on the other, is fortified also with a strong wall, in circuit from what more than three miles about. Ennius encamp'd strongly on the fields side, in two hiles of a good distance stand'st, and raised one fencce upon an high ground, opposed against the farts of the town. At all these places he determined to enclose within the compass of a trench and rampier, to the end that they were shut up within the town, might have no egress, and that from without there should be no ingress, for any kind and measure whatsoever the Eoliots were assembled already at Sestos by aid of a Strengthen from the Pictors Nisardors. On the occasion of the Conful marching between our army and the Epirots, he had his fleet of ships far toward the city, in order to convey their march to intercept them that they might not retire again into Italy.

The siege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to march from thence withall their forces. But afterwards, when they perceived that a greater part of the City was irregularly beleaguered already, and blocked with trench and rampier, and would not the Epirots were encamp'd on a plain on the other side of the river, they were of advice to divide their forces in two parts. Empolomus with a regiment of a thousand men highly appointed, pass'd through the fortifications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together, and entered Ambracia. Nisardors was the rest of the forces pursu'd at the first by night to afflail the camp of the Epirots, considering that the Romans could not easily treat them, by reason of the river running between both. But afterwords, upon better advice, to wait怎样 to be a dangerous enterprise (for fear lest the Romans should discover their march and intercept them that they might not retire again into Italy) battlements of the walls. The oppidans at the first were afraid to keep their strange engines, and the watch to hear to terrible noise of their walls battered: but, however, seeing that the walls stood upright beyond their expectation, they packed up their hearts again, and with twipes weighted either great counterpoises and weights of lead, or huge stones, there with a strong that let them fall ag in upon the hands of the enemies, or else tumbled mighty big legs of timber, and to either break them spieces, or bare them down. And as for their books, store of them, they caught hold of them with iron hooks like anchors, and so drew them under the walls to the other side with a winches and brake both them & their poles. Moreover, they talked out in the night upon the watch that attended their engines, like forth of themselves in the day time, as to the corps de guard, and put them great fear. As things stood in these terms before Ambroacia, the Etolians by this time were returned to Stratus from their roads which they made into Arcadia. And then Nicodemus the Prætor conceiving some hope to levy the siege by some audacious and hardy adventure devised that one Nicodemus should put himself within the town of Ambroacia with five hundred Etolians; and appointed one certain night, and an hour also of the same night, when both they from out of the town should assail the barricades and engines of the enemy planted against Pyrrhaun, and also himself charge upon the camp of the Romans at the same time, and put them in flight: supposing by this two-fold attack (especially in one night which was to every thing more terribil) there might be some notable act and memorable exploit done. And Nicodemus verily for his part in the dead time of the night, having passed unseen and not detected by some of the entellis, and by relous force broken through the tell of the watches, passed over an arm of the river and recovered the City, and in some measure by this means hearted the besieged inhabitants to a sudden K anything, and put them in better hope to accomplish their end. When the night appointed was come, all on a sudden bet upon the engines, as it was before accorded between them. The adventure of this enterprise was much more then the efficis, because there were no forces without to join with him: were it that the Prætor of the Etolians was afraid to be to bold on that he thought it was a better piece of service to aid the Ambriacians now recovered, whom Periplus King Philip his son, sent from his father to reconquer Dolopia and Amphiochea, afflicted with great force and violence. The Romans had planted their guard and artillery, as is above said in the places against Pyrrhaun, which the Etolians charged all at one time, but now with like preparation of means, not with the same violence. For some came with burning and flaming firebrands, they carried tow and harts with pitch, and ladders of dry licks, and other like matter to be to kindle, in such fort as all their companies shone again with a light fire. Many of the warders that killed at the first onset, but when the air and tumult was heard within the camp, and the signal given by the Coniu, they took arms, and ran space out of all the gates for to relieve and defend them. In one quarter the Etolians did their deed, and fought with fire and sword; but in the other two places after they had given the attempt, rather that began any shirmish, they retired and went their ways. The heat of the fight inclined wholly to one quarter, where the two captains Eupiandr and Nicodemus encouraged their men as they fought from two divers parts, and entertained them with an allure hope, this Nicodemus according to agreement would be there and charge upon the back of the enemies. This for a good while maintained the courages of the soldiers; but perceiving there was no sign appeared of their countrymen, and that they kept not touch with them, and seeing what was the number of the enemies encircled, and themselves disappoined and defilure, they flaked their fight, and were not to offer upon the enemy, and in the end gave over and being much ado to retire in safety, were called into the City, after they had burnt some of the Roman engines, and flamed a few more of their enemies then there died of them. And purely if the service had been followed in execution according as it was complitated and agreed, those devloed engines no doubt might have been destroyed, if not wholly, yet in one part at least, and that with great murder and slaughter of the enemies. The Ambriacians, together with those Etolians which were within the City, not only gave over that nights enterprise, but ever after Hewed more coldness to and with them themselves again, as if they had been betrayed by their own fellows. Not a man would fall forth upon the ward and watch of the enemies, but they all from their walls and turrets went upon their guard only, and with the vantage of the place defended themselves in safety.

For the first advertised that the Etolians approached Amphiochea, quit the siege of the City which he was about to assault: and after he had only harried and wasted the territory about, retired from the quarters and returned into Macedony. The Etolians likewise were enforced to depart from thence, by reason that their sea-coasts were spoiled and overran: for Plenius the King of the Illyrians, was entered into this river of Corinth with a fleet of 80 ships, and with the fleet of the Etrurians that lay in the red of Parus it ravelled the maritime tract of Eetilia, against whom were left a thousand Etolians, who waited upon the fleet at every turn as they doubled any reaches, and with the vantage of the short waits and next pales by the land, were ready to welcome them on the banks and make head against them.

The Romans lying still in siege before Ambroacia, by beating and shaking the walls in many places, had dismantled a great part of the City, and laid it open: however, they could not enter within. For at every breach where the wall was broken down, they were ready to make a new countermove, and the soldiers standing upon the very ruins, livered in head of a bulwark. The Cordialleaving he could not prevail by open force, determined to undermine and make a secret way way in the ground into the City; but first he covered the place where they wrought with mantlets. For a good while the pious were not perceived by the enemies, notwithstanding they wrought both night and day, not only digging under the earth, but also calling up the mould as they went. But an huge heap of earth being up aloft from the rest, was discovered, and gave them within the town to understand, what the enemies were about: and fearing lest they had wrought so far already as under their walls, and that they were at the point to make a way into the town, they within began likewise to strike another trench just against the place covered with mantlets aforesaid: and when they had digged to that depth as the bottom might be of the enemies mine, they made no words within, but in great silence laid their ear too in divers places close to the earth, harkening thereto, they might hear any noise of the pious: and when they once had got

B an ear within, they countermined directly against them, and long they were not about it: for anon they came as far as to the void hollow ground, whereas the foundation of the wall stood upon stumps and props, which the enemies had set to hold up it. Now when their works were met together, and that there was a continued passage out of this trench into the Mine, the pious sent for to and fro, with their spades, shovels, and mattocks, and other tools that they had laboured to work with: but soon after, armed with self same swords and pikes, and clothed within the walls, and closely skirmished under ground. But within a while that manner of dealing grew more cold and slack by reason that they stepped upon the Mine between when they lift, one while with facks and haircloath, other whiles with doors and such trash as they could come by in haste and good next hand: One new invention above the rest was devised to dispose within the Mine, and the same but a flight manner, and made without any great trouble, and this it was, The townspeople took a great tun or dryfist with a hole bored in the bottom, of that capacity, as might receive a pretty punch like a fascis within it; and withall they made a pipe indeed of iron to fit it, and an iron lid likewise to cover the other end or mouth thereof: but the same had many holes in divers places thereof. Now this vessel they filled in of sand and salt water, and then let it with the head forward against the very Mine. From the lid or cover aforesaid there flood ranging out long sharp pikes, which the Macedonians call Saris for to keep off the enemies. Within the fountainers they put a cole or spark of fire, and then with a pair of mittens, that they blew the cole and let it on a smothering fire within the fountainers. By which means there were not only a mighty deal of smoke, but also it carried with it a flaming fire by the reason of the fakers burning within; and so filled all the Mine underneath, that fierce death any man abide within for fear of being choked.

During these affairs about Ambracia, Pharnaces and Demetras, two Embassadors sent from the Aetolians by a general decree of the whole nation, came with a full and plenary commission unto the Conul. For their Prator (seeing of the one side Ambracia besieged, and on the other side the sea coast endamed with the enemies ships, and in a third quarter the Amphiliacans and all Delphes) piteously waited by the Macedonians; and that the Aetolians were not able to oppose themselves, and make head at once against three wars in divers places, had assembled a general Diicr to communicate with the chief of the Aetolians what was to be done in this case. All their opinions jumped in this one point, To see for peace (if it were possible,) under equal and indifferent conditions: if not, yet in as tolerable terms as they might. In confidence and assurance (say they,) of Aetolians, the war begins: and now that Aetolians is vanquished both by land and sea, yet, and hunted as it were out of the compass of the world into an angle beyond Tartar: what hope remaineth to maintain and wage the war any longer? and therefore Pharnaces and Demetras were to deal as in such a case and time, as they thought best according to their wild and fickle, and the common good of the Aetolians for what other counsel remaineth, what course can they take, or that course beside hath fortune left them? With this so large an and free commission Ilay were these Embassadors sent: who besought the Conul to spare their City, to have mercy and pity of their nation some time linked in misery unto them, and forced through very calamity and misery (for loath they were to speak of any injuries and wrongs offered) to fall into such follies, either have the Aetolians in this late war of Antiochus deferred to suffer more in a manner than they were worthy to receive good for their service in the former war against Philip: and when they were not largely rewarded and compensated then, to they ought not to be punished and chastised extremely now. The Conul made answer again, That the Aetolians had made a thing for peace many a time, but loathly and truly at no time: and since they had followed and drawn Antiochus to war let them hardly follow his example in craving peace. Like as he therefore hath not quit and rendred some few Cities which were in question about their liberty and freedom but parted with a rich and wealthy kingdom, even all Asia, between this and the mountain Tartar to whilst the Aetolians will simply lay all arms aside and come to treat for peace unarmed he would never give them audience. And to be short, if they will peace have, they must deliver up their armour and all their horses first, yea, and make payment of a hundred talents of silver, and the one moiety thereof to pay down right upon the nail before hand. Over besides this branch, I will annex unto the accord and covenant, That they shall hold for their friends and enemies those whom the people of Rome reputed to be their & none other. To this answer the Embassadors laid never a word; both for that they were very hard and grievous impositions, and also because they knew the natures and minds of their countrymen and neighbours at home, how untractable they were and not to be removed, if once took a pitch: whereupon they returned unto them, without doing anything at all to know the advice once a H gain of the Prae; and the principal States, what to rely upon in every respect, while all stood whole and upright. But they were welcomed with ourcries, and well thent for their labour, in that they had not dispaited and made an end, and so were sent away, and commanded to bring back with them one peace or other. As they went again toward Ambracia, they were forelayed and surprized in an ambush laid for them near the high way side by the Acmatian, (with whom at that time they varred) and were had to Tyrreum and there imprisoned. And by this occasion the peace was delayed.

While the Embassadors of Athens and Rhodes, who were come already to interest for them, remained with the Consul, Ammianus also (the King of the Athamans) presented himself under safe conduct in the Roman camp, and took more care for the City of Ambracia (where he had sojourned the greater part of his exile) than in the behalf of the Etoilians. By them, the Consul, was certified of the hard hap of the Etoian Embassadors; and then he gave commandment that they should be brought from Tyrreum. When they were come, they began to treat of peace, Ammianus in the mean while laboured what he could in that enterprise which he especially had undertaken, namely, to induce the Ambracians to submit unto the Romans; but when he saw he did but small good, for all his parting with the principal persons of the City from their walls at length by the Consul, his permission, he entered into the town, where, partly by good counsel, and partly by prayer and entreaty, he persuaded them in the end, to put themselves into the Romans hands. Now as touching the Etoilians, they found much favour by the means of C. Valerius the son of that Levius, who first contracted amity with that nation; and was besides half brother unto the Consul, by the same mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Etoilians who came to aid them might go forth without harm, set open their gates. Then att it was with the Etoilians: Insomnis. To pay 500 Euboic talents of silver: two hundred presently, and the other 500 to be paid in the same manner yearly by even portions. Item, To send all Roman captives and fugitives to Athens and runagatesthat they had, into the hands of the Romans. Item, To challenge juridiction over no City, which since the time that T. Quintus passed over into Greece, was either forced by the Romans or entered voluntarily into amity and society with them: provided always, that the Isle Cephalenia be not comprised within this capitulation. These articles, albeit they were somewhat easier than they looked for, yet the Etoilians requested, that they might acquire their Council withall; and permitted they were so to do. Some small variance and debate distracted and held them while astonishing those Cities, which having been in times past within their seignior and jurisdiction, they hardly could abide to be dismembered (as it were) from their body. But in the end there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Consul a present of a crown of beaten gold, weighing 150 pound. Their statues of brass and marble their painted tables (wherewith Ambracia was better gloried and adorned, than all the other Cities of that region, because it was the royal seat of King Pyrrhus, where he kept his court and residence) were all taken down and carried away: nought else was touched nor any hurt done besides.

The Consul dislodged then, and removed from Ambracia into the higher and more inland parts of Aetolia, and encamped before the City called Aroan Amphicothum. Two and twenty miles distant from Ambracia; and thither at length repaired the Etoian Embassadors unto him, who marvelled much at them why they said so long. When he understood by them that the general council of the Etoians had approved of peace, he willed them to go directly to Rome unto the Senators; and permitted also the Athenians and Rhodians (their mediators and advocates) to go with them and as orators to speak in their behalf; and moreover he granted that his half brother C. Valerius should accompany them; which order when he had taken, himself crossed over the water to Cephallenia.

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the ears and hearts of the chief Senators wholly possessed beforehand with many complaints and imputations that Philip had entombed against them: for he by means of his Embassadors and letters (complaining that the Etoians had unjustly taken from him the Dolopians, the Amphicothians, and Aetolians: and that his garrisons, yea, and half of all his ion Perus, were driven out of Amphicothum) had wholly avowed the Senators from giving any ear at all to their requests and prayershowing the Rhodians and Athenians had audience given them with patience and silence. "The Athenian Embassador Leo (by report) moved and persuaded the Senators with his eloquent tongue: and by a familiar parable and similitude, he compared the people of Aetol to the nature of the seas: For like as it is, being of itself calm and troubled and made rough by the winds: even so (faith he) the people of that nation, all the while they entertained friendship with the Romans, and performed their faithfull promise unto them, so long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet: but after that those and Dicaeocamus began to blow from out of Aegaeas after this Montafia and Democritus as multitudinous and piercing from the parts of Europe, then arose a storm and tempest, so that the gulls whereof they were to Antiochus and call (as a man would say) upon to. Well the Etoians after they had been much toiled a long time from post to pillar, in fine effectcd that the articles of peace remaining were freely agreed upon. Insomnis. The nation of Etoa shall maintain faithfully and truly the Empire and Seigniory of the people of Rome. Item. They shall suffer to pass through their country and confines no army that shall be conducted against their allies and friend: nor affit them with any aid or maintenance whatsoever. Item. They shall repulse the ene-
A mies of the Romans for their enemies, and wage war against them. Item, They shall deliver unto the Romans and their confederates, all runagates, all fugitives, and prisoners that are among them, excepting such as have been once taken and returned home, chanced to be caught again the second time: or those, who being Roman enemies, were taken prisoners by them, at what time as the Etrusci served in garrison under the Romans. As for the rest, as many as are forth-coming and may be found, shall be delivered (without fraud or iown) within two days next ensuing, to the Magistrates of Cosa. * But those that appear nor within that time, shall be likewise renderd whenever their fortune is to be merited. Item, They shall yield forty hostages, such as the Roman Confill in his discretion will approve and like well of: provided, that none of these pledges be under twelve years of age, nor above forty. Neither shall these be taken for hostages any Preator or Captain over them, nor publike Notary or Secretary to the State, nor yet any one that hath lain in hostages before time. Provided also, that Capitulations shall be exempt from the articles of this accord. * Item. As touching the sum of money which they are to pay, and the manner and terms of the payment, there shall be nothing changed of that which hath been concluded with the Confill: yet, if they had rather pay the same sum in gold and silver, they may do so; provided only, that they keep the rate and proportion of one golden piece to wit, that one golden piece of coin go for ten times as much in weight of silver, and no more. Item, What Cities what lands and territories, what persons forever which having at any time heretofore held tenor of the Etrusci, were by the Confills * Quintinius and Ca. Dominicius, or any time since their Confillship, either furnished and conquered by force of arms, or otherwise the possession came under the obedience of the people of Rome, the Etrusci shall make no claim nor challenge unto them. Finally, the Enemies with their City and territory, shall appertain to the Romans. Not only in the same manner, but also much about those very places wherein these affairs were managed by M. Fulvius in Etruria. Con. Mentius the other Confill maintained war * Gallicanica. Whereat I am present I will begin to write. This Confill in the beginning of the spring came to Ephesus; whereafter he had received the army of L. Sestius and taken a review and having thereof, he made an Oration to his soldierys: wherein, first they praiued their valour and virtue in that with one battell they had finished the war against Antiochus: then he exhorted them to enter this new war with the Gauls who had murdered King Antiochus with affid: and were beside of nature for woe, that unless their pacification was abated and their courage taken down, to little or no purpose it was that Antiochus was removed beyond the mountain of Tauris. Last of all, for the same purpose he made of his own person, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither false distrusts nor excessive report. The soldierys gave audience to the Confill with great joy and pleasant applause, making this answer, that since King Antiochus was vanquished, the Gauls whole (who were one part of his forces) would be no pacification to withstand them. But the Confill replied that it was much out of his way, that Eumenes should be absent (for then he was at Pergamus) who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whom it impressed and confirmed very much, that the power of the Gauls should be eneeled and abated. And thereore be sent for Attalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enter into anecon with him and take arms. And when Attalus had made promise to aid him both in his person and with all the power that he could make the sent him into his country to levy soldierys. After some few days, when the Confill was departed from Ephesus, Attalus (accompanied with a regiment of a thousand foot and two hundred horse) met them in Magnesia; and had given order to his brother Attalus, to follow after, with the rest of the forces: having committed the guard and government of Pergamus and the kingdom to those, whom he knew to be fait and faithfull to his brother and himself. The Confill, after he had praised and commended the young gentleman marched forward with his whole power as far as * Messana, and there encaumped, because it was not possible to pass the river at any forord, and therefore boats and barges were to be got together for to ferry and transport the army. When they were set over the river, they went to Hiera Colos, where there was a magnificent and Rarely Temple of Apollo, and an Oracle in it. And by report the Priests and Prophets there delivered the responses and answers of the Oracle in verses and table not riedy composed without skimm and meter. From hence they removed and in two days arrived at the river Harpfls. But they were embarded by some from the Albardians, requiring the Con, either by virtue of his authority or by force of arms to compel one of their refrefers who lately had revolted from them and rebelled, to return again to their former obedience. And his brother Attalus also, brother to Eumenes and Attalus, was come together with Lucius the Conditor, and Carus the Maccus, bringing with them 1,000 foot and 300 horse, of divers nations mingled together. The Confill sent one of his martial Tribunes or Colonels with a mean company to summon the Cale of the forces also; clad and after it was formed and recovered, he delivered it into the hands of the Albardians, himself kept on his direct way, and turned no side until he came unto Antiochus upon the river Messana where he encamped. This river Messana is divided from Cela * where the first head and source thereof is to be seen. Now this Cela has been in times past the capital city of all Phrygia. But in process of time this old Cela was abandoned by the Inhabitants, and not far from it they built a new City called Apamea, bearing the name of Apamea the father of Seleucus. The river Messana being no more from the forefadd sources of Maeder, dischargeth it self therein. And as the common fame goeth at H this place it was, where Marsh, as the Munician gave descent to Apollo, and challenged him to play upon the flute. This Maeder abovesaid, illing one of an high hill at Calvi, runneth through the midit of the City and first keeping his course along the country of the Catians, and afterwards of the Ionians, jalleth at the last into an arm of the sea between Irenae and Meliteus.

While the CoF lay encamped about Antiochus Seleucus the son of Antiochus prevented himself unto him with corns to his army, according to the covenant contracted with Scopra, some small variance and difference there was about the aid d manned of Antiochus Seleucus pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman lieudors. But this debate was soon at an end by reason of the stiff resolution of the CoF. who sent a Colonel to warn and charge the lieudors to accept no corn before the aid-llieudors of Antiochus were received. From I then he marched to Garden-echoes a City he called &c. to ward the third day to Ta, This City is seated upon the frontiers of the Phoenicians, n that coast which boundeth upon the Pamphylia. This quarter was able to yield little men for war when it had not been any way ensembled, but remained entire and whole. For proof whereof then also there slued out of the City a conc it of horsemen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the first onet troubled them not a little. But afterwa. seeking themselves neither for number, nor yet for proofs compurgable upon them, they were driven back into the town & saved pardon for their treipais, ready to surrender their City into the CoF, his hands. The CoF, imposed upon them a payment of 25 talents of silver, and 1000 medimns of wheat, and upon that, compurgation their remainder was accepted. Three days after the Romans came to Chon the river & from thence to the City Erize, which at the first assault they won. After this the army of the City, as far as to a City named Thasus standing over the river Indus, to called of a certain Indian, whom an Elephant threw and cast into it. Now they were not far from Cyrra, yet no embassy appeared from the tyrant of that country and State. Messengers a dillayal and treacherous man in all his dealings: besides ex-00 hard and unreasonable, Whereupon the CoF, sent out before C. H. 4o month, with 4000 foot and 50 horse, to find his disposition and mind. As these companies entred into his frontiers there encountered them his embassadors, gifting them to understand that the tyrant their Master was ready to do whatsoever they would command: only his request was unto H. L. 50 to pass peaceably through his country, and to refrain his lieudors from warring & spoiling the territories & 25 talents they brought with them to make a war on of gold. Helopius promised to give his lands for being polis and waited but he willied the embassadors to go to the CoF. Now when they had related the same unto him he made them answer in these terms: We cannot gather by any sign (qd he) that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to Romans: & again if he be in an one as the world taketh him for, we are to think rather of his humiliation than of admitting him into our amity. The embassadors took trouble at this word requested him for that prevent no more, but to take the town of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himself might have access into his presence to par. with him and his amity. The morrow after, by permission of the CoF, came the tyrant into the camp bearing no port or a Prince. For a prince put he and main man of small wealth would have gone in better apparel and carried a greater train about him than he neither went he to meanly but ipakes lowly, ha king and kewng his words, as if he had not been able to speak them out. He complained of his own bances and want & likewise of the poverty of the cities under his feigning; for besides Cyrra he held in possession Syllium & that which is called Almyr; Yet he promised to see what he could do if he by undoing himself & spoiling his subjects might make up fifteen and twenty talents. Many he mistreated greatly that he should never effect much. Are you therefrom? (qd the CoF,) Now verily I can no longer endure this mockery. Was it not enough that in your absents you bathed not to delude and disappoint us by your Embassadors but you must perfet fill in the same impudence now that you be here yourself in person? And would you make us believe indeed that the discharging of 25 talents will beggar you and your whole kingdom? Come on it thyly: Bring me with thee within these three days, and lay me down in ready money 300 talents, or look for no other favour, but your territory to be walled, and your City beleaguer. Greatly affrighted was he at these minatory words, howbeit he continued still obstinately, counterfeiting & pretending his necessities and poverty, and after much base huckling and rigging by little and little, one while hating and wrangling another while praying and entreaty, (and that with whining and putting finger in the eye,) he was fetched over at length, and came off to pay 100 talents of silver and to deliver 1000 medimns of corn besides, and all this was exacted of him to be performed in six days. From therewith the CoF, conducted the army through the country of the Sinodians, and after he had passed over the river Colchis, he there pitched down his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or meer Carusiana, and let them down and rested upon the river Maa dw; As they advanced from thence toward Lagon the next city the inhabitants fled for fear; when upon the town void of people with abundance of all things was ravaged and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or spring of the river Lysim and the next day made toward the river Coliswm. The Termilians at the same time having forced and won the City of the Lyrians were now upon the point to assault the Castle. They who were within beleaguer, seeing no other hope of issue sent their Embassadors to the CoF: beseeching his help and making pitiful mean, how they with their wives and children were shut up within the fortresses and looked every hour for death, either by famine or the sword.
A sword, this fell out as the Col. wished; namely, to have so good an occasion presented unto him, of turning his way into Pamphylia. At his first coming he delivered the Lyrians from the siege. To Termeius he granted peace, upon composition that he should receive first 30 talents, in like fort he dealt by the Apendians and other States of Pamphylia. In his return from thence, the first day he encamped first by a river called Taurus, and the next day following, near a town which they call Xylus. From thence on his march, and held on his journey continually, until he came to the City Cornelio. The next City unto it was Daf., where he found abandoned by the Inhabitants its fear, howbeit full of all kind of goods. As he marched still along the marshes there met him Embassadors from Lyfian, who came to render their City into his hands. After this he entered into the territory of Sag. /rufa, a fertile and plenteous quarter, for all sorts of corn & fruits. The Phidians inhabit those parts who are the belt warriors in all that country. In regard whereof, as also for that their territory is fruitful and well peopled, and their City strongly situat (as few like unto it) they were grown to be hardy and courageous. The Col. seeing no embassage presented unto him in the entance of the frontiers, sent outBorders to fetch in booty. When they perceived once their good-armed and carried away before their faces, their tumults came down, and then they sent their embassadors and upon composition to pay 50 talents, 10000 medins of wheat, and as many of oil, they obtained peace. From then he passed to the fountains of Ormos, until he came to a village which they name Aperdo-Come, and there he encamped. Thither repaired the next day Seleucus from Apamea. And the same day, after he had sent away unto Apamea his thick folk and other baggage, and paid them that he had good for nothing, he took guides of Selciiments for the way and entered into the plains of Metropolis, and the next morn marched as far as Dimia in Phrygia. After this, he entered into Smydia, where he found all the towns about abandoned for fear, and left defert. With the booty and pillage whereof his army was so heavily charged, that hardly he could march five miles a day: and so he came at length to Bendoz, named, The old, From there he passed to Amburada, and the next day to the fence of Anido, and the third day pitched down his tents near Ab. /fum. There he lay encamped many days together, because he was now arrived into the country of the Toliirobogians.

The Gauls in times past being a mighty people in number were induced to take a voyage, either for want of land to inhabit, or for hope of booty and prizes: and supposing withall, they could not pass through any nation whatsoever, comparable to themselves in ears of arms entrèt under the conduct of Brennus into the country of the Dardanians. Where, they began to mutine among themselves: by occasion whereof it hapned, that to the number of twenty thousand of them, following two of their Princes Lomnorius and Lutarius, departed from Brequus, and took their way into Thrace, where partly by warring with them that made refiistance, and partly by impoling tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as far as to Bresiatun: and after they had held tributary a good time the coast of Propontis, they possessed themselves also of the good towns and Cities of that quarter. After this, they had a mind and desire to invade Asia; for they heard of being so near, how fertile and plenteous the soil of that country was. And after they had surprized and won Lyconobitis by a wife, and by force of arms conquered all Cherbonnes, they descended to Hellepont, Where seeing how they were divided from Asia but only by the Estraights, and that it was but a small cut thinner, their desire was much more inflamed to pass over.

And for this purpose they dispatched certain couriers to Antipater the governor of that coast, to demand passage. But by reason that they effect not this to toomas they hoped there arose another new sedition between the Princes themselves, Whereupon Lomnorius accompanied with the greater part retired to Bresiatun from whence he came. But Lutarius took from the Macedonians who under colour of an embassage were sent from Antipater in ciphers two covered ships, and three brigandines. By means of these vessels within few days he had sent over all his army, transporting them one after another day and night continually. Not long after Lomnorius also passed over into Asia from Bresiatun, by the aid of Nicomedes Kings of Bithynia. After this, the Gauls joyned again together in one, and succoured Nicomedes in his war against Zikyes, who held a part of Bithynia, and by their help and assistance especially, Zikyes was vanquished, and all Bithynia became subject to Nicomedes. Then they departed out of Bithynia into Asia. Now of twenty thousand there were not above ten thousand armed, Yet so great a cetrox they struck into all nations on this side the mountain Taurus, that both they to whom they approached not near, and also they whom they came unto, as well the farther as the nearest, submitted themselves and ranged under their obedience. In the end, being three nations of them to wit, the Toliirobogians the Trocmians, and the Tecloges, they divided Asia like wise into three parts and parted them so equitably among themselves, that each nation of them possessed a several tract which pleased them. The coast of Hellas was given to the Trocmians, the Toliirobogians had for their fruit Asia and Ioma, and into the Tecloges were allotted the inland parts of the main continent of Asia. And in one word they demanded tribute of all Asia on this side Taurus. But they planted and seated themselves about the river Hyus. The brute of their name was so fearfull and terrible, and especially after their issue was multiplied and increased in great number, that the King Allo of Syria in the end refused not to bow their homages and give them tribute. The first of all the inhabitants in Asia that denied them homage, was King Artakes the father of Eumenes; and for the exceeding expectation of all men, favoured his hardy and courages enentreprise; for he vanquished them in battle, Howbeit, he daint not their hearts so much, but still they upheld.

and maintained their sovereign dignity, in such fort, as their puissance continued until the war between Antiochus and the Romans. Yet, and after that Antiochus was vanquished and chased out of part of his realm, they conceived great hope to hold their own till by reason they were so remote from the sea, and therefore thought that the Roman army would never pierce so far as to them. The Cominius, for as much as he was to war with this nation, to bring to all their neighbours in those quarters, assembled his soldiers to a public audience, and in this manner made speech unto them.

"I am not ignorant, my soldiers, that all the people which inhabit Asia, the Gauls are most renowned for valiance in war. And why is this fierce and cruel nation having run over the world in a manner and warred with all countries, chose them a place of abode, and settle themselves in the midst of a generation, of all other most mild and tractable, Big and tall they are of stature, and person; their hair they wear long in golden circled and shining locks; they carry bucklers of huge bigness, and handle swords of exceeding length. Besides, when they enter into battels, they use longing to hop and dance, and with clattering their targets and weapons together, after the grace of their country they make an horrible noise, and all this is done of purpose by them to terrify their enemies. But such devices as these be, let the Greeks the Phrygians, and Carians be afraid of, who are not used and accustomed to hear and see such things: as for the Romans, acquainted with the Gauls sudden and tumultuous wars, they can skill well enough of these their toyes and vanities also. Once indeed, and but once, at the Ellen comet, they discomfited the Romans at the river Alba: but since that time our Ancitomers for the space of two hundred years have made havoc of them, killed, put to flight, and driven them like sheep before them: and often, I dare well say, they have triumphed of the Gauls, than of all the world besides. Thus much we know of them by experience, that if a man be able to stand on their thrusts and shock and violence, (which upon a furious heat of their own by nature and in blind, hasty, and anger they spend all at once), all the parts of their body run to sweat, and become faint: their weapons are ready to fall out of their hands; their bodies are to tender, their courage to feebles, (after their cholerick anger:) once allied and packed, that the very heat of the sun dries the dust and the drought is able without drawing sword, to overthrow them and lay them along. Proof and trial we have had of them not only legion to legion, but man to man. T. Manilius and M. Valerius have marched plainly how far Roman virtue and power is surpasseth the furious rage of Gauls, why even Marcus Manlius, one man alone, repelled and beat down the Gauls as they climbed up by numbers to the Capitoll II. And those ancestors of ours beforenamed, had then to deal with natural Gauls indeed, born and bred in their own country; whereas these, here, by this time now are a bastard sort of them: and, clean degenerate, mingled they are with others and in truth as they be called, so are they Gallo greeks, and in fact with them as with plants, fruits, and living beasts in which we see that the seed is not of that vertue, and to effectual to keep and retain in the same kind and nature, as the property of the soil and the air where they are nourished, is to change the same. Thus the Macedonians who inhabit Alexandria in Egypt, who dwell in Seleucia and Babylon, and other Colonies dispersed over the earth, are grown out of their own kind and in manners become Sytians, Parthians, and Egyptians. Meleasa, among the Gauls, hath drawn somewhat of the nature of the nations adjoyning and bordering upon them. And what have the Tarcentins left them of that severe, rough, and hard discipline of the Spartans? For whatsoever is ingendered and bred in the own proper place, is evermore kindly, and retaineth its own nature better; but look what is transplanted into another soil, doth soon degenerate, and grow into a bastard kind: for nature transformeth her self, and changeth into that where with is nourished. Be sure therefore, that like as you have defeated these Pyrgians, (for no better they be,) overcharged and leaden with French arms in the battell against Antiochus, even so being now conquerours, ye shall subdue and hew them in pieces once already vanquished. And I fear me more that ye shall win so small glory of them, then I doubt by fighting to little with them that ye shall have their hands too full of war against them. Why even King Antiochus many a time and often hath discomfited and put them to flight. Neither would I have you to think, that savage beasts only newly taken, and keeping at the first their wild nature, after a time that they have been fed by hands, grown to be tame and gentle; but that the fiercenes and cruelty of man is like unto the same nature to be dulced and made tractable. Are ye persuaded that these Gauls resemble their fathers and grandfathers in conditions? Their forefathers long since left their native country for want of ground and land to possess; and being driven to pass through the most rough and difficult country of Thessaly, first came into Epirus: after wards travelled all over Thracia, fighting ever as they went with most fierce and cruel nations, until at length they cisedd upon these parts and settled there. After (I say) they had been hatch'd and made more fell by many travels and dangerous adventures, they were received in the end within such a land, as is the abundance of all good things might feed and frant them up. All that the fierceness and savage nature of theirs which they had when they came first thither, is (no doubt) mollified by the goodness of the moist fertile soil, by the pleasantness and pleasure of a moist temper at air, and last of all by the gentle and debonair nature of the inhabitants their neighbors. And even you then (in good faith) are to look unto it (martial men though you be) and the very off-spring of M. himself) ye say? To take heed and beware of the delights of Asia, and betimes to get you forth from them. So forceable are those foreign pleasures and delicat enticements to quench and corrupt the rigor of your parts: to power all is the common end and covering with strangers: so potent is the contactious of them, as were of their manners and dis spise of neighbour inhabitants. Yet this one good and things the commer, cill if you have not that courage which in times past they had;
and among the Greeks here, they are of as great name as ever they were in ancient time. So that among you all you shall win as great before by your victory as if you should have conquered the Gauls when they were at the height of their valour and private doubts. After the almighty dismelled and Embassadors went to Epagogeus (the only Prince in those parts that persisted in amity with caravan) and had refused to do _Annales_ against the Romans the Col. marched forw. ward. The first day, he came to the river _Mulder_ and the morrow to a certain village which they

By Tysert, Thither repaired up to the Embassadors of the Oradians craving to be accepted as friends, but they were enjoyed to py two hundred talents: and when they required leave to make relation and report of some, they were permitted. From them the Col. led his army to Plandown and after that he embarked at _Aidintis_. Thither returned, they who had been sent to Epagogeus together with the Embassadors of Prince _on__tus_, requesting the Romans not to war upon the Teicboges for that both himself and Epagogeus also, would give perdon to them and persuaded the nation to do whatsoever they should be commanded, the Prince obt. ained his request: and so from there the army began to march through the land which they call _Annales_ and well it might be so called, for it hath no wood at all in it, nor hearth so much as thensay any thing else to burn and maintain fire: cow-dung is all their burning; for want of other fowall. While the Romans lay in camp before _Caumlaus_ (a fortress of _Galgare__a_ they discovered the cause of the enemies coming toward them with a great lesser and tumult: that they charged to terly and suddenly upon the _corps au guerd_ of the Romans, that they not only troubled but disordered them. The alarm being given within the camp, the Roman horsemen at once issued forth of all the gates, discomfited the Gauls, and found certain of them in the chase, the Conspirators now that he was come to his enemies country, went not from them, nor forth without sending out his epistles before and kept his army togather in battal array with great heed and care. So this held on his journey continually until he came to the river _Sangara_, where he purposed to make a bridge, because there was no passagage over at any pond. This _Sangara_ is a rivulet out of the mountain _Alives_, and running through _Pringen_joyned with the river _Thembre_ near unto _Bibyania_, and so growing bigger by receiving a double current kept up his course through _Bithynia_ and dilated himself into _Sangara_. Itis not famous and noble for the greatness thereof, as because it is the fifth abundant to all the nation, bordering and dwelling thereupon. When the bridge was finished and the army palled over, as they mar.ched along the bank, the Col. or _Priests of _Cyce _the great mother of the gods_ were come from _Pfius_. and with dreamers inifices and other ornaments wove them: and in their _tall verse_ (as men diracted of their wits) seemed to prophesy and foretell, that the goddesse vomisfing the Romans a fair way to war and victory, yes, and the conquest and legimacy of that country. Hence the Conspi said that he accepted their words for a pledge of good fortune, and thereof in that very place he pitched his Tents.

The next day he went as far as _Cardumini_ a town verify it is none of the greatest, but more sequested and retired unto for tropique and mer handie, then finally in dry towns are that are far and within the land. They are there in triangle wise of equal distance all from it. On the north ward _simpri_ it hath _Holiford and the shores of the other tracts, whereas the _Gallians inhabite by the sea-side. Moreover, it is bordered upon the confines of many great nations, who for their mutual need and commodity, have commerce of negotiation, and meet together in that one place. This town at that time they found stronger dipeople, by reason that the inhabitants were fled for fear; but well toored, and mail of wares and goods of all sorts. While the Romans lay there encompassed, there came Embassadors from _Epagogeus_, reportting unto them, that he had made a journey to the Princes of the Gauls, but could obtain no relation at their hands: also, that they were dislodged out of the champain country had quit their villages and lands in great numbers, and together with their wives and children drove before them and carried with them wherever they would, and were retured to the mount _Oursen_, from whence they purposed to defend them selves by force of arms and the strong situation of the place. The Embassadors likewise of the Oradians, gave more certain intelligence. to wit. That the whole people in generall of the _Toligboioges_ had seizd the hill _Glympse_ that the Teicboges severally by then selves when they taken another mountain calleld _Magana_; that the _Toligboioges_ had committed their wives and children to the guard of the Teicboges cunning with a main army to aid the _Toligboioges_. Now at that time the Princes of those three States were _Origa__Combdomani, and _Gedote_. And the prin ipall reason and means that these had to entreat the war, was this. That being possed of the highest hills of that country and having brought in their provision of all things to serve them for a long space, they supposd to wear, and west out their enemies in profic of time. For this account they made, that they would not ven true to march against them, through so hard and distant aesse places, and if they assoled to do it, they would be emached, repelled back and beatcdown with a small company; again, if they would fit full in length at the foot of those stoned mountains and do nothine, they were never able to endure the cold and the scarcity which they should find there.

And notwithstanding the very altitude and height of the places defended them, yet over and besides they call a tremen., and made other defences round about the tops of the mountains which they held. Also for provision of darts and other shot, it was the least of all their care, supposing that the rough places would furnish them with sufficient store of stones to sling. The Consul forecasting in his mind that he should not deal with their enemies close at hand-fight, but afar off when he was to affall their holds, had made provision aforehand of great store of darts light velutine javelins, arrows, bullets of lead, and small stones that might be leveled and sent out of flings. Thus being well appointed and furnished with inmult of shot, he led his army toward the mountain Olympyward about five miles off he encamped. The next day he together with Attinis advanced forward with five hundred of arms to view the nature and standing of the mountain, together with the situation of the Gauls camp. But the enemies horsemen being double in number to them, illused out of their camp, and put them to flight, slew a few of them in the rout, and hurt many. The third day he set forward with all his forces to discover the places, and by reason that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, he rode round about the mountain in acuity at his pleasure, and perceived that on the South-side, there were certain little hills, all of a clean earth without stones, and the same thing up with an ease silent to a certain place; but to the North were high rocks and the same in manner steep upright, and whereas as the hill were inaccessible three on y ways and advenues he found, the one directly toward the midit of the mountain (where thelelel little mounts of earth) the other two were difficult the one lying South-east, and the other North-west. After he had considered and viewed these places that day he pitched his camp at the very root and foot of the hill. The morrow after he refreshed and finding by the first beats which he killed that the gods were pacified and favourably into him, he divided his army into three battalions, and so advanced against the enemy, and himself in person with the greatest part of his forces, mounted up the hill, whereas as it yielded the easiest ascent, he commanded his brother L. Marcius, from the South-west to get up the hill, as the place would permit with easiest, giving him in charge that he met with any dangerous places steep and hard of ascent, that he should not wrestle with the difficulties of the ground, nor fight against those things which to force and overcome were impossible; but rather to trave the ground, and retire toward him and into join his battalion. As for C. Helv. he willed him with a third part of the forces to wheel about by little and little, and fetch a compas at the hill foot and then from the North-west to mount up, Likewise the sides of Attinis he divided into three equal parts, L and took order that the young Prince himself in person should keep with him. The Cavalry and the Elephants he left in the next downs beneath the hills, and charged the Captains thereof to have a careful eye and good regard to mark what was done in every place, yes, and to make haste to recno and instruct, wherefore need should be, The Gauls making hill, on knowing that on two sides were fire enough, and the place that way to be inaccessible because they would stop the other advenue by force of arms on the South side, sent forth about four thousand armed men to seize upon a certain hill within a mile of their camp, which hill commanded the way, supposing they as from a corn and fortresses to debar them of passage. Which when the Romans perceived they put themselves into action to fight. A pretty space before the enming, marked the skirmishers, together with the Condor archers and flyers from Attinis likewise the Triballians of Tharsis. The enlings of the toomen followed loitly after (as well as they might) against the hill, beating their targets before them so as they seemed to cover themselves only to avoid the shot, and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at first was equally performed with shot and a good distance off; for as the Gauls got the advantage of the ground, so the Romans had the odds for valour and store of darts. But as the skirmish continued and encreased, there was no more equality seen. For the shields of the Gauls being made long, and narrowly enough for their bodies, and with them flat and plain without hardly covered and defended them, and by this time all their shot was spent, and weapon had they none but their very swords, whereof there was no use at all considering the enemy came not to close fight. The only help they had was with stones, and the too too big for their handling and not easy to wield, by reason they were not provided beforehand, but such as in that haste came next to their hand without any choice. Moreover, being not used and exercised to flinging they had neither the artificiall flight, nor yet sufficient strength to help themselves withal: but conversely, from all parts were pelted with bullets of lead and galled with arrows and darts unawares, which they could neither ward nor avoid and for that with as gracious as gentle and tender together their wives and understandings were blinded, they will not do to deceive themselves impressed and overtaken in a kind of fight whereunto they were leaf of all fitted. For as in close conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, whereas are forgivern and taken enterchangeably, choicer kindleth courage even so when men are wounded aloof with light darts, and from whence they know not or they not wot upon whom to run &at whom to make in that blind fit of theirs but they turn upon their own fellow, without all reason at a venture like wild beasts galled with arrows and arrows in their sides. Now, they receive nor a wound but it is seen by reason that they fight naked, and the bodies entire with the skin, and white, as being never bare but in battle by which means greater force of blood gush out of the wounds in their leathy bodies, the gases appease greater, and their white skin much more stained with black blood. But they pal not so much for broad & wide flashes for other whiles when the skin is cut away, and the wound rather broad than deep they take more pride therein, & think they fight with greater honor. How it happen

A happen at any time, that an arrow head or a bullet sticking within the flesh all hidden, put them to pain and torment, notwithstanding the hurt be small in appearance, yet when they seek to pluck out an arrow, and the head will not follow, then they take on and are stark mad, for shame that so foul a prick should plague them so and be ready to kill them, insomuch as they call themselves on the ground, and lie wallowing along everywhere. Others there be of them that run full upon their enemy and those were ticked with arrows and darts from all parts & when they came near to hand were by the skirmishers killed and cut in pieces with their swords. Those fouldiers use to cover them selves with a shield of three foot long., carrying in their right hand certain spears to use aloft, and wear by their lds a spanish sword. Now in case they come to hand fight, they stir their feet upon their right hand into the right, and take them to their swords. By this time there were in view of the Gauls left a yea, who perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them. Seizing within the enigns of the legions to approach near unto them, took them to their heads on all hands, and began to file again toward the camps; which now was full of fear and tumult as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folk (not fit to bear arms) were wounded and thronged together. The Romans following the train of their victory, seized the hills abandoned by the enemies that were fled. About the same time M. Adelius and C. Helvius, having mounted in so far as they could find way, traversing the sides of the hill, when they were come to an end, where they could see neither way nor path; they turned to that quarter of the hill which onl afforded a way, and both at them began to follow the Conuls battalion a pretty distance, although they had agreed beforehand to do; and that which at first had been very, the better thing to do, they were of necessity forced at last to put in execution. For in such difficult places and places of disadvantage, sequaces behind in a retreating have oftentimes served in right good stead: that if none in the vanguard should chance to be beaten back, in the second place prevent and protect them, and so begin fresh a new fight. A ter that the foremost enigns of the legions were come to those hills, where the light armed before had desisted the Conuls commanded the fouldiers to wait them awhile and breathe themselves, and then to follow them where by the sides of the Gauls lay dead along all over the mountains. And if they were to make use of the light armed fouldiers as they had been before, the Gauls would have made a riddle of them: what is to be looked for at the hands of the legiionary fouldiers armed all over in compleat harness? What will they do that carry the hearts of so noble a war to ? Surely they must needs win the camp, into which the enemy is chased and driven by the light armed fouldiers. Howbeit he commanded the light armed to go a fore who all the while that the legions rested themselves spent not the time in vain, but employed it in gathering together the darts and javelins that lay about the hills, to the end that they might be sufficient shot. Now the Romans marched forward and approached the camp, the Gauls likewise for their parts, setting their defences would not be able to defend them, stood armed before the trench and rampart. But afterwards being overcharged with all sorts of darts, they were driven in the turning of an hand within their hold, (for the more they were in number and the lesser they fould, the less lighted any dart in vain) only they left strong guards about the gates and entrenching the camp. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the hold, there was discharged at random a mighty number of darts: and that many of them were hurt thereby, appeared by theirry mingled with the Rikes of women and children.

E Now against them that waited the gates, and took up the avenues with their guards the legiionary fouldiers in the first row let fly their javelins. And all in their were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reason that their shields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them entangled one within another and fl.h. fail. Long they could not abide the violence of the Romans. in so much as before that the victors could enter into the camp, the Gaul's fled forth at all the gates wide open, and ran they will neither like blind men, as well through places which had no way, as those that were passable. No rocks to sleep with downfal, no cliffs to rough with crags, could hold in their way, and nothing feared they affront; their enemies only at their heels affrighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong down a mighty height and brake their necks, or else for very fear one's lost their breath, were windied, and ready to die. The CoF. after he had taken their camp, would not suffer it to be ranlacked, but commanded the fouldiers to follow the chase hard; and whilsts the enemies were thus aournd to affright them thoroughly. Then came the other regiment with M.Adelius but the Conulf would not suffer them to enter the camp, but let them forth with to pursue the enemies. Himself also in person soon after followed, when he had delivered the charge of keeping the prisoners, unto the military Tribunes of the army: for this reckoning and resolution he made that the war was at a small end if in this tumultuous sort of theirs he might either kill or take prisoners a number of them. The Conulf was no sooner departed but C. Helvius came with his third regiment, but he could not hold his troopers from the pillage of the camp, in much as the booty and prizes were most untively dealt among themselves who were at no end of thievish. The Cavalry found all this while still and will not of the fight; or that their fellows had gotten the victory; but afterwards they alsoeping the Gaul's delighted about the foot of the mountains made after them as well as their horses would mount against the hills; some they flew and others they took prisoners. The just number of those that were flyin cannot easily be counted, because they fled far and near among the crags and windings of the mountains where they were killed in bottom corners. Many of them besides, having engaged themselves to the crags and rocks that had no way forward, ward, tumbled down into the valleys of a monitory depth underneath. Yea, and some hapned to be killed in the woods amidst the thickets & bushes; Clodius, who writeth of two battles fought upon the mount Olympus, reporteth that there died there forty thousand enemies. But Paterius, who otherwise went to overreach and exceed in number hath recorded not above ten thousand. But without all question the prisoners amounted to forty thousand full, because they went with a train of all sorts and ages, more like men dislodging and removing out of one country into another, than going to war. The Consul, after he had burned all the amour of his enemies in one heap commanded his soldiers to bring forth the rest of the cattle into one place, and either sold and made money of that which was to come into the publicke treasury of the City, or else parted it amongst the soldiers indifferently, with great regard, that every one should have a just and even portion. Moreover, he commanded them all in open audience, and rewarded every one besides with gifts according to their several deerts. But above the rest, and with the general accord of all he both prais'd, and also recomman'd Ataltes. For truly that young gentleman shewed not only singular valour and forwardness in all travels and dangers, but also a speciall modelly and rare integritie.

There remained yet entire and whole the war with the Tectosages, against whom the Consul made an expedition, & upon the third day arrived at Ancyra, a noble City in those parts, from whence the enemies were little more than ten miles distant. During the time that he lay there encamped, there hapned a memorable fact, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more prisoners, there was oneafortunates to be kept in ward, the wife of Octagon, a woman of surpassing beauty. The Centurio who had her in his purse, was lecherous and covetous withall, as many of these found it. Here he solicited and tempted her to commit folly: but seeing her altogether unwilling, and that she abhorred to prostitute her self unto him, he did violence upon her body, others, who fortune had made bond and thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollifie and allay the indignity of this villainy, he put the woman in good hope and promised that she should return home again to her friends: many he would not do all for pure love alone and freely without ransom for he bargained to have a certain sum of gold besides. And to the end forsooth that no person belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, he permitted her to send one of the prisoners whom he would her self as meffenger to her friends and kinsfolk, and appointed a place near unto a river whither the next night following two or more (of the said captive Ladies friends with the gold aboveaid) for to receive her at his hands. It fell out that among the rest of the captives committed to his guard, there was a bondslave of her own; this meffenger at the shutting in of the evening the Centurio conducted without the corporis guard. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed both the two friends aforesaid of the gentlewoman and also the Centurio himself with his prisoner, where they shewed the gold, amounting to the full sum of one Attic talent (according as it was agreed between them) where with that the woman spake unto them in her language and commanded them to draw their swords, and kill outright the Centurio as he was weighing the gold. Which done, she casted her head to be cutt off, and wrapped it her self within her garments, and so carried it home to her husband Oristas, who from Olympus had fled and escaped to his own house. But before that she clipped and embraced her husband, she threw down the Centurio his head at his feet. And when he wondred what man's head it was and what act this might be, a passing woman made the confession to her husband the injury that her body had suffered and likewise the revenge for the abuse of her chastity by force and violence: and as it is reported, she maintained the honour of this maconlike act ever after even to her dying days, in all sanctimonie of life and modest carriage of herself like a chaste dame.

While the camp lay at Ancyra, the Orators of the Tectosages shewed themselves unto the Consul, requesting him not to dislodge and remove from thence before he had parted with their Lords and Princes laying withall, that they would accept any conditions of peace whatsoever, rather than war. The time was set down, even the next morow and a place likewise appointed, as just in the middle way (as it could be guessed) between the camp and Ancyra. The Col, thither came at the hour assigned, accompanied with a guard of five hundred horse: but receiving no Gauly at all there he returned into the camp. And thither repaired the same Orators unto him the second time with all the delates and demanding that their Princes could not come in person by occasion of some fruitle of conscience that arode the while: howbeit, the chief performances besides of the whole nation should appear by whom all matters might be composed as well with themselves. The Consul made answer, that he likewise would send Ataltes in his stead. So they came to this compacting from both parts. Ataltes had three hundred men of arms about him for his guard; and certain conditions of peace were drawn and propounded: but forasmuch as they might not grow to any small conclusion in the silence of their chief Commanders, accorded it was the day following the Consul and their Princes aforesaid should meet in that place together. Now the drift of the Gauls in making these delays and trifling off the time, was thus, that first they might gainsome convenient time to transport over the river H. Lyall all that over they had (which is not to hazard with their own persons, together with their wives and children) and afterwards to lay a train of an ambush for the Consul himself, who took small regard and was not provided for to prevent their villany intended under the colour of that conference. For that purpose they chose a thousand horsemen out of all their cavalry, of especiall valour and approved hardinns, for the execution of this treacherous design. And truly this their fraud had taken effect, if fortune had not defended and maintained the law of nations, which to break and violate they had compromised. Certain soldiery of the Romans went out to purvey forage and fuel, were directed to those very quarters whereas the party above said should be kept. The Colonists thought it the surer place for them, because they were to have the Comitills guard also opposed for their defence against the enemy: howbeit, they set another cohort of their own, consisting of 600 horse men nearer to the camp. Now by reason that Atilius affumed the Comitills, certainly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be soon knit up and disposed; he departed out of the camp with the same guard of horsemen as before, and when he had marched almost five miles forward, and was not far short of the place appointed, he discovered all of a sudden the
b) Gauls riding in full gallop against them in most furious manner as enemies; whereon he said the march and made a stand commanding the horsemen to make ready their weapons and resolve to fight. The first charge and shock he received right valiantly, and hopped not back one foot: but afterwards as the multitude pressed still upon him, he began to give ground and retreat, but so as he brake not the ranks of his troops. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer flight, than commodity and help in keeping their arrasies, they all at once turned their horse heads and fled. When they were disarrayed once, the Gauls pursued hard and killed them; and no doubt a great part of them had died for it, but that the forragers guard of 600 horse afore said came in to release them. For they hearing afar off the fearful cry of their fellows, made ready their armor and horse, and being fresh & heart entered upon the fight that was given over by their wearied and discouraged companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the fear turned from the losers to the winners: for as the first encounter the Gauls were put to flight: and withall, the said forragers and ewers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head and confronted the Gauls. Know h as they could neither fly readily nor escape turly, because the Romans with their fresh horses followed them in chace, and they themselves were already tired; so therefore they went away with life, and nor one was taken prisoner for the greater part by the usual method of the Gauls, to make violaters of this their party under the colour of truth and fidelity. The Romans which their fellows were inflamed with anger, the very next day came against them with the puissance of all their forces. But the Cof, employed two whole days himself in viewing and discouraging the situation and nature of the hill, because he would not be ignorant of anything re-quart, upon the third day after he had first taken the aquisites and prerogatives of the birds, and afterwards killed a faconice, he led forth his army divided into 4 battalions. Two of them were to mount up the midst of the hill, and the other two he let in the side to flank the wings of the Gauls; and to march up against them. The Teuton and Trogiones, who were the whole flower and strength of the enemies, made their main battle in the midst, consisting of 5000 men; and because there was no use of horse among those tough & uneven rocks, the cavalry alighted on foot to the number of 10000, and those they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians were armed like auxiliary Morians, and the auxillary Morians who were to the number almost of 4000 men, held the left.
The Cof, like as before in the mount Olympus marshalled his light armed skirmish in the forfront of the vanguard, & gave order to have ready hand at least 50 darts & other shot of all sorts as he had before. When they approached one another, all things answered both of the one side & the other, like as in the former conflict: having that the courage of the victors increased in regard of their former successes & the hearts of the enemies were much abated and damped. For albeit themselves had not yet been foiled & vanquished, yet they took the overthrow & loss of their comraten for their own, and therefore as the beginning of the battle was insecure, the issue was likewise. For the Gauls bastall was overspread & covered again as it were with a cloud of light shot. And not one of them durst run forth out of his range, for fear he should discover his whole body & lay open to take all that came: and keeping still together as they did, the thinner they stood the faster mark they were for the enemies to level at. & the more wounds they received, The Cof, perceiving they were already of themselves troubled, and supposing that if he let forward & present them upon the enemys of the legions, they would immediately all of them flee, received the light armed loole shot, & the rest of the auxillary soldiery within his own ranks and files, and then advanced his legions. The Gauls affrighting with the fresh remembrance of the late defeat and overthrow of the Ponelobogians, carrying also about themselves the darts flicking in their bodies, weary beside with long harding about, and overcharged likewise with many a wound, could not abide much as the oniet and flout of the Roman legions. Then began they to take their heels and file to their camp, but few of them recovered it, and got within the rampier and other defences. The greater number fled here and there on both hands, and disipered themselves into all parts as it took them in the head, and as every man in this confus'd fight caught a way by himself. The Conquerors followed them till even hard to the very camp, and all the way charged upon their backs and beat them down. Which done, they fluid and stuck still in the camp for desire of pillage: and there was not one that followed one foot after. The Gauls in the wings fled to it longer, by reason that it was later ere they were set upon, but able they were not to abide the first charge and shot of the Roman darts. The Comitill, who could not possibly pluck those one of the camp that were once entered on for greeclines of spoiling and rifting the tents, gave out those immediately that were in the wings to follow the enemies in chace still forward. Thee pursued them a certain space; howbeit in this flight (for in truth it was no flight at all) there were not above eight thou-
land that left their carcases behind them, all the rest recovered the other side of the riverHal. Many of the Romans remained that night within the enemies camp; the rest the Consul brought back again to his own. The next day he took account and survey of the prisoners and prizes, which was as great as a man would conceive that a nation of all others most greedily of pillage and spoiling might possibly take and heap together for so many years, as they held all those parts within the mountain Loussus by force of arms. The Gauls thus scattered in flight rallied themselves into one place, as being many of them hurt or disarmed, and stripped clean out of all they had left behind them, and summoned the Consul to treat for peace. The Consul willed them to give attendance upon him at Epigus himself made haste to remove out of those cold quarters by reason that the mountain Taunus was so near (for now it was the midday of Autumn) and led back his victorious army to pass the winter near the sea-fide.

Whiles the affairs thus passed in Asia, all was quiet in the rest of the Provinces. At Rome the Senators Gnaeus Flamininus and Marcus Claudius Marcellus made a new choice of Senators: and P. Sesto Africano was chosen the President of the Senate now the third time: four only were left out and discarded: but not one of them had been office of State, and had the honour to sit in the Curule chair. The Senators showed themselves likewise phlegmatic in the review of the Cavalry and order of Knighthood. They put out to framing the foundations and ground works upon the Aqueduct in the Capitol: and likewise they bargained for to pave the street with hard flint or pebble, from the gate Capito to the Temple of Mars. The Campans demanded of the Senate, in what place they should be assemled and enrolled: and thereupon a decree passed for their enrolment at Rome. The rivers were out, and great deluges happened that year. The Tyber overflowed his banks twelve times and drowned Mars held and all the low parts of the City.

After this Cn. Mailloinus the Consul had brought the Gauls to an end in Asia, he the other Consul M. Fulvius having utterly subdued the Accaianians over into Cephalenian and sent to all the Cities about the Island certain messengers, to find them whether they would yield themselves unto the Romans or hazard the fortune of war? and if for the same fear among them all, that there was not one person refused to surrender. And being enjoyed (according to the ability of the people who were but bare) to give hollocations, the Nemesians Cephalianians, and Sameans delivered twenty apiece. This peace no sooner was known upon the Cephalenians beyond all their expectation, but suddenly one City of the Sameans revolted, and upon what cause it is not known: themselves alarmed and laid. That forasmuch as their City was beaten in a commodious place they feared greatly to be dispossessed and turned out of it by the Romans, but whether they only imagined this and put themselves in fright, and so changed their quiet and repose for vain and foolish fear, or whether there had been question hereof among the Romans and upon much concerning in mens mouth the rumour of such matter, ran unto them it is not certainly known. Only this much after they had given their hollocations, they flung their City gates upon a sudden; and defil they would not from their enterprise, for all the entrent and prayers that their own hollocations made, whom the Consul had lent (on purpose) even under their walls, to move their counsellors and parents to pity and compassion. When as therefore they would make no answer tendering unto peace, the Consul began to assail the City; and all the ordnance of artillery and engines of battery were under his hand, which had been brought from the siege of Ambraeis. And look what works and fabricks were needful besides to be made. the sondiers with great dill pace and forwards performed, so in two places at once they planted rams against the City and battered the walls. Heartly to the other side their part omitted and neglected nothing, that might either annoy the enemy or impeach the works. But two things there were principally whereof they made resistance and withstood their violence: the one was, a counter-mure within the City, which they over raised new instead of the old & for the same reason that was, that was demolished and broken down: the other was, their sudden fallsies, one while upon the fortifications and fabricks, others while upon the corporis de gaurd of the enemies: and for the most part in these skirmishes they had the better hand. But one mean there was devised, and the fame of small blew to speak of, to restrain and keep them infron falling forth. The Romans sent to * Aeclans, Pario, and Dime, for an hundred fiders. These nations from their childhood to execute themselves (after the manner of the country) to discharge out of flings into the open sea certain round stones, which commonly the shore is overspread with among the sands: by reason of which exercise, they have more skill both to toling farther from them and allo to strike more surely and give a smarter rap and stroke than those of the Balear Islands: for their fling is not made with one only cord as the Balearians are, and those of other nations but it hath three leather thongs hardned and made fit with many finures and seams left if the leathering were so and gentle, the bullet and stone within should wag to and floe and roll out in the delivery and hurling of it: but being fetled and counterpoised (as it were) it went merrily away, and sent and driven out of the noose of a stone-bow. And so well practiced were they in this feat that they could a great way off level a bullet through garlands, rings, and hoops of small compass, and miss not: may, they would be sure to hit, not only the head of an enemy, but any part of the face that they aimed at, pointblank, and never fail: these flings (I say) made the Sameans to pluck in their heads, that they durst not fall out neither to often nor so boldly as they did. Inomuch as from the walls, they requeted the Achaeans for a while to go aside and repose themselves, and see them how they skimmished with the corporis de gaurd
A of the Romans, four months space the Samians endured the siege. Now when of that small number which they had, some or other daily drop away, and were either killed outright or wounded; and they that remained, were both tyred in body, and daunted in courage; the Romans one night passed over the wall, by the fortresses which they call Cymlies (for the City where it bounded upon the Sea, lyeth toward the West) and entered so far as the market place. After that the Samians perceived that one part of the City was taken by the enemies, they fled with their wives and children into a greater fortresses, and the next day yielded: the Town was razed, and they themselves were all sold in open market, to whom would give melt.

The Consul having set the state of Cephalenia in good order, and put a garrison within Samos, passed into Peloponnesus, having been called and sent for to come thither a long time, principally by the Aegians and Lacedaemonians. Time our of mind, and from the first beginning of the Diets of Achaia, the whole nation used to assemble and meet at Aegion ordinarily, were it for to grace and honour the City, or because the place was commodious therefor. This ancient custom Philopomen that year began first to infringe, and went about to make a law and ordinance, That in all the Cities of Achaia, their Counsels and Diets shall be holden in course and order at their times, And against the coming of the Consul, when the Demiurges of the four Cities and states summoned the Dict to be kept at Aegion, Philopomen (Prior for that time) came with a coun tre-unions and proclaimed it to be held at Argos. And when it was evident to be seen, that they all in manner minded thither to resort; the Consul alfo (albeit in affection he favoured the Aegians) came to Argos: where, after much debate, seeing the matter growing the other way, he deft from his design and gave over the cause. After this, the Lacedaemonians avverted him from thence, and drew him away to the deciding of their controversies and dissentions. Certain banished persons they were who most of all disquieted and troubled that state: and many of them had their abiding place in the Camps coaling along the frontiers of the Laconian territory toward the Sea, which was taken wholly from the City. The Lacedaemonians much discontented and offended hereat, entred one night a certain borough called T. Las, surprised it unanimously to the inhabitants, and kept it to their use: to the end, that if need were at any time to lend Embassadors to Rome or else whither, they might have some free access unto the Sea: and withall, be served of a mart-Town for the same, and a place of receipt for all forrain merchandise from strangers to their necessary uses. The Townsmen within, as also the exiles aforesaid (there dwelling) were terriified at the sight with this fuddain and unexpected occurrence: but afterward (before day-light) when they had once rallied themselves together, with small ado and skirmishes chafed forth the Lacedaemonians: howbeit, the fear spread over all the Sea coast, so that in one general accord, the Camps and Villages every one, yea, and the Exiled persons (as many as there inhabited) dispatched their Embassadors to the Achaeans, Philopomen their Prior (who ever from the beginning inclined, he came of the banished, and had alwayes advised and counselfled the Achaeans to abate and take down the pride and reputation of the Lacedaemonians) granted them at their suit and seeking, a Diet. In which (upon a motion by him made) there passed a decree in this form: That whereas T. Quinsus and the Romans, had committted and delivered to the safeguard and protection of the Achaeans, the fortresses, burroughs, and villages, situate along the Sea coast of the Lacedaemonians; and (by virtue of a covenant and accord) the Lacedaemonians had nothing to do therein, but ought to forbear them; and yet notwithstanding, the Town Las was by them forced, and a great mallice there committed: therefore unless the principals and accessories both of that outrage, were yielded to the Achaeans, they deemed the covenant and accord in that behalf provided, to be broken. Hereupon incontinently were Embassadors addressed to Lacedaemon, to challenge and demand the parties aforesaid: but the Lacedaemonians took this for to proud a commandement, and thought it such an indignity, that without all doubt, if they had been in as good estate then, as sometimes they were, they would immediately have taken arms. But nothing troubled and disquieted their spirits so much as this, for fear lest it once they received the yoke of subjection upon their necks, in yielding obedience to their first demand, Philopomen would effect and put in execution that which he long intended and went about. even to deliver the City Lacedaemon into the hands of the banished aforesaid, Enraged therefore with choler and anger, they fell upon thirty of that faction who were complottet in connivell with Philopomen and the exiles, and drew them out right; and withal made a decree. To renounce and reject all sociery with the Achaeans; and forthwith to lend their Embassadors to Cephalenia, with commission, to deliver Lacedaemon unto M. Fulvio and the Romans; and to beleech him to take the pains to come into Peloponnesus, there to receive the City Lacedaemon under the obedience and protection of the people of Rome. When the Embassadors had made relation hereof to the Achaeans, presently war was proclaimed against the Lacedaemonians by common consent of all the states of that assembly and general counsell: but the winter impeached them for entering into any action and present execution. Howbeit they made small rodes into their frontiers, and waited the fame not only by Land, but also by Sea, after the manner of robbery and piracy, rather than of warlike hostility. Thrice troubles drew the Cof, into Peloponnesus, and by his commandment a Diet was published to be holden at Eili: and thither were the Lacedaemonians sent for to argue and debate their cause. Where there was not only much reasoning and dispute, but also wrangling and altercation. The Consul who in other points bare himself nicely enough, and answerd in doubtful terms, as one willing to entertain both parts, determined and ended the controversy in one only word, warning them both to put up their swords, and lay arms aside, until they had sent their Em-assadors to the Senate of Rome. So there were embassages addressed both from the one and the other to Rome. In likewise the banished Lacedaemonians joined their cause and emibly with the Achaeans, Diophanes and Lycurgus, both Megapolitans, were the chief in the embassage of the Achae-ans, who as they jarred and disagreed in the managing of State-affairs, so they accorded not but varied in the speeches that they delivered, Diophanes referred the decision of all matters unto the Senat, as who were best able to compose all controversies between the Achaeans and Lacedaemonians. But Lycurgus, intrusted by Philopomen, required that the Achaeans might do and execute whatever they had ordained, according to the covenant, and the conditions therein comprised; and that they would maintain their full liberty without abridging and empathing the same, according as they had received it at their hands. The nation of the Achaeans in those days was in great credit and reputation at Rome, bowbeit the Senate thought it not good to make any change and alteration in the State of the Lacedaemonians. In conclusion, they returned such an intricate and doubtful answer, that both the Achaeans might continue it as it they had permission and free liberty to do what they would with Lacedaemon, and the Lacedaemonians again took it, as though they had not to large a scope and absolute power allowed them, as to do their pleasure in every thing.
But this authority and liberty whatsoever it was, more or less, the Achaeans (stretched beyond all measure and compass, and used it too proudly and insolently, Philopomen continued still in place of sovereign government, and levied a power to be ready in the beginning of the spring, and so encamped upon the frontiers of the Lacedaemonians. This done, he lent his Embassadors to demand the delivery of them into his hands, who were the authors of the revolt; promising withal, that if they would do, their City should remain in peace without any molestation, and they fulfier and fittest no harm, before they had answered for themselves in open audience. All the rest for fear kept silence and said not a word, only they whom he had challenged by name, made offer of themselves to go, under safe conduct, received from the Embassadors, and faithful promise that no violence should be done upon their persons, until they had pleaded their answer. Accompanied they were with divers noble personages of great mark and name both as advocates unto them in their particular quarrels, and also in regard of the Common-well, as far as their private cause any way touched and concerned it. Never had the Achaeans before time brought the Laced-monian exiles with them into the confines of Lacedaemon, because they supposed that nothing so to much alienate and ruffle the hearts of the whole City as that. But then the whole land, as if were, of the vanguard, were no other but those banished persons. And as the Lacedaemonians above said were coming, who should meet and asfront them arranged in order of battle at the very gate of the camp but they? At the first they welcomed them with chiding and railing, after that they fell to bitter words and bruits, and their battle was up on both sides, insomuch as those of the banished crew who were of hot spirit and harshest metal, made no more ado but ran unto the Lacedaemonians; whereupon the Pretor himself came between, voided the press, and safegguarded the persons of the Lacedaemonians, encircling and stoning some of their hands who were already about to hit them, and made them inactive. But the tumult still increased, and the multitude was all in an hurly. The Achaeans in first to see only what the matter was, and to be lookers on. But afterwards, when the exiles began with a loud voice to cry out, and report what wrongs and injuries they had sustained, beseeching them of their help, and avouching with all might and confidence, that if they let slip this opportunity, they should never have the like again, alluding moreover, That the league first made in the Capitol, after remeet at Olympia, and lift of all confirmed by a sacred oath in the Camp of Athens, had been broken and disavowed by them, and therefore the guilty and culpable parties were to be punished accordingly as they entered into any bond of new accord. At their words the multitude was incensed, and by occasion of one man's voice, who cried to strike and knock them down, fell to flinging stones at them. And by this means seventeen of them, who during the garboil chanced to be tied in bonds, were floned to death. The rest to the number of fix and thirty, were the next morning apprehended, whom the Pretor had shielded and protected from violence, not for any decree he had to save their lives, but because he would not have them military and peril before they were heard. These were presented and exposed as a prey to the unryly and angry multitude: and when they had made some small speech unto them, from which they turned away ther ears, they were all condemned and delivered over to be executed. When the Lacedaemonians were once put in this fear, then they were commanded, Imprimis, to demolish and break down their walls. Items, That all for-rain auxiliary soldiers, who were waged and served for pay under the tyrants, should be void out of the Lacedonian country. Items. That all the slaves whom those tyrants had let free (and of such there was a great number) should depart before a certain day; and that it might be lawful for the Achaeans to attack the bodies, to fall and carry away as many as flailed of Lycurgus, and remain behind.
Items. That they should abolish the laws, ordinances and cultums of Lycurgus, and frame themselves to live after the fashions and manners of the Achaeans, for to they should be incorporated into one civil body, and better accord and fold together in all things. They condemned to none of these conditions more willingly and sooner, than to the raising of their walls, and nothing troubled them so much as vexed their heart, as the restoring of the banished persons. Howbeit there passed an act at*Tegea* for their restitution in a general Council of all the Achaeans there held.
In which Allenby, upon a report and mention made, that the mercenary strangers abroad specified, and the new enrolled Lacedemonians called Africani (for so they termed them, who, by the tyrants were estranged and enslaved with freedom) had abandoned the City, and were departed hitherways into the country, it was thought good before the army was disdissed and called, that the Pretors should go with a company rightly armed and appointed to lay hold upon all that sort of people, and make sale of them, as of a prize and booty gained from the enemies. Many of them were apprehended and sold, and with the money raised of them, that part of the Gallery at Megalopolis, which had been ruinous by the Lacedemonians, was by the permission of the Athenians restored. Likewise the territory of Boeotia, which the Lacedemonian tyrants unjustly held in possession, was laid again to that City, according to an old decree of the Athenians, which was made during the reign of King Philip, son of Amyntas. The City of the Lacedemonians by this means much encreased, continued a long time in subjection and subordom under the Athenians, but their State received damage by no one thing so much, as by the abolishing of the discipline of Lycurgus, to which they had been used and accustomed for the space of 700 years.

Pretently after the holding of this Diet, where in the Athenians and Lacedemonians debated their causes before the Conuli, M. Fulvius repaired to Rome (for that the year was almost expired) against the solemn election of new Magistrates; wherein he created for Conuls, M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator; and gave the repulse to M. Aemilius Lepidus his enemy, who that year made suit also to be Conul. This done, there were Pretors also chosen, to wit, Q. Marcus Philippus, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Stercinius, C. Catinus, P. Claudius Pulcher, and L. Manlius Aemilius. When this election was ended, it was thought expedient that M. Fulvius should return into his former Province to the army there; and not only he, but his colleague also, Ca. Maurinus, had their commission revived, and they continued in government another year. The same year according to the direction of the Decemvirs, there was brought into the Temple of Hercules the statue of the same God: and within the Capitol were set up by Cn. Cornelius six plinths in gold drawing a chariot with this inscription, That he being Conul gave that present. Alio P. Claudius and Sulpicius Calo, Edies Curule, hung up twelve brazen shields, made of the fines that certain corn-hoorders paid, for hoarding up and keeping in their grain. Moreover Q. Fulvius Flaccus, an Edile of the Commons, erected two golden images raised of the mony that one guilty person was condemned in (for they commenced their actions severally by themselves.)

Asio A. Cecilius his companion, he condemned none. The Roman great games were set forth all through the city; and the Plebeian plays exhibited likewise full and whole, five times.

After this, M. Valerius Messala and C. Livius Salinator, entered their Conulsiphip upon the 7th day of March, and proposed before the Senate as concerning the affairs of the State, touching their Provinces also, and the armies. As for Etruria and Africa, there was no change at all. The Conul, by a decree of the Senate had the charge of Pisidia, together with the Ligurians; and the other of Gauls; and they were commanded either to agree between themselves, or to call lots for their Provinces. They were enjoyed also to levy new armies, and each of them to enrol two legions, and either of them to charge the allies of the Latin Nation with 15000 foot, and 1200 horsemen. Utte Messala the government of Etruria and the Salinator of Gaul. After this, the Pretors likewise called lots for their Provinces: the jurisdiction within Rome of citizens was allotted to M. Claudius, and of foreigners to P. Claudius. Sicily to Q. Marcus Sertorius to C. Stercinius, high Spain to L. Manlius, and the low to C. Attius. As for the armies, ordained it was, that the legions under the conduct of C. Livius should be withdrawn out of Gaul, and made over to M. Tullius the Propretor to serve in the Brutians country. Item. That the forces which were in Sicily should be discharged: and that M. Sempronius the Vice-pretor there, should bring from thence the fleet to Rome. Ordered likewise it was, that either of the Provinces of Spain should have one legion, which at that time served there: and that both the Pretors should for supply of the allies three thousand foot, and two hundred horsemen apiece, and transport the same over with them. Now before that their new Governors went to their Provinces, by order from the whole college and society of the Decemvirs, there was published a general proclamion and supplication to be holden for 3 days in all the quatorziums or cross streets of the City; for that in the day time between the third hour and the fourth, there were a general darkness which continued almost all that time. Moreover, a Novitial sacrifice was published to be celebrated for 9 days together, because on the Aventine hill it had rained flakes.

The Camps, when as the Centors (by virtue of an act of Senate which pased the former year) compelled them to be enrolled at Rome, (for aforetime they knew not where to be enrolled) made petition now that they might contract marriages and take Roman citizens to their wives; and that whatsoever had wedded any of them before, might keep them still: and what children lesser they had born before that day, should be reputed legitimate and their rightfull heirs. Both suits were granted. As concerning the free burghers of Formia, Fundi, and Arpinum, C. Faberius Toppa a Tribun of the Com. preferred a bill, that they might be priviledged to give their voices in Rome; for before that time, citizens in deed they were of Rome, (and that was all) for liberty of inimages they had none. This bill was crossed and nipped by four other Tribuns, because it was propounded without the warrant and approbation of the Senate. But being a freewill and better advised and enformed, that it appertained to the people and not to the Senate to give their voices where it pleased them, they gave over their enterprise, and opposed themselves Now more to hinder the proceeding thereof. So it passed: and accordingly the Formians and Fundans should give their voices in the tribe Emilia & the Apamasi in Carnutes in their tribes then into and never before, were they enrolled by an act of the same Valerius, M. Claudius Antiochus the Censor took a survey of the City, and by lot obtained the pre-eminesence thereof before his colleague T. Quintius, In which there were numbered 358,308 polis of Roman citizens. This review being accomplished, the Consuls took their journeys into their several provinces.

During that winter election whiles these things thus passed at Rome, there returned embassages from all States, Cities and Nations which inhabit on this side Taurus, unto Cn. Modestus first Consol and afterwards Pro-consul, whiles he kept his winter in Asia. And as the victory achieved over Antiochus was more honorable and glorious to the Romans, than that over the Gauls, so the conquest of the Gauls was more joyous and pleasing to the Roman allies, than that other of Antiochus, for the terriblity in which the King held them was more tolerable than the cruelty of these savage and inhuman barbarians, and the doubtful and fear which they felt every day; as not knowing how far forth they would proceed, carried so (as it were) in a templum to wait and spread them thin. And therefore as nations who by the defeat of Antiochus recovered liberty, and by the subjugation of the Gauls enjoyed peace, they presented themselves not only to give thanks and dwell their contentment in that behalf, but also brought with them certain coronettes of gold, one every one according to their ability. Likewise there came Embassadors from Antiochus, as also from the very Gauls, to have conditions of peace minisfied unto them: yes, and from Aria, rate King of the Cappadocians, who staved pardon, and offered to buy out his repasts for money, in that he had given aid unto Antiochus; and fined he was to pay 200 talents of silver. The Gauls had this answer returned unto them, That K. Eumenes when he came home tender unto them articles of peace. The embassages of the other states and cities were dismissed with gracious answers, and went away better pleased and contented, than they were at their coming. The Embassadors of Antiochus were commanded to bring money into Pamphylia, and corn likewise, according to the covenant made with L. Scipio; for thither the Consul purposed himself to come with his army. After this, having taken a review and survey of his forces, he set forward in the beginning of spring, and within 8 days arrived at Apamea. There he sojourned in camp for three days: from whence he removed, and at the third days end came to Pamphylia, whether he had given order to the Kings Embassadors to convey their money and corn. There he received 500 talents of silver which were transported unto Apamea. The corn was divided in the army. From thence he marched to Perga, which was the only country in those parts held with a garrison. Where he approached, the Captain of the garrison met him on the way, requisiting 30 days space, in which time he might know the presence of K. Antiochus as touching the rendring of that City. The time was granted and within that day the garrison quit the place and departed, from Perga he went his brother L. M. Philip his 400 loutiers to Orocera, for to demand the rest of the money which by promise was due; and himself because he was advertised that K. Eumenes and the deputies of commissioners were come from Rome to Ephesus, revoc'd with his army also to Ephesus, and commanded the Embassador of Antiochus to follow him thither. There, by the advice of the ten commissioners, a final league was concluded, and comprised in their of such like terms: There shall be amity and friendship between King Antiochus and the people of Rome under these conditions ensuing. Imprimis. The King shall not suffer to pass through any part of his realms, or their countries that are under his dominion any army that intendeth to make war against the people of Rome or their allies, nor aid them with victory or any other fruit whatsoever. Item, The Romans and their allies shall do the like by Antiochus, and all clothe that are under his subjection. Item, It shall not be lawful for Antiochus either to make war with those that inhabit the lands, or to pass over into Europe. Item, He shall quit all Cities, Lands, Villages, and Fortresses on this side the mountaine Taurus unto the River Tanais; and moreover from the foot and valley under the said hill, unto that ridge thereof which bendeth toward Lycaonia. Item, Out of those Towns, territories, and Cattles which he is to void, he shall carry away no armament: and if he have conveyed from thence any already, he shall duly restore the same to every place accordingly. Item, He shall receive neither foes nor any other perison out of the Kingdom of Eumenes, Item, If any citizens belonging to those Cities which are inhabited and cut off from out of his realm, chance to remain now with him they shall return all to Apamea within a certain day. Item, As many as appertain to the Kingdom of Antiochus and are now with the Romans or their allies, may depart home or carry with them their pleasure. Item, All flowing, whether they be captives or taken captive in war: likewise all other persons free of condition before, and afterwards either taken prisoners or revolted, he shall deliver again to the Romans and their allies. Item, He shall make delivery of all his Elephants, and shall provide him of no more hereafter. Item, He shall yield up all his Gal- leries of war, with the tackling to them belonging: neither shall he keep above ten small vessels, and none of them shall have more than thirty oars to guide and row them; nor to much as one Galley with a finge bank of oars, to serve in any war that himself shall first begin. Item He shall not fail within the provinces of Calcedon and Sardes. Unless happily there be some ship that bringeth mony, Embassadors, or hostages. Item, It shall not be lawful for King Antiochus to levy and wage any fojourners out of those nations which are subject to the people of Rome: no, nor to entertain so much as voluntaries from thence. Item, What houses and edifices belonging to the Rhodians and their allies, are now within the confines of the realm of Antiochus, shall return to the the said Rhodians and their associates, in a flood estate and terror as they were before the war began. And if any moeny or debts be to them due they may demand not recover the same. If any of them that have good law and right to recover, own, demand, and challenge it again. If any of those cities which ought to be rendered, be held by those unto whom Antiochus hath committed them, he shall withdraw the garrisons from thence, and take order that they be surrendered accordingly. He shall pay within twelve years by even portions, 1,200 Attic talents of good and lawful silver: provided, that every talent weigh no less than eighty pound after Roman pole: besides 3,000,000 modii of wheat. He shall pay unto King Eumenes 350 talents within five years: and for corn according to the rate and proportion 1,27 talents. He shall send unto the Romans 20 hostages, and change them for others every three years: provided, that they be not under 18 years of age, nor above 45. If any of those cities of Rome, begin of their own motion to make war upon King Antiochus, it shall be lawful for him to revenge himself, and all the forces means to withstand their violence; yet fo, as he hold no city in right of war, nor receive any into amity; and all controversies which shall arise between them shall be decided by law and justice, or if both parties be so pleased they shall try the issue by force of arms. It was comprised also within the covenants of this accord, that he should deliver into the Romans hands, Acmab the Carthaginian, Thoas the Aegy-itian, Mastmarcht the Acrisanian, Eubulus likewise and Philo the Chalcidians. Finally, if ought hereafter haped to be added moreover, or changed otherwise, the same in no case to prejudice anything contained within the covenants aforesaid. To this accord the Constil swears and receives the Kings oath likewise there was sent unto him Q. M. Minmus Theron and L. Menslins, he which forsook it that time to return from the Orosadians, And the Col. wrote his letters to Q. Fab. Lares Admiral of the fleet, presently to come to Patara, and what ships fewer of the Kings were there, to shew them in pieces, and make a light fire of them. So he departed from Ephesus, and either brake into fitters or burnt, so covered ships belonging to the King. In the same voyage and exploit he surprized and won Telmessus, by reason that the Townsman were so aflighted at the sudden coming of the fleet, Then forthwith he departed out of Lycia, and having given order to those that were left behind at Ephesus to follow after, he crossed the Seas (between the Ilands) over into Greece. After he had journeyed some few days at Athens, until the ships from Ephesus were entred into the harbor of Pyramus, they came thence he brought back his whole armado to Italy. Q. Maslins having received (among other things which were to be yielded up ofAntiochus) the Elephants also, and beleft them all freely upon Eumenes, gave audience to the controversies of many Cities and States, amongst whom (during these changes and alterations) there arose sundry troubles and much variance. And Antarctas the King, who by the means and mediation of Eumenes (unto whom about that time he had adopted his daughter in marriage) was discharged and had an acquittance for the one moiety of the money imposed upon him entred into amity with the people of Rome. When the differences of the Cities aforesaid were debated and known, the ten Commissioners set down an order between them, respectively to their condition. To as many as had been tributaries to King Antiochus, and yet sided with the people of Rome in affection, they granted franchise and immunity: but as many as took part with Antiochus, or were tributaries into King Antiochus, those were commanded to pay their customs and duties to King Eumenes. Moreover, they freed and exempted from all task and tollage (expressly by name) the Coo- lophonians inhabiting Notium, together with the Cymeans and the Milefians. Unto the Chazoe- nicians (over and besides the same freedom) they gave the land Dryamata. To the Milefians also the territory called Sacer: to the Titans, they annexed Rhetaea and Gergitha: not so much for any fresh and late defects, as in memorial of their ancient beginning and foundation; which was the cause also that they set D. trada. Seals. The man, the Chians, Smyreans, and Erythraens, for their singular loyalty and devoir which they shewed in that war they not only inowd with fair and territories but also grasped with all kind of honor and reputation above the rest. Moreover, the Phegeans had both their own lands restored unto them which they enjoyed before the war, and also liberty to live under their ancient laws. As for the Rhodians, they had those things now confirmed and established unto them, which by a former decree were granted: and to better their estate, Lycia and Caia were bestowed upon them, as far as the River Meander, all fave the City Telsessus. Unto the dominion of King Eumenes, they laid Chastges in Europe and Asia, with all the Cities, Villages, and Lands thereto belonging, in as large terms and ample manner as Antiochus held the name talfo within Asia, the one and the other Perghis, as well that which confineth upon Health, as the other which they call the Greater. Moreover, they restored unto him Mytra, which King Pergyes had taken from him: over and besides, Lycia, Myr- vies, and Luqui: together with their Cities by special name. Telmessus, Ephesus, and Telmessus. As touching Pamphilis: some debate there was between the Agents of Eumenes and the Embassadors for Antiochus, because one part thereof is坐下 on this side the mounf Taurus, and the other lyeth beyond. The decision of this controversy was wholly referred to the arbitration of the Senat. Maslins having left down their covenants and decrees, departed with the ten Legates and all his army toward Hell Spis: and when he had toled the Princes of the Gauls thither to repair before him he declared unto them in what terms, and under what conditions they should enter into peace with Eumenes; therewith he gave them warning, to leave their manner of in roding and roving in hostile wise by force of arms: and to contain themselves within the precincts and

bounds of their own territories. After this, having gathered into one place all the vessels from the sea coasts, together with the entire flote of King Eumenes, which by his brother Athenus was brought from Eleus, he transported all his forces into Europe. From whence he marched through Chersonesus by short and easy journeys, because his army was heavily charged with prizes and booty of all sorts; and encamped at Lydianachus, purposing there to rest a while, to the end that his travelling beasts of draught and carriages, might be fresh and in good heart to pass through Thrace, which was a voyage and journey commonly feared and abhorred. The same day that he diloged from Lydianachus, he came to the River which they call Melas, and from thence the next day to Cyplia. When they were past Cyplia, they had for ten miles almost no other way, but through wild woods, narrow woodlands, and shone rough withal and uneven underfoot. For the difficulty of which passage, the army was divided into two parts. The one he commanded to march before, the other to come behind in the rearward a great distance aside, and in the midst between, he betowed the carriages with bag and baggage, and amongst them wagons and wains, laden with the publick treasure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the rear, there were about 10000 and not above, railed out of four nations of Asia, to wit, the Attians, Caenians Madnarens, and Cezereus, who beseiged the fireight to debar them of passag. It was supposed that King Philip of Macedon his hand was herein, and that they entered not into this action without his pravity and swindulent practice; who as he knew that the Romans could return no other way but by Thrace, to he was aware and will enough what a mass of money they carried with them. The Roman General himself was in the vanguard, careful only and troubled about the difficulty of the way. All this while the Thracians fast and stirred not, until the armed soldiers were past by. But when they perceived once, that the vanguard was gotten out of the fireights, and that the rearward was far enough behind, they fell in hand with the pack and carriages. The Thracians and after they had killed the guards, some of them ran and killed, and some in the wagons, others led away the pack horses and other smoller beasts with their load and burden on their backs. Hereupon arose a cry and a general alarm, and was first heard of those that followed; but Edwards of them also in the foreward & so from both ends they ran to the midle, and at one time in divers places, skirmished without all order confinedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encumbered with pileage, and more of them without any weapon at all, because they might have in theic their hands more nimble and agile to snatch & catch unto them their prizes, were by this means more exposed to receive hurt, and soon killed. The Romans again were much disordered and annoyed through the disadvantage of the ground and the waises, which the barbarous people were well enough acquainted with, and of out of them would set forth to encounter, and otherwise lurk within hollow blind caves, and nor be seen. The very packs likewise and the wagons, standing and lying unto wardly in the way, some of them, and sometime of other, (as it hapned) troubled and hindered them much in their fight. So here in one place lay the dead, there in another the true man that pursued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one part, as for the other as their hearts and courage servd or failed them, and as the number was more or less, the skirmish and fight was variable: and in one word, both fides many a man lay in the dust and lost his life. By which time the night approached, and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not to much to avoid wounds and fear of death, as lot that they had iped themselves sufficiently of prizes. The Roman vanguard encamped without the forest in the open ground about the Temple of Bendis. The rearward remained still behind in the midl of the woods to guard their carriage fortified within in a double pallisado of strong bakes. The morrow after, when they had well diff. covered by their epitudes the way before them, they joined themselves with the vanguard. In this battle (over and besides a great part of their pillage lost, and a number of camp followers and laickies plain, with some foulers also, for that there was skirmishing everywhere throughout the chafe) there died Q. Minius Thermis: and a right good los there was of him, for he was a man of much value and execution. That day the army marched as far as to the River Hebrus. From whence they passed through the confines of the Attians, and to the Temple of Apollo whom the inhabitants name Zephythus. And there they met with another fireight passage about a place called Tempys, as rough and cumbersome underfoot as the former. But for as much as there were no woods about it, it yeelded no good place for ameses. Howbeit the Thracians (as people likewise of Thrace) assembled together, hoping also to light upon the like booty. But by reason that the valleys lay naked and open, so as any beaver the narrow waises they might be discovered a far off, the Romans were left afraid and troubled. For, by that they were to fight in some place of disadvantage, yet they might arrange themselves in battle array in open field, and join in close fight hand to hand. Being therefore embattled in Squadrions thick and strong, they charged the enemy with a great front and cry, and at the first shock forced them to retreat and lose ground, and afterwards to turn back and fly. And in the rout they were beaten down and killed; for even their natural waises for their vantage, empeached and hindered themselves. The Romans having got the victory, encamped near a village of the Maronitis, called Sace. The next day they marched through the champain open country, Primtus, where they journed three daies to take in corn, partly from out of the fields of the Maronitis, which willingly of themselves they confessed upon them, and partly out of their own ships, which followed after, well furnished with all kinds of provision. From this place they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and so passing through the territory,

The eighth and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A of the Abderitns, they came to Ntipet. All this way they journeyed peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the rest behind, if it were not dangerous unto them for any hostility, yet suspected still it was, all the whiles that they palled night and day through the midst of the Thracians, until at length they came into Macedonia. The same army conducted sometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and tractable, for no other cattle, but that they had less store of pillage and booty with them to set their teeth on water, and fingers on itching. And yet even then also (as Claudiuus wrote) there were thirteen thousand Thracians that encountered Mutinns the Numidian as he advanced before the van, and did over the coasts: and he, that he had in his company four hundred Numidian horsemen, and some few Elephants: also that his son, with an eleventh wing of a hundred and fifty horse, brake through B the midst of the enemies, who also within a while after (when his father Mutinus having placed the Elephants in the midst, and the Horsemen in the flanks, joined in battel with his enemies, charged them upon their backs, and put them in great fear) by means of which storm and tempest (as it were) of the Cavalry, they never came so far, as to deal with the battel of the men.

C. Manlius led his army through Macedonia into Thrace, and marching by the way of Ephesus, arrived at Apollonia, where he abode all winter. For he made not so light a matter of winter-falling, that he durst take the Sea, and hazard the passage at that time of the year. The year almost expired, M. Valerius the Consul returned out of Lusitania to Rome, for the creation of new Magistrates, having achieved no such memorable exploit in his Province during the time of his government, as might have yeilded any colourable reason of his long stay, in that he came more tardy (than the usual manner was) to the assembly for an election of Consuls: (for holden it was upon the 32 calends of March) wherein were created, M. Eumений Legatus and C. Emilius. The next day after, these Pretors: were elected; namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Sen., Sulpius Galba, L. Terentius Calpurnius, L. Terentius M. Sallius, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Eumений Curtiarius. After the elevation of the Magistrates the Consul proposed to the Senate as touching the Province and governments of the Pretors. And the LL. decreed that two of them should remain at Rome to minister laws and execute justice: other two should be employed out of Italy, in Sicily and Sardinia at two in Italy, to wit, at Tarantum and in Gaul. Immediately before they entred into office they were enjoined to call lots: and Ser., Sulpius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentius of foreigners and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicily, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius of Africa.

D. was to govern Tarantum, and M. Eumений to rule Gallia. It forforned the same year that M. Munatinus Myrtillus and L. M. Marius were delivered to the Carthaginian Emisfadors, by the hands of the official heralds at the commandment of M. Claudius Pretor of the City for the time being and transported over to Carthage, for that the voice and speech went, That they had beaten the said Emisfadors. A brut and rumour there was of a great war begun in Liguria, & which encreased every day more other. Whereupon the Senat ordained to both the new Consuls the Province of Liguria that day on which they propounded unto the Senat to consult about the Provinces and the affairs of the Common-wealth, but L. Fulvius the Consul opposed himself against this their act, and ordinance alleging. That it was a shameful indignity, that both the Consuls should be shut up and encloed within the valies of Lusitania whereas for two years already M. Fulvius and Ca. Munatinus had reigned like Kings, the one in Europe, the other in Africa, instead of Philip and Antiochus. And if (said he) it be the pleasure of the Senat that there should be armies maintained in those parts, more meet I wot, it were, that Consuls should have the command & conduct thereof of than those privet persons. As for them they range about those nations, terrifying them with threats of war, against whom there hath been none proclaimed in this merchandise and selling peace among them for sums of mony. Now if it be requisite and needfull to keep two armies for the government and defence of those Provinces, like as M. Fulvius and Ca., Munatinus Consuls succeded M. Aemilius and L. Scipio Consuls: M. Silanus and M. Fulvius also the Consuls ought to have entered in place of Fulvius and Marius. At leastwise now, when the Ethiopian war is finished and brought to an end, Africa recovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquished subdued, either ought Consuls to be sent unto their armies, or else the legions to be brought back from thence, and at length delivered to the Common-wealth. The Senat notwithstanding they gave him the hearing, preferred still in their resolution that both Consuls should be imploied in the Province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was that M. Munatinus and Fulvius should leave their Provinces, withdrw their forces from thence, and return to Rome. An old judge there was and a courtly eminety between the said M. Fulvius, and M. Eumений the Consul: and among other matters of dissonencement, Eumений gave out, that by the means of Fulvius, himself was treated Consul two years later than other wise he should have been. And therefore to work him delight and make him odious to the World, he caufed the Emisfadors of Ambassedia (who had subordined and set on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senat.

G. house. These being in place, complained that M. Fulvius had waited upon them at what time as they were in peace performed all that other Consuls before had imposed upon them and were also ready in all duty and allegiance to do the same unto him. First our lands and territories by they were piciously spoiled and wafted: then were we terrified with the欺诈 of our City, and threatenedit with the killing of our people, that for very fear we were forced to flint our gates, Afterwards we were beaured and assailed, and against us all kinds of hostility practised, by word, by fire, by ruinating and ranfackling our City. Our wives, our children, have been led and haled into captivity and bondage: our goods violently taken from us: (and that which a above all wente to our heart) our Temples throughout the whole City despoiled and robbed of their goodly ornaments: the images of our Gods, and finally our Godsthemelves plucked out of their shrines and places, and so carried away; yea, the very walls and pillars left bare and naked; so as the Ambracians have no Gods remaining amongst them to adore, and to whom they might make their prayers and supplications. As they poured out their complaints, the Consul of a mind to aggravate and heap more matter upon his adversary, ceased not to propone unto them many interrogatories (as it was collonspited between them before) and drew them on to speak many things, as if with they good will they would not have uttered them. When the rest of the LL. were moved therewith, then the other Consul C. Flamininus undertook the apology and defence of M. Fulvius, saying, "That the Ambracians trod in an old beaten way, and did do otherwise than some before them had done. For even so was M. Marcellus accused by the Syra-cutians, so was Q. Fulvius charged by the Capuans. And why by the same means suffered they not T. Quintus to be charged by King Philip, M. Acilius and L. Scipio by Antiochus Cn. Manlius by the Gauls, and the same Fulvius himself by the Aetolians and people of Ephesonia? That Ambracia was assaulted, batterned, and forced in the end; that images and ornaments were taken from thence: that other arts were done and committed, which usually follow upon the wining of Towns, think ye my LL. that either I in the behalf of Fulvius will deny, or Fulvius himself will disavow? who, in regard of these worthy exploits and noble acts, is minded to de-mend at your hands the honor of a Triumph, who purposeth to carry before his triumphant chariot the portraiture of Ambracia as it was taken, the images which they accuse him to have carried away and other spoils of that City; yes, and to fet them upon the posts of his house for a memorial to posterity? No reason there is that the Ambracians should fever themselves from the Eetolians, and do more than they, for their case and condition is all one. And therefore let my colleague shew his ran or malice, and bewray a betterd enmyty in some other cause: or if he will needs follow and pursue this forward, let him intertain and keep still his Ambracians unto the coming of M. Fulvius. And for mine own part, I will suffer no arts to pass either of the or Aetolians or the Aetolians, so long as M. Fulvius is absent, Emilsius accused his enemy for having a crasy head of his own, and for his table fetches, as being notorious and well known to all men for no better: saying, that fully unnningly he would trie out the time, and make delayes all the year long, that he might not come to Rome so long as his adversary was Consul. Thus in this debate between the two Consuls two days were spent and nothing else done. And it appeared evidently, that so long as Flamininus was in place and presence, nothing could be concluded and de-determined. Whereupon a time was spied out when Flamininus chanced to be fiek, and by that occasion was away. Then upon a motion made by Emilsius there passe an act of the Senat, That the Ambracians should have all their goods restored unto them again: that they should enjoy their freedom and franchises, and live under their own Laws: and finally might take what cutoms, toll and impostes they wold for postage, as well by Land as Sea: provided always that the Romans, and their allies the Latinis. should be exempted and free there from. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their sacred Temples, the Senat ordered that when M. Fulvius was returned to Rome, the college of the Pontiffs should have the hearing and deciding thereof, and look what they awarded and set down: it should stand and be performed accordingly. And the Consul not consent with all this, took the vantage when there were but few Senators in the house, and procured an other act of Senat in this form. That they judged Ambracia not to be restored a City forced by assualt, This done, there was by virtue of an order from the Decemvirs a solemn supplication helden three days for the health of the people, in regard of a grievous pestilence that dispeopled both City and Country. After that the Latine feasts and holy-days were celebrated. When the Consul had accomplished these devotions, and rid their confinences of scruple, and withal made a full and compleat levy to furnish legions (for both of them were defirous to have new fouldiers) they departed into their Provinces, and called all the old.

After the Consuls were forth forward on their journey the Pro-consul Cn. Manlius returned home to Rome. For whose sake the Preter Servius Sulpitius assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bel-lona. Where after relation made of his deeds achieved, he demanded that in consideration thereof, due honor and thanksgiving should be rended to the immortal Gods, and withal, that himself might ride triumphant into the City. The most part of the Legats and Commissioneris, who had been with him gainfald and denied the same, and above all the reft L. Furius Pompilius, and L. Emilius Paulus, who leaped forth, and informed against him in these terms: "That they had been sent in commisison to assist Cn. Manlius, for the making of a peace with Antiochus, and for that mithing of that accord and those covenants and conditions, which were commended and begun between him and L. Scipio. Yet Cn. Manlius, say they, endeavoured all that ever; he could to trouble that peace yet, and to have surpried and intercaped Antiochus by trains of ambush; he had ever come in his way or within his reach. But the King being a ware of the Consul's hand and deceit, albeit there was made great means many a time to have caught him by colour of parley and conference, yet avoided evermore not only to have speech and communication with him, but also to come within his sight. And when Manlius would needs have passe over Taras, hardly and with much ado could he be kept back, nor with standing all the commisioners prayed

and befought him to stay, and not to hazard himself and incur the danger of a notable loss and to overthrow, fore-told by the oracles and prophecies of Sybil to light upon them that would pass beyond the bounds limited by the fatal destinies. All this notwithstanding he advanced forward and approached with his army, yea, and encamped near the very pitch and top of the mountains, where all the water that felleth from above, runneth contrary ways into divers seas; and when he could and had no quarter there for which he might make war (because the Kings people and subjects were still and quiet) he turned the army about to the Gallicæans, against which nation there was no war intended either by warrant and authority from Senat; or by grant and commission from the people. And what man were so hardy and bold, as to war upon his own head? The wars against Atius, Philip, Ambell, and the Carthaginians, are most theft in each man's remembrance; and of all thefe the Senat was conhunted with, and the people granted their ordinance. Embassadors many a time and often were adressed before restitution and amends were by order demanded: and of all the heralds were sent, solemnly to announce and proclaim war. Now tell me, Con. Mancius, Which of all these things were done that we may call this by the name of a publick war, allowed by the State of the people of Rome, and not rather a privy brigandage and robbery of your own? But conceived you your self with this, and did you no more: marched you directly forward, and took you nothing but what was in your way; leading your army against those only whom you took to be your enemies? or rather at all turnings and windings, may, at every forked high way leading on both hands, when you were at a stand, followed not you like a mercenary and waged Civil into Atius (King Lucius, menes his brother) with the Roman army, what hand forever he turned and marched? There was not a crank and hook but you visited; there was not a corner that you left unsearched, in all Paphia, Lycaonia, and Phrygia. There was not a tyrant, Prince nor Potentate, there was not a Lord of any borough or castle, how far soever out of the way, but you had a laying to them to pill and poll them, and to pick gence out of their purses. For what business had you with the Orandois? What had you to doe with other nations, as innocent and guileless as they? Now as concerning the war, (in regard whereof you demand a triumph) in what fort managed you it? Fought you a battle either in place commodious, or time convenient? Surely, I must needs say, great reason you have and good cause to require that honor and praise be given to the immortal Gods, first for that their gracious will and pleasure was, that the army should not smart for the temerity and rashness of their chief-leader, warring as he did against the law of nations:

then in that they presented unto us, not men indeed for enemies, but very beasts and no better. For ye must not think, that it is the name only of the Gallicæans, which is mingled and compounded; for long time before, both their bodies and minds have been mixed and corrupted, and the men themselves ballest and degenerate from their first nuture. Had they been the same Gauls with whom we have fought a thousand times in Italy, and with doubtful issue, and lot as much as we won, and every foot received as good as we brought, think ye there would have returned oxe messenger from thence, to bring us news, for any good at all wise that our General there did? Twice he came to conflict with them: twice he encountered them in place of difficult advantage; mounting his army against the hill, and ranged in the bottom of the valley, even under the enemies feet: in such fort, that if they had lanced no darts against us from the higher ground, but only come upon us with their naked and disarmed bodies, they had been able to have overcome us and gone over our bellies. And what hapned hereupon? God - amery the good fortune of the people of Rome: we may thank (I say) the great and terrible name of the Romans, The freth renown of the late ruins and overthrowes of Ambell Philip, and Antiochus, amazed and astonisht (as one would say) those men with their incorporeal and mighty bodies; with wings and arrow - fist only where they were dispersed and put to flight, to alight were they. There was not a word once blouded in all this Gauls war: at the first swing of the bow and singeing of the arrow they fled away, like swarms of bees with ringing of batons. And yet believe me, even we the fame and no other (as if fortune would admonish and shew what had become of us if we had affronted an enemy indeed) in our return, when we were returned to light upon certain petty robbers and theives of Thrase, were roundly beaten, killed, and put to flight: and polled and well stript of our bag and baggage. Q. Minutius Thermus (by whole death we have obtained a far greater loss, than in Con. Mancius had miscarried, whole realm was the cause of all this calamity and misfortune) with many a tall and valiant man besides lost his life in this skirmish. Our holtt bringing away with them the spoil and pillage of K. Antiochus, was dismembered and parted into three troops; the vanguard in one place the rearguard in another, and the carriages in a third went to take up their lodgings one whole night amongst buffal, briars, and brambles, and lurk within the caves and dens of wild beasts. Are there the brave and worthy exploits for which you demand a triumph? But say, that you had received in Thrase, neither danger nor dishonor: which be the enemies over whom you would needs triumph in all the halfe? so that be alike whom the Senat & people of Rome defined & alligned to be your enemies: for so was triumph granted to this L. Scipio here in place: to likewise to that M. MMi in before him over K. Thrase 5 olo there to T. Quinctius for the victory of Philip: and so to conlude unto P. Aferius for subduing Ambell the Carthaginians, and K. Syphax, And when the Senat had ordained war, yet before they enterprised and began these high and hasty affairs, they made some doubt and pause in such petty circumstances as these, to wit, whom they should should lend defiance and denounce the said war whether to the Kings themselves in their own H person: or if it were sufficient to give intimation to one garrison or other within their fortified. & And would ye now (my masters) that all these observations and ceremonies should be pollu-contended and confounded, that the rights and laws of the Felicials and heralds should be abolished. & that there shall be no more Felicials at all, But let religion and divine service (God forgive me if I seem to blaspheme) be trod under foot: suppose the Gods were utterly forgot not of you, and their remembrance quite exiled out of your hearts: Is it your pleasure also, and think ye it meet, that the Senate be confounded no more for their advice in question of war? or that a bit be not proposed to the people, in this wise: Pleadeth it you or no, to ordain that war be levied a-gainst the Gauls? The other day, and no longer time, the Conuls were detestous and earnest to govern Greece and Asia, yet when they perceived you to be resolute and perfidious in assigning unto them both, the Province of Liguria, they were content and obeyed. Great reason shall they therefore to demand a triumph at your hands, after they have achiev’d an happy victory and finished that war, which they first enterprised upon your warrants and authority.

After this manner as ye have heard (sake Ennius and Ammius. And Manlius again, as we find in record, answered thus) or much to this effect, as followeth: Right honorable be & my very good LL, the Tribunes of the Commons were ever wont afore-time, to repugn and cross them that demanded triumphs: and I take my self much beholden unto them, for this favour, that either in their love to myself, or in regard of my great and notable exploits, they have not only by their silence given their consent for it, but also seem ready and pret to propound the fame unto the people, if need had been. But know (forsooth, whom have I (and God will) for mine adversaries, but even some of my ten adjacents or suffragauns, whom our ancients thought good to give unto their Generals in the wars as a counsel both to flill and aid them, and also to countenance and grace them in their victory? L. Ennius and L. Ammius are the men and none but they, who, they inhibit and debar me for mounting up into the triumphant charriot; they are ready to pluck from my head the glorious and honorable crown that I should wear: even those (I say) whom (if the Tribuns had hindred and empeached my triumph) I would have repented myself unto as witnesses of my worthiness. Certainly, (my LL) I had be it from me, that I should envy and repine at the honour of any man: but I remember well, that of late days when in certain Tri-

Buns of the Common tate (men of great courage and action) went about to stay and forbid the triumphs of Q. Fabius Laber, ye by your authority diverted and scared them from that intended enterprise; and he triumphed in the end. notwithstanding his adversaries gave out and said aloud, not that he had fought a war unjustly, but in reprochful manner charged him. That he had not so much as let eye upon the enemy. And I, who have to often in ranged battell fought with an 100000 mofi fierce and war like enemies, slain or taken prisoners more than 40000 of them, forced and won two of their camps: and left all places on this side the ridge of the mountain Tauris, more peaceable and quiet than is the Land of Italy, am not only truftrate and put beside my triumph, but also stand here before your honors to defend my self against the challenge of mine own Council and Suffragans, Which accustion of theirs, Conclishe (as ye have heard my LL) of two principal points: for objected they have, first, that I ought not at all to have made war with the Gauls: and secondly, that I conducted and managed the fame, rashly and with our discretion. The Gauls (say they) were no enemies of ours: but being quiet in peace, and ready to do whatsoever they were charged, were by you abused and wronged, I will not require (my LL) that ye should have the fame hard conceit of the Gauls which inhabit in Asia toasting their cruelty and mortal hatred against the Roman name, which ye know generally to be in the people of the Gauls: Do but consider and judge of these Gauls as they be in themselves simply without respect of the infamous name and odious opinion that goeth of the whole generation: O that King Ememes were here, Would to God that all the States of Asia were prefent in place that ye might hear them rather what complaints they would make, than my self accusing of them. Send but your Embassadors to all the Cities of Asia and enquire whether services were greater and more grievous, that which they were delivered from by the chafing of Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus or this whereof they are now caved by the subduing of the Gauls? Let them relate unto you, and make report how often their territories have been wasted by them, how many booties have been driven, and prizes carried away out of them, and how they were brought to so low a pass, that they hardly could find means and make any shift to redeem their prisoners by ransom. Let them tell you what they heard there besides, how they killed men, yea, and their children to sacrifice, unto their Gods. But know ye now from me, that your allies yielded tribute to the Gauls, yea, and should have paid full at this day, nor withstanding they were by you delivered from their subjection under King Antiochus. If I had not b:H rified my self the better, For the farther that Antiochus was removed from them the more prudently and outrageous would these Gauls have ruled like LL, over all Asia, and whatsoever lands had lien on this side the top of the mount Taurus, you should have laid to the feignory of the Gauls and not annexed to your own Empire & dominion. All this is true will some one say, and what of all these? These Gauls likewise once spoiled the temple at D Isph, reputed in times the common Oracle of the whole world and trust in the very heart and midst of the earth, and yet the people of Rome neither denounced nor made war for all that. Certainly, I always would have thought there had been some difference to be made between those days, when as neither

A page under your jurisdiction and obedience (that you should need to take care and regard of what was done in those parts) in this present time, in which ye have set the mountain Towns to be the bound and limit, whereunto your Empire extended, in which you gave freedom and immunity to Cities in which ye enlarge the confines of home and take in the territories of others, furnishing these cities with forfeitures & lots of their territories, punishing those with taxes and tributes: in which I say you augment and diminish realms, give and take away Kingdoms at your good pleasure: and in one word, in which ye judge it a matter that concerneth you, to provide that there may be a general peace both on land and sea. Were you of opinion indeed, that Afig might not be counted free unless Antiochus had withdrawn his garrisons, which kept quiet within their fortresses and cities, and firred not on the thought you wish'd, that your gifts granted unto King Smerdes might be allowed unto him, and the freedom likewise of the Cities, established unto them, if whole armies of Gauls might range all about and in those countries? But why and so much arguing and reasoning in this manner, as if I had not found the Gauls enemies, but rather countenanced them to be our enemies: O L., Seplis, I call you like Antiochus, and ye yourselves, into whole charge and government I succeeded, whole venue and facility withal, I besought the immortal Gods to you. I have one prayer (and my prayer was not in vain) and you likewise, P. and S.; who, with the Col, your brother and in the whole army, had the room & place instead of an adjoint Lieutenant and no more, but cried the Majesty of a Colleague, & joint companion, speak frankly both of you upon your knowledge, whether whole legions of Gauls fell not in the army of Antiochus? Tell us, whether you saw them not in the field, enthralled in both the points and places of the main battle, as the very flower and strength of the whole multitude of Gauls?

Antiochus: Say directly fought ye not with them, by which ye doth them not, & carried away their spoils, as undoubtedly and lawful enemies? And yet both Senate decreed and people ordained war with Antiochus by name, and not with the Gauls, but I tro (or else I am much deceived) within this decree and ordinance, they included all those besides that came to aid and assist him, of whom (excepting Antiochus himself, with whom Seplis had anti. led people and allane, and ye also had expressly given order therefore) they all were our enemies no doubt, who had been our haters and aggressors in the quarrel and behalf of the said Antiochus. Now albeit the Gauls above all others were compiled in this number, together with some petty Kings and Princes besides, yet I contracted accord and peace with others, (after I had forced them to suffer due punishment according to their trepasis) as far forth as I thought expedient for the honour of your Empire: yea, and I afforded also to gain and win the hearts of the Gods, if haply it had been possible, to have dissolved and reconciled them from their inbred ferocities and natural cruelty. But when I perceived that they were untractable, untamed, and implicable, then and not before I resolved, that it was high time to bridle and bring them into order by violence and force of arms. Now that I have deci-red the former point of my accolation, as touching the enterprise of the war, it is manifest that I need you an account of the conduct thereof, Whereas verily I would make no doubt to approve mine innocence, and justify the goodness of my cause, if I were to plead, I say not the Senate of Rome, but even at the council table of Carthage: where (as men say) they make no more ado, but truss up hang, and crucify their Generals if they ako, led to execution of any service in the war with bad advice and counsel, although the ill and even be never so good. But in that City, which therefore utheth the name of the Gods both before they begin, and also when they proceed to the managing of all their affairs, (because no person should come to disaster or deprive that willingly, which the Gods have once approved) and which City in the grant and ordinance either of procession or triumph, with this solemn form of words: For that he hath well and happily admide freed and managed the said publick: In this City, I say, if it were unwilling, nay, if I reputed it an odious matter, and favouring too much of pride and arrogance to vent our self and boast of mine own prowess; yet if in regard of the happy success and felicity of my self and mine army in that without any folly of fools, we vanquished and subdued to great and mighty a nation, I demanded first that due honour and thanksgiving should be rendered unto the immortals Gods and then, that I might myself ascend and mount up the Capitol in triumph from whence I determined to take my voyage, after I had conceived and pronounced my vows, and made my prayers after the solemn and religious order: would ye deny both me and the immor-tals Gods also? Yet marry would you, and why? For tothis I thought in a place of disadavantage. But tell me then, I pray you, in what ground I might have fought with better advantage? considering the enemies were seiz'd of the hill, and kept themselves within their strength and fort. I should have gone unto them, if I had been willing to have vanquished and overcome them. What? how if they had been there within a strong City? how if they had kept within the walls, and would not have issued forth? You must then have laid siege unto them, and given the assault. Must I so indeed? And how I pray? Fought M, Achelus (I believe you) at Thermopylae in a place of advantage? Why? did not T. Quintus after this manner disposeth Philip of the high Mountains, which he held over the River Aenus? In faith, I cannot yet divite what kind of enemies they either imagine to themselves they were, or would have you to take and esteem them to be. We beg, if eminent, if necessitate, if necessary with the delights and pleasures of Antiochus: what danger was it to march up the hill against them with all disadvantage? If doubted and terrible for fierce courage and bodily strength, deny ye triumph for so noble a victory? Envy (my good LL.) is blind, and can skill of nothing but to detract and delame virtues, to palpitate and corrupt the honors and rewards due thereto. Pardon me I beseech your H[...]/ excused if I have been over long and tedious. It is not I assure you, any delight and pleasure that I take to put forth and glorify my self, but a necessity imposed upon me (in mine own defence, -to confute these crimes objected against me) which hath driven mine Operation out in length. To proceed, was it possible also that in Thracia I could make myself within the forrests large and wide, which naturally were thicket and narrow? the ground plain and smooth, which by nature was uneven and rugged? Could I make level downs of steep mounts? open champian and fair fields of woodland overgrown, and rough wylds. Lay it inne.to prevent those Thracian thieves that they should not hide themselves within their inking holes and ordinarly covert thicket? Was it in my power, to impeach them that they might march and carry nothing of our baggage? Was I able to warrant that none of our labors beats out of so great a number, I should be driven and led away from their company? that no person should be hurt? and finally, that Q Минимус a brave and hardy knight, should not die of his wound? My adversaries pres-hard and much upon this misfortune, that it was our unluckie hap to lofe so worthy a Gentleman: but they never think that if they would lay nothing but apprises and conceal all, yet you should know (since the whole army is here present to testify that which I say) That although the enemy affailed us in a narrow freight, in an inconvinient place of great disadvantage, yet both of our battalions at once, as well the vanguard as rearward, compassed the army of the Barbarians buy and occupied inusting of our carriage, flew many thousands of them that very day, and within few days after either killed or took prisoners a greater number of them by far.

Well, I had not drawn a sword in Afric, if I had not seen an enemy there, yet I Pro-cornal had deferred a triumph well enough for those two battles in Afric. But enough hath been said of thelematters, and I am to request you rather (my Lords all) to forgive me for my boldness, if I have held you longer than my will and desire was.

The accumulation that day had prevailed more than his own defence, but that they continued arguing and debating in the Council-honie until it was late in the evening. Then the Senate arose with this mind [as it should seem] to deny him a triumph. The next morrow, the kinfolk, and friends of En.Machihi, laboured all that ever they could. Likewise the authority of the ancients stood him in great stead: who laid plainly that the precedent could not be found in any histories.
That a General who had vanquished his enemies, accomplished the full time of government in his Province, and brought his army back, returned into the City as a private person without the L honor of the triumphant chariot and the laurel garland. The very indignity and shame of this example, intimated the malice of his adversaries, in so much as the Senators in a frequent assem-blly granted his triumph.

The remembrance and memory of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater contentsi-amer of this that arose with a fat mittier and more noble personage. For as Valerius Maximus hath recorded, the two Q. Petili, called P, Scipio Africannus, was set to question, and set him down a day peremptoary to make his appearance, and answer for himself. This action divers men confinid diversly, according to their several disposition and affection. Some blamed not so much the Tribunes of the Commons, as the whole City in general, for suffering such an abuse: defecting in this wise: That the two chiefest States and Commons-wealths in the World were become at one time unhonorable but Rome more ungrateful of the twain. For Carthage being subdued, had bannish’d Ambitious likewife vanquish’d: but Rome a victim was about to expulse Africannus a conqueror. Others again reasoned thusly that in no State there ought to be a citizen so pre-eminant and high above the rest, that he might not be under law, and brought to answer into interrogatories accordingly. And nothing prefereth honory in a City, and maintraineth equal liberty more, than to have the mightiest man to hold up his hand at the bar. For what may be falsely committed to any man (turely the sovereign rule of the free-leaf of all other things) if he be not to yield an account of the managing of his affairs? And verily, he that can not abide to be equal unto others, to proced against such a one by rigor and force, is no injustice at all, Thus men commonly talked of contra, until the judicial day came of his personal appearance, and answer to be made. Never was there man known before that day (no, not Scipio himself when he was at the highest, either Coniil or Censor) accompanied with a greater train of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was conducted unto the common place and court of Pleis as an accused person, there to plead his cause, Being commanded to speak in his own defence, he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entered into a discourse of the acts by him achieved; and that with such a Majeity and magnificence as it was well known and confessed, that never man was praised either better or more truly than he. For with what courage and mind he achieved those his brave exploits indeed, with the same spirit he delivered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was ready to hear his speech, because all that related was for his own defence in this his danger, and not upon vain glory and ostentation. The Tribunes of the Commons his adversaries, when they had laid open certain impudens crimes committed of old, as touching his warlike acts while he wintered in Syracusa as also the riot and outrage of Peminius which hapned at Lati; they proceeded to charge him by pretensions and imputations, rather than by direct evidences and proofs, for embezzling and diverting to his proper use certain treaure gotten from King Antiochus: and namely, that his son being taken prisoner, was rendered unto him without ransom: and that in all other things, Scipio was suspected and regarded
A alone had carried the Roman peace and war under his girdle. Also that he bare a strong band over the Confid, more like, I wrought, a Dictator and abid on a commander, then a Lieuenant and assistant unto him, all the while he was in the province. Neither named he and shot at any other mark, when that went that journey, but that the same, which long before was notoriously known to Spain Gaul, Sicily, and Africa might as evidently appear to Greece, to Asia, and all to the Kings and nations of the East parts, to wit, that he was the only man, he was the chief, the head and pillar of the Roman Empire, that under the shadow of Scipio's wing, that City which is the lady of the world, was covert and protected; that a beck and nod of his head, was as good as all arrests of Senate and helts of people. Thus when they could not touch him in life, nor fall upon him any note of infamy, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle env. Thus with orisons they spent the time until night came, and the business was put over to another day: which being done, the Tribunes, only in the tines in the morning were set in their pewes within the Reffia [or common place, standing place] the defendant was called, who guarded with a great company of his friends and followers, passed through the mids of the assembly, approached the Reffia, and stood just under it. Then after an age, and silence made: My Matters (quoth he) you that are Tribunes of the commons, and ye likewise Quntes, my neighbors and citizens of Rome, upon this very day of the month it was that I sought a right bar against Amil(184) and the Carthaginians, with right fortunate and happy issue; meet therefore and good reason since it is, that to day all pleas and actions sucerate: I will go directly and immediately from hence to the Capitol and present my self before Leg. Opt. Maxs. before I undo and Minerv, with all the rest of other gods and goddeses, prefects and patrons of that temple and fortresse, to perform my humble duty unto them to salute and thank them, for that they have vouchsafed me that I should rise and powerfull means with li, both on such a day as this, and after many times besides, to perform my deair well and truly unto the Common-wealth. As many of yourtherefore (Quntes) as well may, go ye with me, and pray the gods to lend you to like governors to myself, and no worse. If I lay (and not else) as you ever since I was seventeen years of age, even to these mine old daies, you always advanced me to honors before the ordinary time of mine age, so I again advanced and prevented the said honors with good service and noble deeds. This laid, he departed from the Reffia and ascended up to the Capitol, whereas the whole assembly there assembled turned at once and followed Scipio into to much as at the febies and notaries, ye, and the very Sergeants left the Tribunes there alone, without any to bear them company but their own bondervants and the common cryer, which still from the Reffia called and cied the defendant, Scipio not only visited the temples upon the Capitol hill, but also made a perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole city to all the churches and chappells of their gods and goddeses. This was in manner a more solemn day unto him in regard of the affectional favour of men, and the estimation of his true grandeur indeed, then when he rode into the city in triumph over King Saphex and the Carthaginians. But it was the last fair day that ever he saw: and never shone the sunne in pleasantness upon P. Scipio. For after this, foreseeing envy growing toward him, and what a life and how full of debates he should have with those Tribunes, upon a longer day granted for the proceed of law against him, he retired himself apart to Laternum, of let purpQse to make default and not appear to plede his cause any more. He carried a greater spirit with him, this heart was too big, and used he had been, to a higher degree of port Scholor, then to take knowledge what it was to be accused: he could not skill to vale bonet and floop low, and to abate himself to the abject condition of those that pleas for themselves at the bar. Now when the day was come, and that in his absence his name began to be called, L. Scipio answered for him, and alleged the cause to the cause why he was away. But the Tribunes his accusers, would not admit of that excuse, replying and saying, That upon the same pride of heart, in which he avoided once before, his judicial trial, and left the Tribunes and the whole assembly, he now also would not appear to make his answer. Even so triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with those whom he led after him as prisoners (after he had once taken from them their power and liberty to give their censure and doom of him) he requitted himself that day, by way of an intersecution from the Tribunes of the Commons into the Capitol. Well are ye now served therefore (say they) and justly punished for that daies folly and rashness. For how be he elf now to be pitied by you, who was your motive and leader then, toforkeus. See how every day more then other our courage is fallen and heart abated: and dare not we now tend to fetch him (in private per- son and no more) out of his farm and home in the country, and make him to appear and plead his anwer: unto whom not past 7 years ago, at what time as he was General of an army on land, & Admiral of the Armado by sea, we were so bold as to send Tribunes of the Com. & an Edel, to arrest and bring him away with them to Rome? In the end, the tell of the Tribunes of the Combeing called earnestly unto by L. Scipio for their lawfull favours, set down his order & conclusion, that if enemies were, he excused them, and that there were nothing else but to that occasioned his absence, is he should be received for good & lawfull, and their colleagues should adjourn his trial to a farther day. It fortunated at that time that Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes between whom & P. Scipio there was some quarrel. He forbid expressly that his own name should be subliterated to the instrument of the aforesaid decree of his colleagues. And when every man looked to hear some heavier sentence denounced against Scipio, he awarded in this maner. For as much as Lu. Scipio executeth the absence of his brother by sicknes, it is good [1110] and sufficient in my opinion. And more then that, I will not for my part after P. Scipio to be excused before he return again to Rome. Yea, and then also, if he call for my helping, he will give him strict, nee, and stop the course of success against him. And as to the main point of the cause, this is my resolution, that P. Scipio being advanced to highly as he is to that pitch of honor, by his noble and famous exploits, and by the dignities received at the hands of the people of Rome, as if both gods and men had conformed to set him aloft, for him to come down now and stand pleading at the bar beneath the Reefia, and thence to have his ears glow and ring again with the cheeks and taunts of certain green heads and buffeycubs, were a greater shame and disgrace to the people of Rome, then to himself. Nay, he staid not thus with this bare award, but sealed and sent it on surly with words of indignation, telling his oiltonent for this course and manner of proceeding. And shall Scipio (quoth he, my master Tribunes) that renowned conqueror of A魅力, stand under your feet at your devotion? Defeated he and put to flight in Spain most brave and noble Generals of the Carthaginians, with their entire armies? Took be Syphax prioret, varnished he Hamilcar, subdued he Carthage and made it tributary unto us? Belie he Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus, (for it must be confessed, that in this glorious conquest L. Scipio had his brother cooperator with him) and all for this, to be troden under foot of two Petilii? And that ye should seek to triumph over P. A. Africanus? Will it never be better? Shall great perjuries with all the good defects of their own (for all the dignities and honors by you upon them conferred) never reach and attain to a strong fort and sure place of defence, wherein they may make account to be safe, and pass all danger, and wherein their old age may relt and repose, if not with worship and honour, yet at least with in security, exempt from abuse and violent outrage? The sentence it left of Gracchus (ensured with such a speech especially) moved not others only, but also the very successors themselves; who made no other rejoinder again but thus, That they would consider better what they might by their place and what they ought of duty to do. When the assembly of the people was broken up, the LL of the Senat began to sit in council; where, the whole order of the Senators (but principally the ancient and as many as had been Coniiis) highly commended and thanked Tib. Gracchus, for that he had preferred the weal-publick, before privat grudges and particular quarrels. But the Petilii were well flent and bared with reproachful checks and bitter rebukes. in that they would seeme to ride by the fall of another, and to treasure themselves with L. the disgrace of Africanus, and seek to triumph over him and be enriched with his (paulis). Well after that, there was no more words of Scipio Africanus. The rest of his life he passed at Livernum and never had mind to come to the City: there ended his days in a country village; and (as they say) he charged his executors upon his death-bed, to inter him in that very place. And there his tomb or monument was built, because he would not that so much as his funeral obsequies should be performed at Rome, (his native country) to unhonour as it was. A rare man he was and worthy to be recommended to the memory of all posterity: howbeit the former part of his life was more singular and memorable, as well for the conduct of martiall exploits in war, as the governance of civil affairs in peace, then in his latter days. For in his youth, he followed the wars continually; whereas in his old age, as his body decayed and faded, to whatsoever he did, lost much of the wonted beauty and lustre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ that wit and spirit of his. What odds was there between his former Conspicuous and the second, although ye put his Censorship to it in the balance? What comparison was there, and what semblable thing in that lieutenancy of his in Asia of so little or no employment was it by reason of his own fieldcine; and blemished withall, by the occasion of the misfortune of his son. And afterward, his return home again was no lefe unfortunate, for the hard choice whereunto he was driven, forced of necessity to abide the triall of a doubtful issue in judgment, to quit withall his native City for ever. Howbeit he alone went away with the honor above all other, of finishing the punick war, as great and dangerous to the Romans as any that ever they made. When Africanus was once dead, and his head laid, his adversaries and enemies were aloft; of whom, M. Fercini Cat. was the chief and principal: a man who was wont to bark (as it were) and rail against him during his life in regard of his greatness. And it is thought, that the Petilii were set on him, and procured through his perturbation, both in the life of Africanus, to have drawn out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this form and manner following: May it please you to grant and ordain, that true fetch and diligent enquiry be made, what sum of money were taken in prize, carried away, and levied away of King Antiochus and those which were under his obedience and dominion; and that of as much thereof as came not into the publick treasury and chamber of the City, Sec. Scipionis (the Pretor of the City) may propose unto the Senat, to know their advice and pleasure touching it; that whomsoever of them all the Pretors for the time how being, it shall please the Senat to appoint, he may sit in commission and inquire therein. This bill was first brought by Q. Luc. Memmius, who thought it meet and reason that the Senat alone (as at all times before likewise) should make the enquiry of the monies so purloined and embazed: as is aforesaid and not brought into the common chest of the City. The Petilii charged the Scipio for being over great and mighty: and as it were, as on the Senat, to carry all before them. L. Eurip. Purpurae (a man that had been Coniiis, and one in the ten commissiooors in Asia, was of opinion, that the forlaid encleet should be granted in more large & ample terms, namely,
A namely, as touching the mony not only taken from Antiochus, but also from other Kings and nations: covertly taxing herein. Caes. Manlius, his old enemy. L. Scipio on the other side stepped forth to dissuade this matter; albeit it was thought he would rather peake in defence of himself, then against the man. He complained much and the wéd his grievance, that such a toll as this should come forth now, and be set on foot after the death of his brother Africanus, the most va-lent knight and noblest personage that ever was. As if it were not sufficient, that P. Aemilius wanted the solemn Panegyric oration at the Refers after his death, but he must be acquitted al-so. Why ? the very Carthaginians are contented with the exile of Hamilcar and seek no more: but the people of Rome is not satisfied even with the death of Scipio, uncle both to his own good name after he is buried wounded and mangled and his brother also to fill the measure of B. mens malice and hatred be killed and executed upon his tomb. M. Cato spake in the behalf of the bill, and persuadéd that it might passe. His oration as touching the treating of King Amp-tiocus, it extant to be seen: and by the majesty of his authority, he diverted the two Mam-mem Tribunes of the Commons, clean away, from interposing themselves any more. When they once had renounced with their negative, all the tribes in general passed their voices affirmatively. Vitruvius. After this, Syr. Sulpius proposed unto the Senate, Whom they would appoint for this enquest according to the act Pertusius and the Law of the Senate deputed Q. Terestius Colles. This Prætor was to great a friend to the house of the Curtius, that some authors, namely those, who reproued how P. Scipio both died and also was carried forth to be entered at Rome (for that bruit the tunneth current) have written, How he went at his funerals before the bier and the mourners, with a cap of liberty on his head, like as he had done before in his triumph, and gave sweet wine or mead to all those that attended the convoy, as far as to the gate Capena. This honou[r] he did Scipio at his death, for that among other prisoners in Africa, he was by his means recovered out of the enemies hand. But it should seem rather, that he was such an en-cemy to that family, that for the carnkrd rancour and malice which he carried against that name, he was by the adversitation of the Scipios, chosen especially of purpose to sit upon & execute that inquisition. But certain it is, before this Prætor (as in his extremities, who either in love & friendship, or in hatred and enmity, kept no mean information) was given immediately against L. Scipio. Prelaments were made likewise, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Heliogabalus and L. Heliogabalus both Caes: and of his treasurer besides, C. Flurius Cumulus. And to the and that it should appear to the world, that they were all atraine of this crime of purloining and robbing the publick treasure of the common-weal in one compt, there were two secretaries also and one of his lieutenants. But thefe three last mentioned, and L. Heliogabalus before-named, were found ungilty and acquit, before Scipio had his judicial enquest: howbeit Scipio and A. Heliogabalus his lieutenant, together with C. Flurius were condemned. Scipio, for that the (as Valerius Annonas writtéd) to make some esie peace to the contentment of Antiochus, receivéd 60000 pound of weight of gold, and 45000 pound of silver more then he brought into the City chamber. A. Heliogabalus, for that he likewise detayned eighty pound weight of gold, and 4833 pound of silver: and Flurius the Quellor for keeping back to his own use 150 pound of gold, and two hundred of silver. These sums he set down of gold and silver, as I find them gathered and regildé by Valerius Annonas in his Chronicle. As for the sum of gold and silver, which L. Scipio should embalse, I would rather think that the clerk or secretary faulted with his pen in writing the copies, then the author liéd fouléd with his tongue in the first inquit of the Original. For it is more likely of the twain, that the weight of the fliver was more then gold. As also for the fine whereunto he was condemned, should amount but to forty thousand Sesterces, then arife to two hundred and forty thousand. And I am rather inducé thus to calculat, because it is said, that P. Scipio himself was required in the Senate to give his account but of such a sum: and when he had hidden his brother L. to fetch him that book of accounts, he took it of him, and there before the Senate, bare and rent it with his own hands, with indignation, that having brought into the Treasuries two millions of Sesterces, he was called to his account for forty thousand. In which condition boldness of spirit and courage, when the Quellors durft not (against the order of law) take forth mony out of the Treasury, he called for the keys, and said he would be bold as to open the coffins of the Treasury, since he was the cause they were locked. Many things besides are diverstely reported of Scipio, especially as touching the latter end of his life, his trouble and acculation, his death, his discourses, and last of all, of his sepulcre and tomb, which dwarft me, that I wot not what report to cleave unto, nor which records to believe. For they accord not as concerning his accént. Some write it was M. Navius, others again say that they were the Pettinates that called him to his aacount. Neither agree they in the time when he was troubled, nor in the yer, no, nor the place wherein he died, nor yet where he was enterred. Some affirm he ended his days and was buried at Rome, others at Litursum. And in both places there are monuments and Statues of his to be seen. For of Litursum there stood a tomb, and over the same tomb an image of his personage erected, of which late time we oue selves saw overthrowa in a tempest. At Rome likewise without the gate Capena, there be three statues upon the monument of the Scipios, whereof two are said to be of Pub. Scipio, and the third of Q. Eumanius the Post. And this difference among authors is not touching his acts and affairs only, but also about the very Orations (if to be they were the orations indeed of P. Scipio & Tibecius Gracchus), which are commonly to taken and caried about, which disgree so much as they do. For the title of the oration that goeth for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Navius, a Tribune of the Commons: but through the whole Oration it self there is no mention at all of that accusers. He termeth him one while Nebula [Knave] and another while Negator [Conferor.] In like fort the oration of Gracchus maketh no mention at all either of the Petrus, the accusers of Africanus, or of the day assigned unto him for his answer. And we must devile to tell the whole tale otherwise, it would have it to agree with the oration of Gracchus: and follow we must those authors; who write, that when L. Scipio was accused and condemned for taking bribes of King Antiochus, his brother Africanus was Embassador in Tarsici; and upon the news of his brothers misfortune, left his embassage and made halt to Rome. Where he took his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that it was told him how his brother was going to prison) and thruit the sergeant from his body, yes, and when the Tribunes themselves would have restrained him, he used violence against them, and carri'd himself in this action so, as he shew'd more kindness and love to his brother, than masters and civility otherwise. For thus complained Gracchus in his oration, that the Tribunes authority and power was infringed and broken by a privat person. And in the latter end, when he promis'd to assist L. Scipio, he knipt up his speech with these words, that it was a thing more tolerable that both the Tribunian puissance and the Common-wealth should seem overcome and forsworn by Tribunes themselves, then by a privat man. But he aggravated and enforced this one violence and execuitive outrage against him, and made it odious in such sort, that in blaming him for so much overshooting himself and degenerating as it were from his own nature, he rehearsed the commendable parts of his moderation and temperat carriage of himself abstinence, and that in so good terms and ample manner, that thereby he made him some part of amends for the sharp reprehension he used for the present. For he saith, that in times past he had redbound and reproved the people, when they would have made him a perpetual Conical and Dictator; that he had forbidden expressly, that any of his statutes in triumphant habitt should be set up and erected in the publick places of assemblies, as in the Constitution and Curia, in the Capitol and chappell of Jupiter Optimus Maximus. Those commendable reports of him, if they were uttered in an oration penned of purpose for his praise, must needs tellifie and shew a wonderful magnanimity of him, in the moderunt use of high honours according to a civil port; which an enemy by way of reproach and upbraiding him, acknowledgeth and confesseth. But all writers accord, that Gracchus, took to wife the younger of his two daughters (for the elder without all question was affianced and given in marriage by his father to P. Cornelius Nasica. But it is not so certainly agreed upon, whether the was both betrothed and wedded unto him, after her fathers death or no. As also, whether L. Scipio was true (as it is reported) that when L. Scipio was a leading to prison, Gracchus, seeing none of his own fellow Tribunes to succour and rescue him, gave a great oath and promised that he was an enemy unto the Scipios as much as ever he was, and would not do any thing to curry it with them, nor to come into their grace, yet could be never endure that he should be carried to that prison, into which he had seen his brother Africanus lead Kings, great generals and commanders of enemies, captive. Moreover, that the same day the Senate forf ented to be at supper together in the Capitol, and arose up all at once, and required Africanus to aliance his daughter to Gracchus, before the supper and banket was ended. Which epistolae being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of that solemnity, L. Scipio, when he was returned home to his house, laid unto his wife by elegant, that he had married and belted his daughter upon an husband. She then falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and charging that he had not made her acquaintance with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her child as his, brake out into these words withall, that if he had given her in marriage to Tiberius Gracchus, yet good resition it was that the mother should have been at the making of the bargain. Whereupon Scipio took great contentment and joy at this conformity of judgment in the choice, and inferred sightwises, that he was the man whom the was espoused. Thus much I thought good to relate of this worthy and noble person, albeit there is great variety of opinions, and diversities of writings in that behalf.

After the Prec. Q. Terentius, had finisht the inquisition and whole process thereof, Helfilius and Turius, who were attaint and condemned, that very day put to sufficient sureties to be bound in recognizance to the treasurer of the City, for the payment of their fines. But Scipio debarred the matter still, & pleading that all the mony which he had received was in the City chamber, & that he had purloined none of the publick treasure, was laid hold on to be had away and commuted to prison. P. Scipio Nasica called unto the Tribunes for their help, and made a speech full of true prayers and commendations, not in general only of the whole name and family of the Cornelius, but in particular also of his own house. And namely he alluded and said, That himself and P. Africanus, together with L. Scipio (who now was going to prison) had to their fathers Cn. Scipio & P. Scipio, most noble and famous personages; those who for certain years in the land of Spain, advanced the renown and glory of the Roman name, mauget the heads of many captains & armies, as well of Carthaginians as Spaniards; not only in martial feats of war, but also in this especially, that they had given testimony and proof unto those nations, of the temperat government & faithful dealing of the Romans: and in the end both of them spent their blood and lost their lives in the quarrel of the people of Rome. And albeit it had been sufficient for all their posture to maintain only & uphold the glory from them received, yet P. Africanus so far surpassed the praiseworthy acts of his father, that it was verily believed he was not born of human blood, but descended from some divine and heavenly race of the gods. As for L. Scipio, who now is in trouble, to say nothing of his worthy acts which he achieved in Spain and in Africa, when he was A: was lieutenant there to his brother Consul; he was both reputed by the Senate sufficient, without any calling of lots, to undertake the province of Africa and the war against King Antiochus, and also esteemed by his brother Africanus so worthy a person, that himself, who had been Consul twice, Censor once, and had ridden in triumph, thought not scorn to accompany him unto Africa in quality of his lieutenant. In which province (to the end that the greatnes & resplendent glory of the lieutenant should not dim the brightness of the Consul, and to drown his virtues and good parts) it fell out, that the very same day, on which L. Scipio vanquished Antiochus near Magnesia, P. Scipio lay sick at Elea, a City distant certain days journey. He detected I lay an army there, nothing inferior to that of Africanus, with whom his brother had encountered before in Africa. In which battle among other great commanders and captains under the King, B: Africanus was himself imploied in person, even he who had been the grand General in the patriotic war. Which service was so well conducted and managed, that a man possibly could not find fault so much as with fortune, or any accident that happened there. And now when the war was unblameable, there is picked matter of crimination in the peace: and it (they say) was bought and sold for money. In which challenge the ten deputies and assistance in council, are also touched and noted with corruption, by whose advice the said peace was granted and concluded. Well, of those ten, there were some that stepped forth and accused Cn. Manlius: yet to far off was that accumulation of theirs from being credited, that it did not to much as binder and delay, the very time of his triumph, But (believe me, P. Scipio his case) the very conditions of peace favour strongly of bribery and indirect dealing, for that they are advantageous, respective & favorable on part of Africanus. For his kingdom is entire and whole unto him; now that he is vanquished, he poiffeth as much as before the war began; and Scipio having received from him a mighty mafle of gold and silver, hath brought nothing into the common treasury, but averted all from them, and converted it to his proper use. Why? was there not carried in pomp at the triumph of L. Scipio (in the very sight of all men) as much gold and silver, as in ten triumphs before (and put them all together) could not be thieved. For what should I speak of the confines and frontiers of his realm? Namely, that Africanus beforehand held under his dominion all Africa, and the marches also of Europe adjoining? & gives a part of the world that is, which extendeth from the hill Taurus, and lyeth out to, far as the Parthian seas, how many not Cities only; but sparsious countries and populous nations contains, all men know right well: as also that this country, bearing out in length more then 30 days journey, and in breadth between two teas ten days journey, even as far as to the top of the mountain Taurus, is taken from Antiochus, & be driven into the utmost angle and corner of the globe of the earth? What could be have been differed of more in case his peace had cost him never a penny of money? When Philip was conquered, he had Macedonia left unto him: when Nabis was subdued, he enjoyed still Lacedaemon: and no man ever went about to call Aquitania in question for it. And why? may he had not to his brother Scipio Africanus, for whole take the envy and malice of men hath defaced and hurt L. Scipio, whereas his brothers glory ought to have grace and helped him. Would any man of famine and reason judge, that much gold and silver was brought into the house of L. Scipio, as may not possibly be raised, if all the goods he hath were fold to the worth? What should become of all the gold of the Kings? Where be those great pubb causes of lordships and inheritances that he hath made with her? Certainly it cannot be, but in that house that hath not exceeded in superficial expense, there should be seen some heap and mount of this new treasure. But what care his enemies for this? That which cannot be made of the substance and goods of L. Scipio they will make good on his body and back; which they mean to torture (vilely) and expose to commonly & villany, to the end that a man of the bell mask and quality that ever was should be shut up in a dungeon among robbers by the high-way side, amongst night theves and cut-purses, and there in the hard rocks and basefull darkness render his last breath; and when he is dead, to have his body cast out naked as the prison dore. But be it whenever it shall, this will be no greater Blot to the house Cornelius, than a shamefull reproach for ever to the City of Rome. Against all these monuments, the Preitor Terentius opposed and read the law Petilius, the decree of the Senat, and the sentence given of L. Scipio, and he for his own part laid, he could not do withall, but if the sum whereof he was condemned, were not brought into the common Treasurehouse, he knew n. other remedy nor what to do, but to command himself a condemned person to be apprehend again, and had away to prison. Then the Tribunes went saper to conclude and lay their heads together. And within a while after C. Flaminius pronounced aloud, according to his own advice and the opinion of all his Colleagues (excepting only Gracchus) that the Tribunes would not interpose themselves, but that the Preitor might do and execute his office and his authority to the full, But Tib. Gracchus set down his own decree in this form, That as touching the sum whereof L. Scipio was condemned, he would not be against it, nor impeach the Preitor, but that he might use his power according to his place, and take it out of his goods, as far as they would extend. But that L. Scipio would have induced the mightiest and most puissant monarch in all the world, who had drawn out and extended the bounds of the Roman empire, as far as the fathetfrontiers of the earth; who had obliged and bound King Eumenus, the Rhodians & to many Cities and States besides of Asia, and made them beholding to the people of Rome for favours and benefits bestowed upon them; finally, who hath himself laid up falt in prison many a General captain over the enemies, after he led them in triumph, that he I say, should lie in prison & ions among

Marcus Aemilius the Consul, after he had subdued the Ligurians, made the first or big way from Placentia to Animum, until it was not with the way Flaminina. In this book are recounted the beginnings of the us and the like life brought in by the Asian army. All the Ligurians on this side Apennine were gathered and brought under. The Bacchanales (a Greek feast and celebrated in the night season, the very solemn and nurse-garden of all wickedness, being grown to this enormity, that there was contrived a conspiracy and complex of a mighty multitude) were now visited and searched into by the Conuls, and put down with the punishment of many persons. L. Quintius Flamininus, the brother of T. Quintius, was deprived of his Senators dignity by the Consuls; so was L. Valerius Flaccus, and Mat. Porcius Cato, a right excellent man, as well for feats of arms as peace. The cause was this, for that whilst he was Consul and governor in Gaul, at the request of one Philippus Pannus, a notorious woman Ganymedia whom he loved, he slew a certain Gaul with his own hand, or, as some have written, because at the entrance of an harlot, upon whom he was enamoured, he extorted one of them that were condemned. The inviolate orton of L. Cato against him is exact. Scipio departed his life at Litterum, and as fortune would have his funeral accompanied with the death at the same time of two most renowned and great personages Annual pontius himself, by occasion that Brutus King of Bithynia (unto whom he was first fled for succour after the death of King Antiochus) would have yielded him into the hands of the Rom, who had sent of purpose T. Quintius Flaminus to demand him. Likewise Philop amen the General of the Achaeni, an excellent man, was poisened by the Messenians, who took him prisoner in war. Colonies were sent to Pollentia, Pentium Mutina and Panorma. Over and besides, this book containeth the proposer attempts against the Celtiberians; also the beginning and cause of the Macedonian war, whereof the original sprng arose from Philip, much disconsolent, that his Kingdom was emperied by the Romans, in regard that he was forced by them to withdraw his garrisons out of Thrace and other parts.

During the time that these affairs passed at Rome (if this were the year wherein they hapned) both Conuls made war against the Ligurians, a nation born as it were, to maintaine the military discipline of the Romans, and to find them occupied in all times of repose and rest from greater wars; neither was there any other province that gave a sharper edge to the valor of the soldiers. For Asia both the beauty of their Cities, the abundance of all commodities as well by sea as land, the effeminate tenderness of the enemies, and the rapacious of the Kings riches, had made their armies more wealthy than valiant: and especially under the government of Cnemius, Millius, made they were in much loominess and negligence. And thereupon it was, that finding the way in Thrace a little more rough and difficult than ordinary to travel in, and an enemy better practised and exercised to deal withal, they received a great foil and loss among them. Now in Liguria, they met with all things that might sooner and awake sleepy soldiers: the country rough and full of mountains, that much ado they had themselves to fetch the arms, and as great a labour they found to disseize the enemies, that were before posessed of them: the waies, steep up-hill, narrow, and dangerous, for ambuscades: the enemy, light, twit, nimble, and luddingly letting upon them, giving no time of rest, no place of repose and security. Driven they were of necessity to assault strong and fortress Cities, with great difficulty and danger both: the country poor and needy, which caused the soldiers to spare and live hardly, and afforded them no opportunity of prey and prizes: and therefore no victuals, victuals, victuals, soldiers boys and lackeys, followed the camp; neither the labouring beasts for carriage, took up a length in their march: nothing there, but armour and men, repelling all hope in their

A their arms, and nothing else. And never wanted they some matter of quarrell, and some occasion or other to make war: for by occasion of their brawne and penury, they made rodes into the lands of their neighbours, but so, as they neither ventured all once, nor put the main chance in hazard.

C. Flaminius the Consul having fought sundry times with the Frisian Ligurians, and in many battles gotten the better hand over them, even at home in their own country, brought the whole nation by composition under the obedience, and disarmed them: but because in the delivery of their arms, they dealt not boundly and faithfully, and should have been cast out therefore, they abandoned their villages & fled to the mountain Augustus, whither the Consul pursued them hard at heels, in whither, being disbanded and scattered again, and molt of them disarmed, they fled into the valley through places where no way leads, and overbroken and staggered steep rocks, whereas the enemies could not possibly follow after, and so passed the other side of Augustus. But as many as kept still within their hold, were beat round about and overthrown. Then were the legions led to the further side of Augustus, where the enemies for a while, defended themselves by the height of the place, but soon they yielded. Then was their armour fought for with more care and diligence then before, and they were dismarrished and stript out of all. After this, was the war diverted and before turned wholly upon the Apuan Ligurians, who had so over-run the territories of Pisae and Bolsena, but they could not be manured and tilled. The Consul having subdued them also granted peace upon the borderers: and now that he had brought the province into quietness and rest, to the end that his soldiery should not be idle and do nothing, he made a caieul of three ways from Bononia to Ariminum.

The other Consul M. Emelius, set on fire the villages, and walled the lands of the Ligurians, as well in the campain fields as the valleys, when the inhabitants themselves were retired into the two mountains Baiffa & Suismum which they held. Afterwards he failed them also who had taken the hills abroad, and fast wearied them with light skirmishes; afterwards, he forced them to descend into the plain, and there in after battle vanquished them: in which conflict he vowed a temple to Diana. Thus having subdued all on this side Augustus, he then set upon those that dwell beyond the mountain, among whom were the Frisian Ligurians, (so far as to whom C. Flaminius went not:) all those, Emelius, subdued, despoiled of their armour, he forced the multitude of them to forsake the mountains and come down to the plains. After this had quieted the Ligurians, led his army into the country of the Gauls, and made an high way from Placentia to Ariminum, as it met with the cauley Flaminia: and in the last battle, wherein he fought with banniers displayed against the Ligurians, he vowed a temple to Queen Iuno. And there were the exploits for that year, in Liguria.

M. Forcius the Pretor in Gaul, seeking in time of peace for some pretence and colour of wars, had taken from the Cenomans their armour notwithstanding they were innocent and did no harm. The Cenomans made complaint hereof to Rome to the Senat, and were put unto the Consul Emelius, unto whom the Senat had directed a commission of six and determiner. After great debate with the Pretor, they overbrow him in the action, and had their armure delivered unto them again; and to the Pretor was commanded to give over his government and depart out of the province.

After this, the Embassadors of the Latin nation, who assembled and conferred in great number out of all parts of Latium had audience given them in the Senat. These complained, that the great multitude of their own natural citizens, were removed and gone to inhabit in Rome, and there were enrolled: whereupon a commission was granted to Q. Terentius Callos the Pretor, to make search for such: and look how many of them those Latin allies could prove to have been enrolled (either themselves or their fathers) in any city or corporation of theirs, either at the time that C. Claudius and M. Livius were Consul, or after their Consulship, to force those to return thither again, where they had been entred or naturalised. By virtue of this inquisition, the number of 12,000 Latins returned home again into their own country: for now the City of Rome was overcharged and pestered with a multitude of strangers and foricers.

Before that the Consuls repaired to Rome, M. Fulvius the Proconsul returned out of Etolia: who, first he had discovered of his exploits performed in Eetlia and Cephallenia, before the senate sat in the temple of Apollo, reeled of the I.L. to judge it meet and requisit, and according to grant and ordain, that praise and thank giving might be rendred unto the immortal gods, and himself allowed to triumph, for that he had so well and happily managed the affairs of the common west. Then legislated M. Aburius a Tribune of the Commons, and declared openly. That in case they went about to passe any decree in that behalf, b. before the coming of M. Emelius the Consul, he would croisle: that for the Consul himself was minded to contradict that proceeding, and had given freth charge against him, at whom time as he took his journey to the province, that the confection of this matter should be referred wholly unto his return home. And Fulvius (quoth he) sh. ill like to much time: and when the Consul himself is present in place so, then might the Senate move what decree it pleased them. Then answered M. Fulvius and said, If men were ignorant either of the grudge and quarrell between me and M. Emelius, or with what outrageous spirit and Kinglike cholere and indignation he pursued the said country and province, yet it were not a tolerable thing and to be endured, that the absence of the Consul should both impeach the honour due unto the immortal gods, and also hinder and stay the triumph.
triumph which I have so justly deferred: that a General (I say) who had so worthily achiev'd his service, and an army so victorious, should lay and give attendance without the City gates until it pleased the Consul to return home; who no doubt of any purpose and intent put off, upon this occasion would make show half and take his leisure. But now considering that the eminence and heart-burning that the Consul bestow'd on me is so litigious as it is, what indifferrency and reasonable dealing may a man look for at his hands? who taking the advantage of the time, when a small number of Senators were assembled, caused an act of the Senat to pass by stealth, and entered it in the treasurie house, containing thus much in effect, that Ambrocia should not be reputed as a own forced by affiains, notwithstanding it were alleged with mantiles and platformes: where we were driven to erect new fabrickes, and plant other engines and ordinance of war after the former were consumed with fire; where we maintained fight about the walls, as well under the ground as above, for the space of 15 days together: where after that the frontiers had fled and gained the walls, the conflict endured notwithstanding a long time doubtfull, from morning to night, and where were slain above 5000 enemies. Now as touching the facellam committed after the City was forced in spoiling the churches of the immortal gods what a slander think ye, hath he raid of me? what a matter hath he made thereof? and how he hath informed the Pontifies and Bishops and people of a man would say, that lawful it was not for the City of Rome to be garnished & beautified with the ornaments of Synagogue &c.

The Cities won by force; but the law of war extended it to this only City of Ambrocia? I beleeved you therefore the LL.of the Senat, yes, and I requir'd the Tribunes, not to suffer me to be mock'd and abused by a most insolent and proud adversary. Then at all hands they deal with the Tri. K. Bune, some intrested him other rebuked and blamed him: but the speach of Trib. Graccius (one of his colleagues) moved him most of all others: who bade him, that it was no good precedent and example, that men should maintain and follow their own private quarrells in time of magistracy and publick government, but a shameful matter and a foul indignity it was, and much becomming the Tribunes of the Commons and their sacred laws, that a Tribune should be Proctor to other men and prostrate their actions and enemies. Men ought (quod) according to their own discretion and judgment, either to love or hate the persons, to like or dislike the cause; not to depend and hang upon the countenance and becket of others, not to be carried to and fro with the will, pleasure, and appetites of other men. As for the Tribune of the Commons here, he disordered and took a part with a cholericke and tellie Consul, and remembred well what M. Emylius left with L. him in private chesse, but forgethe altogether that the Tribunship was committed unto him by the people of Rome: committed I say, and put into his hands for to assist private persons, and to maintain their liberties, and not to uphold the Kinglike rule and royalty of a Consul. Never the less he thus much before him, that it will be written another day in the Annals and yearly Chronicles, that of two Commoner Tribunes in the same fellowship and society, one for the love of the Common-wealth renounced and gave over his own private displeasure and enmity to a particular person, and the other took charge as it were by way of Commission, to pursue the quarrel of another man. The Tribune could endure no longer these rebukes and checks, and therefore departed out of the temple: then the Pretor Ser. Sulpius proposed the bill the second time; and to a triumph was granted to M. Fulvius. Who after he had rendred great thanks to the LL. of the Senat, added moreover and said, that the very day wherein he forced the City Ambrocia, he had by vow promised, to the honor of Jupiter Opt. Maximus, for to exhibit the great and glorious Roman games. And to that effect the Cities of Greece had contributed towards the charges, a hundred pound weight in gold: his petition was therefore, that the Senat would ordain that out of that mass of money which he was to carry and shew in triumph, and meant to bestow and lay up in the City Treasury, the foresaid sum of gold might be sequestr'd and referred apart for the proper use aforesaid. The Senat commanded, that the Collarage of the Prealt and Priests in this case should be consulted with, and their advice demanded, whether they thought it necessary that so much gold should be spent and consumed in the charges of the said games? The Prealt's made answer again, that it was not material to religion and to the service of the gods, to how great a sum a reckoning over the charges of the games should arise. Whereupon the Senat permitted Fulvius to defray what he could himself. As it exceeded not the sum of 8000s. [estes.]

He had proposed to triumph in the month of January, but hearing that Emylius the Consul (who was advertised by letters, that Ambrocia the Tribune of the Commons had renounced and let fall his opposition which he commenced) was coming in proper person to Rome, only to hinder the triumph, and said by the way sick; he prevented the day, for lest he should have had more anger and trouble in his triumph, then during his war. So upon the 22 day of December he triumphed over the Etolians and Cephalens. Before his chariot there were born 100 crowns of gold, weighing 124 pound speces of silver 83000 pound weight: of gold 243 pound weight of Attick Tetradrachmans 11800: of Philipp pieces of gold coin 12422: images of brass 85: of marble 230. Likewife of armor, as well defensive as offensive, and other spoils of the enemies, an huge deal besides Catapults, Balists, and other engines and pieces of battery. Moreover, here were brought him 27 captains other Etolians and Cephalens, or else under King Antocles, left by him in those parts. The same day before that he entered into the city, he bestowed in the circus Flaminius, many military gifts upon many colonels, captains, horlmen et centuriones, as well Romans as allies. Generally to all the footmen he gave out of the pillage 25 Denarii speces: twice as much to the centurions, and threefold to horlmen.
Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for the election of Consuls, and because M. Emilius had been sent it was to be president thereof, could not be present at the time. It being seen came of purpose to Rome. By which were created Quinctius S. Postumius, Afbrinus, and Q. Marcellus Villius. After that were Pretors elected, to wit, T. Manlius, P. Cornelius Scipio, C. Calpurnius Piso, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aemilius Scaurus, and L. Licinius Crassus. In the end of the 30th year, after the magistrates were thus created, C. M. Manlius Piso, the third day before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gauls who made it Against the cause why he triumphed there was this, that he would avoid making his answer (according to the use of Eutynem) which T. Terentius Cullo was Pretor, fearing he should burn in the flame of the same lamentation and judgment whereb L. Scipio had been condemned, or let the flame of another man's judgment.

I mean the sentence whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, would have been too hot for him, and caught hold of him likewise: considering that the jury and enquirer were not convinced and provoked against him then Scipio; for that he succeeding after him, had spoiled and marred with all kind of licentious looseness, the military discipline. which Scipio had observed most perfectly and severely. Neither was he noted and touched in person for those things only which his bare heart had been reported to have been done in the province, nor removed from the view of men abroad of those particular instances to be heen daily in the demeanor of his conduct. For verily the foreign exeeve and strange flaverabilities took him ginning from the Alien army, whom brought all with them into the City. They were the first with Rome that took up the use of bright rables of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupboards, cloths, hangings and coverlets of lustrous kinds of dyue. Likewitl one of to ftanding rables, buffets and cupboards, which in those days were counted magnificent and falsely movable. Then came up the matter of having at banquets singing minken wenchs and such as could play upon the dulcimer or other instruments of music, with dancers, jesters and other pastimes, and delightful pleasures and hits of music at the table. Then began the board to be furnished and let out with more exquisite and deightful vessels, and of greater expense. Then Cooks, who in old time were reputed the most contemptible slaves, as well for calling as confusion, as for the use they were put unto, came to be of great respect; and that before times was a mechanical kind of manuall hervce, grew now to be accustomed a science of deep skill and understanding. And yet all these things therse basted so great a newe, were scarce to much as small seeds and sips, to the excessive flaverabilities that were to entice.

Well, C. Mauilus carried in triumph two hundred crowns of maitis beaten gold, weighing twelve pound a piece; of silver 43,000; pound weight of gold 193; pound weight of Attick Tetradrachms 170; of Electors 25. Allo much armour there was and spoils of Gauls carried in shew upon wagons: and 52 captains of enemies were led before his own chariot. Amongst the fodderers he gave a donative of 42 denarii apiece, he doubled the same to every centurio. Alto to every footman he gave double pay, and to every horsemanship. Many there were of all States and degrees, whom he rewarded with military presents or especial service, and those followed next after the chariot. The fodderers chanteds such songs and verses, as a man might easily see they were composed to feed the humour of a General dear of glory, and one that made much of his fodderers especially; whereby his triumph was more honored with the affectional favour of them, then otherwise recommended and celebrated with the hearty love of the people. Howbeit the friends of Mauilus loved him in good deed to win the good will of them also through holey soliciting and earnest endeavor, there pasiled an act of the Senat.th. out of that money which had been thewed in triumph there should be repaid unto the people that subsidy which had been levied among them for fodderers pay, and not yet contented back again. So the Treasurers of the City made true and faithful payment with all diligence of 25 asses and d. in every thousand [For the loan.]

About the same time two Colonels came out of both provinces of Spain, with letters from C. Camillus and L. Manlius the governors there: by which letters intelligence was given, that the Celtiberians and Lucanians were in arms, wasting and spoiling the lands of the Rom. confederats.

The Senat referred the entire confusion of this matter to the new Magistrates. During the time of the Roman games th. year which P. Cornelius Cestegnus, and Anius Poebtium Albinus represented, a certain maist or high pole which flood not fast in the new place called Circms maximus, fell down upon the image of Pollilue, and overthrowd it to the ground. The L.L. hereupon made some caprice in conscience, and ordained, that the solemnity of those games should continue one days longer, and caused those images to be put up for that one, and that the new should be all gilt.Likewise the Plebeian places were renewed one day more, by the Addes, C. Sempnus Blaflus & M. Eleius Latho. The year following avouched the Consuls Sp. Poebtium Albinus, & M. Marcellus Philippus from the army, from the regard I lay of wars and government of provinces abroad, to the punishment of a certain intellinite conspiracy at home. The Pretors left colts for their provinces. T. Manlius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and M. Licinius Lucullus between citizens & strangers. Unto C. Aemilius Scaurus tell the governance of Sardinia, and to P. Cornelius Scipio of Sicily: L. Quintinius Crassus was assigned to the latter Spain, and P. Calpurnius Piso to the farther. Both Consuls were enjoined to make inquisitions into secret conspiracies within the City. There was a certain Grecian of base degree and condition, who came hith in Hetcugia; a man not ended with any of those arts, whereof the nation (of all others most learned) hath brought many unto us, as well for the education of our minds, as the trimming of our bodies but after ficing priest he was, and a divine wizard withall. Neither was it one that made outward prodefension of teaching men, and thereby getting a living openly, and by an open show of religion possessed their heads and minds with fear and horror; but the knowledge he had fortoth for certain hidden and secret sacrifices. These mysteries of his at first he taught but unto a few, because afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women: and to this religion were added pleasures and delights of wine and good cheer, to the end the more stubborn might be allured and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when wine had drowned and dulled the understanding: when the nightfaction, when the entermilling of men and women ot together one with another (and, namely, they of young and tender yeers, with those of elder age, had clean put out and extinguished all respect and regard of thamefaft honesty: there began first to be practifed all sorts of corruption, for every one had all pleasures ready at commandment; and his choice of thame whereby nature he w. s more prone and given to lust after. Neither was there wickedness committed here, of one sort, namely, the abusing of mankind and womenkind one with another without distinction: but out of this shop and workshop proceeded talle warnefes, forging of feals, depofitions, and testimonies; and more then lo, wrong and untrue informations. From hence came the diuellish cell of poifoning, and privy murders of the nearest kindred in one house: and the same to secret, that other whiles the bodies would not be found to be committed to the earth. Now every sinful parts were there played by way of fraud, guile, and eunning coulengage; but more by spett force. As for violence, it was kept close and hidden; by reason that with the hideous noises, with the found of tymbrels, tabors and cymbals, there coulnde no voice be heard of such as cried out, when either they were forced to villany and abuse, or beaten to death.
The infection of this catching potion of Heytoria, spread as far as Rome, like a contagious malady.

At the first the impacious capacity of the City, having been use to wink and beare with some enormities, concealed all: at length revealed it was to the Cof. Posilomousus, much after this manner.

P. Eumius (whose father had lived in the wars in quality of a gentleman of Rome with a city horie) left an orphan, after that his guardians were likewise deceas'd, became ward to his mother Dorothea and his father in law (her second husband) T. Sempronius Rutialis, under whom he had his bringing up. Now as his mother was wholly devoted and obsequious unto her husband, to his father in law had so handled the matter in his guardianship that he could make no good accompt thereof, and therefore his desire was, that either the infant his ward should be made away, or else obliged and entrall'd unto him. The only way to compass and bring this about, was the corruption and abuse of the Bacchans, The mother thoroore upon a time called her son unto her, and told him, that she had made a vow for him which he was sick, that to boon as ever he should recover and be well again she would present him to the priets of Bacchus to be consecrated and professed in their mysteries: and now, quoth she, seeing that by the goodnomery of the gods thou art a-amended, and I thereby obliged by the bond of that vow, I will acquit my self thereof, and perform it accordingly. She bare him in hand therefore, that he might for ten dyes live chaste, and not touch a woman: and at the ten dyes end after he had taken his supper, and was well wash'd and purified, after the manner, she would bring him into the holy place of those fated mysteries. Now there was a famous trumpet, by condition a bond woman enfranchised, named His-pala Fegeusa, too good, I wis, for that occupation which the ufed while the she was a young wench and bondervant: but yet till after that she was manumitted and in frankfate of a free denizen, the maintained her self by the same trade and manner of living. Grown she was into familiar acquaintance with the foresaid youg Eumius, by reason they were near neighbours, and dwelt not far austerly; yet so, as the endamaged not the youth one jot either in charging his purse, or touching his credit. For the it was that frist was inamored upon him, and him the wed, and for as much as he had but thare allowance every way from his mother and father in law, and by them kept hardly, he was maintained well by the bounteous liberality of this loving harlot. Nay,more than that, in comminence of time she was so deeply engag'd in him, that when her own patron was dead, and her self at the disposition of none, she lied unto the Tribunes and the Pretor for an-tother tutor, because the meant to make her self will and testament, wherein she declared Eumius her only heir in remaining or to alith the she had. There passing this between them those egges and pledges of love, and they using to empare the one unto the other the secrets of their hearts, the yong youth by way of merry and pleasant talk, told her one day not to marvell or think any thing in it, if for certain nights he lay away and parted beds with her for that upon a religious zeal and devotion that he had, he was minded for to be professed and consecrated by the Priets of Bacchus, and all to be abiled from a vow made in regard of his health. The woman hearing him lay so, and trusted in spirit, Mary god fordend, (quoth she) and I would not that for all the good in the world. And better it were for me and you too to die both at once, then fo to do: and with that she threatened, she curled and banded, withing all milchiff and plague to light upon them that had put such a thing into his head. The youth wondered much to hear her words, and to see her so to bare and take on beyond all reason and order, and searching her of all less to be contented and forbear those curst speeches and said, it was his own mother, by the content of his fat ther in law, who had enjoined him so to do. And is it that father in law of yours, quoth she: (for peradventure I should not do well to bl. me your mother) that hathen'd you by this action of yours to make shipwrack of your honeily and alliability, of your credit and good name, your hope another day, and tally, to h zard your very life? Hereat the yong man marvelled much the more then be-

The nine and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A fore, and defired earnestly to know the depth of all this matter. Then after she had prayed all gods and goddeses to pardon her, if for tender love and affection that she bare unto him, she could neither will nor chafe but reveal those secrets that indeed were to be concealed, the first tale on end and said, "That she herself once entred into that chapel, when, as she waited on her mistress, but since that she was made free and at her own liberty, the never let foot within the door.

And upon my knowledge (qd. fie) it is the very shop and workhouse of all wickedness that can be devised. And now for certain these two years past, there is not one professed and admitted to those mysteries there, who is above 20 years of age. So soon as any one is indicted and brought thither, the or he is delivered to the priests as a very sacrifice to be killed: for they lead them to a place which renowneth with yelling and crying with finging of divers conrists, with jangling noise of cymbals, with thumping & beating of tabors, to the end that the voice of any one that cryeth and complaineth of force and violence done to the aibut of his or her body might not be heard. Now I believe you therefore, and of all loves I pray you, that in any case by one means or other you avoid this, howsoever ye do: and plunge not your self headlong thiser, where first you shall be lure to endure and suffer, and afterwards to perpetrate and commit all abominable wickedness not to be named. And never would the let the youth go from her, until he had made her faithful promise to abate in and forbear such mysteries and ceremonies.
When he was come home, and that his mother was in hand with him, telling him what he must do this day, and that day, and so forth: he flatly denied and said plainly, he would do neither the one nor the other. And at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be, whatsoever came of

His father in law was present at one end of this retortful speech of his. His mother straight-ways cried out and said, that he could not find in his heart to lie apart from Hispala one ten dazes, and that he was so far bewitched and environed with the charms & poioned allament s and建设项目 of that false serpent and pestious Hydra, that he had no respective regard either of his mother, or mothers husband, nor, nor any reverent regard of the immortal gods. The mother rated him of one side, the father baited and counted him on the other, till in the end they hunted him out of doors with a bond slaves besides. The young man took himself to Eburia, an aunt that he had by his father side, and showed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of his house by the head and shoulders: which done, by her advice and counsel the next day he oppened and declared the same in great secret, without the hearing of any earthly creature, to the Conulf Podamnum. The Conulf commanded him to repair again unto him three dazes after, and fo for that time dismitted him. Then the Conulf in the mean while enquired of his wives mother Sulpius, a brave and other matron: whether she knew an old wife called Ebunia dwelling in the Aventine? Yes that I do qd. fie, and I know her to be an honest dame, and a woman of the old world, and few her like now adays. I must needs speak with her (qd. fie) and therefore I would have you send a messenger unto her, for to will her to come hither. Ebunia at the first sending came unto Sulpius; and the Conulf within a while lerted (as it were by chance) into their company.

& began to find some talk of her brothers ion Ebunia: with that the woman eyes hold full of water, and with ears he began to bewail the case and mishap of the young man; who being spoiled of all his goods and patrimony (by those who of all others should leaft have done it) was now at home in her house, chafed and driven out of doors by his own mother: for that the honest good youth (God bleffe us all and be mercifull unto us,) was unwilling to be consecrated and admitted to certain filthy and detestable sacrifices (ifall be true that is reported thereof.) The Conulf had enough now, and was full perwaded of Ebunias, that he had told him no lie. Then he gave E-bunia leave to go her ways home, and returned his mother in law Sulpius aforefaid, to send likewise for Hispala from thence out of the Aventine to come unto her, a woman (qd. fie) affranch-ished and well enough known to all the neighbours of that street: for that I have somewhat alfo to say to her. Hispala was somewhat disquieted at this message, to think that she should be sent for to so noble and honourable a dame, and knew no cause wherefore. But after that the law the all the Conulf himself in person, she was attomed and (in manner) half dead. The Conulf taking with him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward room of the house, and said unto her, that she need not to be afraid, if to be she could find in her hart to tell the truth: and for all nance thereof, she should have the faithfull word and promise either of Sulpius (a lady of so good credit and reputation) or of himself if need were. Only he would have her to utter and declare what was ordinarily done at the grove of Similla in the Bacchanals, where they used to sacrifice in the night feacon. The woman had no sooner heard that word, but the fell into such fear, trembling and quaking all over her body, that for a good while she was not able to open her lips and speak a word: but after she was come to her self again out of this trance, and by them Heartened and encouraged, she said, that when she was a very yong wench and a bond-maid, fie,to-gather with her maidservant, was there professed and consecrated: but for certain yeares of late, and and namely since that she was affranchised and made free, she was not acquainted with the place, nor will not what work was there. I conthe thanks for this yet (quoth the Conulf) that thou denieth not how thou wert there entred into that profession; but say on and tell out the rest as truly and faithfully. She answered again, that she knew no more then she had already disclosed. The Co, replied upon her and said, that in case she were taken in a trip, & that another came forth to her face & reproved her, she should neither find the same pardon, nor have the like favour at his bands, as otherwise the might if of her self the confessed the thing, forasmuch as he who had all from his own mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was then, and was perplexed very (as it was indeed) that Eudius was a blab of the tongue, and had revealed this secret: whereupon she fell down to the feet of Salpitia; and first began in most humble manner to beseech her, that she would not suffer, that words of course passed between her, an enterprising woman and her paramour, should turn not only to carnal and importance, but also to a capital matter, to touch her as much as her life was worth: for what I said (quoth she) was but to right him, and not because I knew any such thing. Papilius hereat was chafed; and falling to a fit of choler: What? (quoth he) thou thinkest believe that thou art желаг and cogging with thy lover Eudius, and forgettest how thou - in the house of a right worshipfull lady, and in communication with a Confalon. But Salpitia on the other side, willed her to stand up, (affrighted I as she was) and wilt, both exhorted her out of good cheer, and also appeased the wrath of her fon in law. In the end after she had taken a better heart unto her, she greatly blamed & found fault with the effusity and falsehood of Eudius for serving her to, and respecting her falsely again for to singular a good turn that she had done him, and then said, that the flood's great awe of the gods, whose secrets she should reveal and divulge; but in greater fear of men, who no doubt for bewraying these matters. would be ready to tear her in pieces with their very hands. And therefore she thought Salpitia, and entreated the Confalon to take some order for her; and to send her into some place out of Italy, where she might passe the rest of her days in safety yet of her life. But of good cheer woman (quoth the Confalon) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou shalt live at Rome, and that without all danger. Then declared Hyspel the original and frill commencements of these sacrifices, and solemnities. At the beginning (pg. the) it was privileged place & consecrated for women only; & they alone medled with these mysteries, neither was the costume and manner, that a man should enter in among them: and certain holy days they had in the year, during which time, the priests of Bacchus performed their ceremonies in the day time, and folk were admitted by them, to their religion and profession, and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created priests for that purpose, in thrice and return one after another. But Patilla Minia (a Campanian woman) whom he was the priest, chang'd all, as being advertised and admonish'd by the gods to do so; for she was the first that sac'd and admitted men, to wait, her own sons Minias and Hieromenius the Certanos: she altered the solemnity from the day of the; and three days in the whole yeer, she ordered five or six month, to leave for the attendance and ministry of these mysteries, since thence time that these sacrifices & ceremonies were thus divulged, & men and women intermingled together, & the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, here is no as to wicked, no fact so filthy, but there it is committed; and more sinful & unnatural abuse there is of mankind one with another, then there is of women. If any are either unwilling to suffer this intolerable, or belie themselves more dully in the beatly action and performance of that villany, such presently are to be killed and sac'd as beasts. And this is suppos'd amongst them, the principal point and aim of their religion, to hold and believe that nothing is uns - full whatsoever. The men flanking and wagging their bodies to and fro after a fantastical fashion, as if they were diattic & one of their right wrists, seem to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the like-priests of Bacchus, with their heads unbound and their hair hanging loose, about their ears, run down with flashing torches to the river Tyber; where they dip their torch stems into the water, and take them out again light burning tall, because they are made with sulphur and quicklime: and they say, that certain men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth which: such as they bind fast to a certain engine or frame, and hart them out of fight into certain hidden caves: and those the like, as either would not wear to be of their conspiracy, or be partners with them in all their mischiefous designs, or endure against kind to be stab'd. The number & multitude there assembled, is exceeding great, and grown now to be another body of a people and among them are some noble person's, as well men as women. But now for these two years last, ordained it is That none should be there profell'd and sac'd above twenty years old, for such ages they lay to for to serve their turn, as are loonest reduced and drawn to errors, or most tryed to be forced to suffer abuse and villany. When he had thus finnish'd her information and discovered all, the fell down upon her knees again, and lay at their feet, and repeated her former supplication the second time, to wit, That he would send her away out of the country. Then the Confalon proceeded in law to place some void corner of her house, whereunto Hyspel might retire her self, and there make her a bed. So she allowed her an upper lodging in her house, and the and thors that led towards the street were flapped up, and the entrance turned into the house. Then presently were all the movable goods and household stuff of Pessina removed, and her family sent for thither, and there entertained. Likewise Eudius was commanded to go and lodge with a tenant or client belonging to the Confalon. Then when both the informers were forthcoming and under Papilius by his hand, he declared the whole matter to the Senat, And after he had laid everything abroad in order, namely, what was reported unto him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquiry, the Lords of the Senat were surpriz'd with exceeding great fear, as well in regard generally of the commonwealth, left those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret complott of mischief and danger: as also for doubt in particular, that some of their own friends or family should be accettly and culpable.

The nine and thirteenth Book of T. Livius.

The Senate yet were of this mind, that the Consul should be highly to be praised and thanked for that he had found out and brought to light such a matter as this, both with so singular care and diligence, and also without any tumult and uproar. Then they took order and ordained, in primum, that the Consul should have an extraordinary commission to make such and inquisition into those Bacchanals and night-festivals. Item, That Euhimias and Festus, the informers thereof should not be prejudiced thereby, nor come to harm for it, yea, and that a recompense and reward should be proffered to others who might give light and reveal the same. Item, That the Priests belonging to these religions, be they men or women, should be fought out not only at Rome, but in all other markets towns, fairs and places of frequent resort and convened before the Court to be and remain at their disposition, Item, That proclamation be made at Rome, and edicts sent throughout all Italy, that no person whosoever, who had been sacrilegious and profaned religions by the Priests of Bacchus, refer to any more in assembly or conventicle for those laetrices, nor yet do ought pertaining to such divine service. And above all things, that information and preliment be made of all those that had frequented such meetings or conventicles, to commit whereofome or any such filthiness and wickedness. And these were the ordinances of the Senate. The Consul, then, granted their warrants out to the Ediles Consulares, to make diligent search and inquisition for those Priests of that religion, and upon apprehension to keep them in free ward and large prison forthcoming for to be examined; also to the Ediles of the Commons to look well, that no service of the gods be celebrated in secret. Moreover, the Trumburs capital were straightly charged to let good watch and ward throughout the City, and see to meetings by night, for fear that no bare-fire caught hold of any place. To these three Commissaries or Triumphirs were five other Quinquevirs adjourned asstiffs, who every one should watch well and take charge of all the houses of his quarter within Tyberis. Then the Consul having got for them about the thousand several charges, mounted up the Kephyra or place of public audience. And when the people were assembled together, then the Consul after he had pronounced the solemn prayer which Magistrates are wont to use as a preamble, before they make speech unto the people began his Oration unto them in this wise. "Never in any of your assemblies, O Quirites, was there solemn prayer unto the gods, either to meet and convene, or to requisit and needull in this, to advertise and put you in mind, that these be the true gods indeed whom your ancestors ordained, that you should honour, serve, worship, and pray unto, and not these here who pritk & provoke (as it were) with goads of furies, your spirits and minds transported and carried away with false and strange religions to commit all wickedness and profanities, and filthy lust. Surely for mine own part I wont not either what I was be the by, or so far forth to speak out and utter my mind. If you know not all, doubt I should give you occasion to be negligent; again, if I differ over, I fear me that I shall affright & terrify you too much. But what and how much over I shall say, ye be sure it will be far les than the greatest and enoriosity of the thing requireth. Yet endeav our will we so much to deliver, as may suffice for you a giving a warning and watch-word to take heed. This I am well aflur'd of, for you understand not only by hearst, and bare reports, but also by the ringing noises and yelling cries in the night season that the Bacchanals have been a long time kept over all Italy, yea, and in many places throughout the City of Rome, which refoundeth again therewith. But what manner of thing it is, I am verily persuaded there is not one of you that knoweth. Some believe that it is a certain worship and service of the gods, others suppose it is some lackeyry and wanton pathime tolerated and winked at. But be what it will be, they think there are few or interred and employed therein. As touching the number and multitude of them, if I should tell you that they were many thousand, you cannot chule but suddenly be afraid, unless I also presently tlorh, who they be and of what quality, know ye therefore first and foremost that the most part of them are women, and some from thence is sprung the source of all this filthiness. That there are men indeed but such as for all the world resemble women, so effeminat they are, such fey, as have abandoned themselves as well to be ashamed as to abuse others; fanciuleral persons, and beaved of their wits by reason of excessive watching, pafl fience and even adomned with bibboning wine without measure, with houting, howling & crying all night without intermission. This convinitve of conspirators is yet of no great force, howbeit it gathereth much strength in regard that they mult vill be, & their number is every day more than other. Your ancestors in times past would in no wise admit that ye should assemble together at a venture and without important and just occasion, unleas it were either by raising a standard or banner upon the fortresses for to levy an army; or to gather the people together to give their voiced in elections of Magistrates; or that the Tribunes proclaimed a general congregation of the common people; or of some of the Magistrates summoned them to an open audience for to hear an Oration and wherever a multitude were thus met together there they ordained and thought meet to have a lawful government and over- seer of them. But what kind of night conventicles think ye yet there might be & namely, where men and women are met and thronged together bell mone one with another? Infaith, if ye will at what age they of the male sex are professed and made novices, ye would not only pity them, but also be ashamed and dismayed. Think ye my Matters Quirites, that young men thus professed and having taken this oath, are meet to make foudiers of? and that ye are to put weapons into the hands of such as are taken out of that thinking and detestable Chappel? Shall they be thusblained polluted, and overwehme with filthy uncleanness, as well of their own kind as others fit for the pure chaitly, for the honesty (1 say) of your wives and children? Let's harm
"had it been, if they could have refrained, and become only estimable by their own unchaste im-H purify that for which had redounded most to their proper fame and dishonour, and not have abused their hands to practice mischief, and buried their brains to contrive fraud and deceit. But never was there in Commonweal other to great and dangerous a malady, as touching more persons, or reaching to farther matters of greater consequence. For wert ye well this, that all the sinfull parts committed for these late years, were it filthy lust, crueltie cozening, or any wickednes whatsoever, proceed & sprang out of this one ungracious chappel and place of counterfeit holiness, and no other. Yet have they not put in practice all their mischiefs, which they have most curiedly contrivd and sworn to execute. Hitherto their impious & detestable conspiracy hath broken out, and proceeded no further than to particular and privat mischiefs, because they have not gathered force and strength enough to invade and oppress the Common-weal. Howbeit, the evil I encreaseth, and the malady increaseth further daily, and by this time is grown so much, as it will not contain within the privat fortune and condition of particular persons, but threateneth the very main State of the Common-weal. And inlike (Quirits) ye take order to prevent it, these night-Congregations may soon be as frequent and great as this present assembly, summoned by order of Law and commandment of the Consil, in the open day time. Now are they (fangled by themselves apart) afraid of you, when they see you thus all assembled together, but so soon as you are retir'd either to your houeses within the City, or farms in the country, & by that means leveld slaughter will surely meet together; devile they will and confult both to save them-theselves, and also to ruin and destroy you at once. Then take heed to your selves; then shall you (singled one from another, be in dread and danger of them all in general. It behoveth therefore every one of you to desire and wish that all they who belong any way unto your charge, be safe and well given. Then if either freely lust or furious rage, have drawn & baled any one of them headlong into that gulf and sink of sin, to hold such a person to be of the true, with whom he hath thus sworn and devoted himself to all sin and abominable wickednes, and not reckon him of your own retinue and train any more. Moreover, careless I am not of your own persons in this behalf, that none of you should be seduced and led away with error. For nothing is there in the world, that decideth more under fair semblance, than false religion. For when the name and Majesty of the gods is pretended to cover and colour naughtiness, suddenly there enthr into one mind a tumultuous awe, which doth captivate and possesse our confidence, for fear lest in.chastising and punishing human trespassers, we violate and offend some divine rigth and power L therewith. But of this scrupulosity discharged ye are, by an infinite number of Pontificall decrees, acts of the Senate, and answers of divine Sages and Soothsayers. For how many a time and often in the daies of our fathers and grandfathers, hath commission been granted to the Magistrats, To restrain and forbid expressly all forrain sacrifices and strange liturgies? To chafe & ba-ith all odd hedg-Priests, Wizards, Tellers of Fortune, and Magicians out of the common place, out of the flew place and theatre, ye, and quite out of the City? To search out all their books of Magick and Prophecies, and to let a fire on them? Lastly, to abolish all other order and manner of sacrificing but according to the Canon, and order of Rome? For they judged (wife men as they were) deeply seen in all divine and humane laws) nothing to forfcible to ruin and overthrow religion, as when divine service is celebrated after some strange and forrain fa-fion, and not according to the ancient custome of the place. Thus much I thought good by way of caveat to foretell you of to the end that no superstitious opinion should trouble your spirits when you shall see us to demolish and overthrow the Bacchans, and scatter these unhawfull assemblies. For all this will we do with the good leave, favour, and grace of the gods. Who behing highly offended to see their divinity and godhead thus polluted with wicked and abominable filthines, have discovered the same lying hid in darkness, and brought it to light: neither in their wisdom and providence, was it their will and pleasure, that such enormities thus detected should remain unpunished but be suppressed and extingushiad for ever. Now hath the Senat directed out unto me and my Colledge an extraordinary commissiion and warrant to make due inquisition hereto into; by vertue whereof, we for our parts will accomplish our charge according ly with all diligence and expedition. As for the night-watch throughout the City, we have given order already to the inferior Magistrats to look unto it. Likewise, meet and reason it is, that every one of you according to his place and calling, quit himself well in whatsoever shall be imposed and laid upon him: and especially to endeavour and prevent that no danger or mi-tiny arise by the malicionsnes of those that are culpable and offenders. Then the Consil commanded the acts of the Senat in this behalf to be read openly: they propounded and promis ed rewards to all informers, that either convicted and brought before them any such persons, or preferred their names if they were absent and out of the way. And look whatsoever were thus nominate and fled upon it, they would affig him a certain day to make his appearance: upon which day, if he answered not to his name when he was called, he should be condemned not withstanding his absence. And if any of their names were preferred, who hapned at the time of the information to be without the land of Italy he should have a longer term left down to come in and make his answer. After this they published an Edit, forbidding left any one should be delusive to sell or buy or partie to flight and departure, to receive, consent, or maintain by any means those that were about to fly. After the assembly of the people dismissed, great fear there was over all the City: neither was it contained within the walls, liberties, and territory only

A of Rome, but in all parts of Italy they began to quake and tremble for fear; and namely, after that letters came from their friends and acquaintance touching the ordinance of the Senat, the solemn assembly of the people, and the Edict of the Consuls aforetold. The next night following, that day (wherein this matter was thus declared openly in an audience before the people) many would gladly have flared and been gone; but apprehended they were and brought back again by the Tribunes, who had set a good watch at every gate. Many pretentions were made, and certain persons thus present, as well men as women, knew them selves. It is reported that there were found in this conspiracy of both these ones with another about eleven thousand, the principal heads were known not certain to be M. and L. Curtiuss Romans both, and by calling "not to good as Senators:" Dr. Palle, L. Ocrerinus of Faleria, and M. Cerrinus a Campana. These were the ringleaders of the rest.

B from them arose all mischief and villainy whatsoever: these were the chief Priests (forsooth) and the founders of this religion. To apprehend these persons with all speed, no pollutions were neglected. And when they were brought before the Consuls, they confessed all, and for any let in them, they might probably have been condemned; but such a number there was of them who fled out of the City, that because the actions and goods of many men hereby were in danger to be lost and perished, the Praetors T. Mainius and M. Lucinius were constrained by the Senat to give thirty days repit and delay for the pleasure; until such time as the Consuls went through with their inquisition. By occasion of the same inconvenience (for that whom their names were presented, neither made answer nor, on demand found) the Consuls were enforced to ride their circuit about market towns and places of resort, and there to hold Affilis and Seftinas for to make inquisition, and justly to proceed in sentence against the offenders. As many as they found to be only entred, and to have taken orders, namely, such as according to a certain form of words ended and pronounced by the Priests, had made their prayers laying after him (in which was contained a detestable asment and oath that they to commit all wicked acts and beattly filthiness, and yet nor with fasting had offered and done no such act either in their own persons, or in others, to which they were obliged by oath) those they left till in prison and duration. But such as were defiled with filthiness of any polluted with bloody murders such as were attained and stained with bearing false widens with lodging and follying of wills and testaments, with counterfeitling of seals, and other such oozing calis, stole they exercised with lodi of life, and the number of them thus was put to death summariously those other that suffered only imprisonment. But

D a wondrous multitude there was of both sorts the one and the other, and those as well men as women. As many of the women as were condemned they committed over to their next kinsfolk, or to some guardians under whole tuition and subjection they were that they might themselves privately at house punish them accordingly. But if there were none to be found meet to do the execution, then they suffered publicly abroad in the face of the world. After this, a commision was granted to the Consuls, for to overthrow and pull down first at Rome, and then throughout Italy, all the places of such Bacchanals unites in any of them there stood some old altar or image consecrated. And for the time to come, by an act of the Senats prohibition went out, that there should be no Bacchanals in any other city in Rome, or in Italy. Moreover, If any person made some complaint of this religion, and held it for a devout solemn, and necessary institution and proceeded before the Praetor of the City, that he could not lay away the same without prik remorke, and clog of conscience: then the said Praetor was to put the cause in question before the Senat, and if the Senat (assembled in no less frequen than one hundred) would allow and permit the same, then might the party solemnize that devotion and divine service: provided always that there were not above five persons present thereat to affit him nor any common silver to be used in the ministray, nor Offer-matter nor Priest. Over and besides, another act of the Senat there was joined unto this, and the same moved by the Consul Q. Marcius. That as touching those persons whom the Consul had for the informers and revealers of this matter, the full authority in dispatching of them, should be wholly referred to the Senat, so soon as Sp. Pobbinus had finished his inquisition, and was returned to Rome. As for Cerrinus the Campana, they ordained that he should be sent to Ardea there to lie in prison, and that the Magistrates of Ardea should have a charge given them beforehand to look to their prisoner more straitly, that neither he brate prison and made an escape, nor yet might have means and opportunity to make himself away. After a certain time Sp. Pobbinus came to Rome again, and when he put to question before the Senat, concerning the reward of P. Ebitinius, and Hippola Pergina, for that by their means the Bacchanals were diisolved, there passed an act and decree, that the Treasurers of the City should deliver unto them out of the City Chamber 100000 sestertii. Also that the Consuls should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons for to prefer a bill unto the people, as soon as possibly they might that P. Ebitinius for ever might be exempt from loundiery, and have his pension and fees as if he had accomplished his term of service by law required, so as he neither were compelled to go to warfare against his will, nor the Cenions should affign unto him a publicke honor of office. Moreover, that Hippola Pergina might have the liberty and power to make a deed of gift or alienation of her goods unto whom she pleased, yea, and spend the same, and do therewith what she thought good. Item, That she might be wedded out of her own family into what house she would her left and make choice of her tutor and patron to her own liking and contentment, as if her husband by his will and testament had so ordained and set down. Item, That she might be wedded to one of frank condition or rieborn, and that he who had espoused and married her, should should not thereby sustain discredit or receive damage. Finally, that not only the Consul, but also those there to come, should provide and take order that no wrong be done to that woman, but learn her from all harm, this the Senate judged meet and requisite to be done. All these things were likewise proposed unto the Com., and executed according to the ordinance of the Senate, finally as touching both the impunity and also the recompend of other the informers, it was referred to the direction of the Com.

By this time Q. Marcius also having finished the inquisition in his circuit and quarter, made preparation to go into his Province of L. Africa, after he had received to supply and make up his legions 300,000, and 150 horsemen Romans, besides 3000 footmen and 2000 horse of Latins. The same Province with the like number as well of horse as foot, was deducted and sent unto his companion in government. Those armies they took charge of which the former year (H. minim. 1) and M. Emmanus the Consul had; moreover, by an act of the Senate enjoyed they were to enrol two new legions besides: and withall they levied of the Latine allies 300,000 and 3000 horses 300 of footmen and 200 horsemen Romans. At these forces (letting aside the legions) it was thought good to be led to punish the army in Spain. And therefore the Consuls, which they were themselves in person occupied about the forecald inquisitions, gave commission to T. Menius to take the military, and when those envoys were performed and done as before said Q. Marcius took his journey with of the twain towards the Aprians in Legio 4, but whiles in eager pursuit of them he engaged himself into the rear and bind-plates, wherein at all times they had their lurking retreats and places of safety rest: wherein those frights and plagues which the enemies had heralded before, he was environed by them in a place of great disadvantage: where he left 40000 soldiers, with three enclaves of the left-division, and six enclaves of the right division which were all taken by the enemies. Also much armour and many weapons were thrown away: and there, by reason that they were enumbered together as they fled through the wooded paths of the forrest: neither did the Ligurians go over their charge, before that the Romans ended their flight. The Consul so soon as he was espoused of the enemies territory sent his army away into divers parts of the peaceable country to the end that it might not be seen how much his forces were emplire; yet could not he for all that suppress and thorn the bruit that was blown abroad of his unfortunate journey, nor cancel the remembrance of the overthow: for ever after, the forrest out of which the Ligurians hunted him was called, The forrests of Marcius. A little before the news of the affairs in Liguria, the letters out of Spain were read, containing lorum L. mixed with joy to wit: That C. Caetinius (who two years before went as Procurator into that Province) fought a field with the Lusciani in the terriory of Ares; where 600 enemies fell upon the sword, and the rest were dispersed out to flight and driven out of their camp. Afterward, he conducted his legions to the island of the town Ares; with whom he forced and won by greater ado than he before gained their camp. But as he approached near the wall and took no good heed to himself, he was wounded, and of his hurt within few days died. Upon the reading of the news, the death of the Procurator the Senate was of advice to dispatch a messenger (to overtake the Procurator C. Capito) as far as the port of Lissa, and give him to under-stand from the Senate, that their advice was he should make all the haste he could in his journey, to the end that the Province might not be without a governor there to command. The conqueror which was sent, within four days arrived at Lissa: and but few days before, Capito was departed and had put himself in his journey.

Moreover, L. Menius Agathus (who went into his Province at the same time that C. Caetinius went) had a battell likewise with the Celifberians in the hither Province of Spain. But they departed on both sides out of the field with doubtful victory; for only that the Celifberians the next night following disliedged and removed from thence: whereby the Romans had liberty and time both to inter their dead, and to gather up the spoils of their enemies. And within few days after the same Celifberians having raised a more punitive army, of themselves gave the Romans battell near the City Callipoi. It is not set down in the history what should be the cause why they were the weaker, considering their number was re-enforced; but soified they were in flight and had the overthow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000 and not to few as 2200 taken prisoners: and the Romans likewise were Masters of the camp. And had not Menius been empeached and restrained in this train of victory (which he hotly followed by the coming of Capito his successor in government) the Celifberians had been utterly labored. The new Prators withdrew both armies to their wintiring harbors.

At the same time that their news came out of Spain, the plates called Tavilla were exhibited two days together in honour of the gods. And after them, M. Fulvius put out (with great furniture in aptness manner for the space of ten days) his plates which he had vowed in the Etruscan war. And for to do him honour and grace this solemnity, many cunning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the first time that there was represented at Rome the play of champions and wrestlers for the belt game: then also was exhibited the prize of hunting and baiting, Lions and Panthers: and in one word, these sports were celebrated with as great magnificence and variety as the modern plays and games in these days. After all this was a certain festival in which there was much sacrificing and all by occasion that for three days it rained flames in the Picene country: and because it was reported that the lightning in divers places, and in wind and storms, had blased and lightly surged the garments especially of many,

A To the said feat there was adjoyned a supplication of one day, ordained by a decree of the Pontifices, for that the Chappel of the goddesses Opfit (stading in the Capitol) was smitten with a thunderbolt. In regard of these prodigies, the Consulg provoked expiation by sacrificing great beasts, and to they purged and hallowed the City. At the same time word was brought out of Umbria, that there was an Hermafrodite or Satr found almost twelve years old. This was held for a detestable monstər; and therefore order was given, that it should be kept out of the territory of Rome, and killed out of hand.

The same year, certain Gauls from beyond the Alps passed into the territory of Vicent, without forraging, spoiling, and using any hostility; and not far from the place where as now Aquileia standeth they set upon a plot of ground to build a City in. Certain Roman Embassadors were sent about this matter beyond the Alps; where they received this intelligence and answer from the inhabitants of the country. That neither those Gauls took that voyage and expedition by authority and warrant from the whole nation neither knew they what they did in Italy.

L. Scipio likewise about the same time, set out his plaines for ten daies together: for which he said that he had made a vow during the time of the war against Antiochus & he defrayed the charges thereof with the money contributed unto him by divers KK, & States for that purpose. Antiochus Antius wrote, that after he was condemned, and his goods, cattle, &c. &c. &c. he was sent in Embassage into Asia, for to take up certain controversies and differences between the two KK. Antiochus and Eumenes: and then it was (lith that the said contribution was made, many skilled artificers and players gathered unto him out of all Asia, and in the end, after this Embassage, he moved the Senate for these games, because he had made no mention nor words at all of them after the said war: by occasion whereof (by Valerius) lying he vowed them.

The year being now at an end Q. Marcellus in his absence was to leave his Magistracy, &c. Poetbonnus having late upon the inquisition storeaid, and with all side levy and carefully collected: that it was brought to an end, held the solemn assembly for election of Magistrates: wherein were chosen Coll. Ap. Claudius Pulcher & M. Sempronius Tuditanus. And the money after were elected for Proctors, P. Cornelius Cetheicus, A. Poetbonnus Albicanus, C. Afranius Scipio, C. Attilius Severus, L. Poetbonnus Tempore, & M. Claudius Marcellus. At the yeares end, upon the relation of Sp. Poetbonnus the Coll. & in his visitation about the enquests storeaid, as he rode along the seas costis of Italy on both sides he found certain Colonies dispelled and desolate, to wit, Sipontum upon the Adriatic sea and Bonana upon the Tufcian, & at the City Prætor (by virtue of an act of the Senate in that behalf) created three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for to enroll and plant new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tucius, and C. Rubens Temporibus.

The war against King Persens and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding, arose not upon that cause & occasion which most men imagine not yet from Persens himself for the first ground thereof was laid by Philip, who if he had lived longer, would have been seen in open action. One thing there was above the rest which flung him, at what time as the Romans imposed conditions upon him after he was vanquished to wit That the Senate laid a bari for to be enforced of those Macedonians who had revolted from him: which he depaircd not but it had been possible to have obtained at their hands, considering that Quintus in the capitulations of peace required that point entire and excepted not against it. Now afterwars, when Antiochus was defeated in the battle of Thermopylae and that both Philip & the Consulg upon the several exploits: Actius went in hand to allure Heraclea, and Philip at the same time the City of Lambes. Heraclea was no sooner forced, but Philip had commandment to levy his siege before Lamis and the town was yielded to the Romans: and this he took to the heart. Howbeit the Consulg appeased his choler for the time, in that making haste in person to Naupactus (unto which town the Eolians after their rout were retired) he suffered Philip to war upon Athens & Antiochus &c. to adjourn also and lay unto his kingdom those Cities which the Eolians had taken from the Thessalians. Now had Philip chafed 'Aminipber out of A Boeotia, and won certain Cities without any great ado. Demetrias also (a strong City of great importance, and very commodious for all things) together with the nation of the Magnesians he brought under his obedience. After this he forced certain towns in Achaia, which were troubled with the tedious variance of their principal and great personages, by reason that they knew not how to use their new liberty, whereas they had not been acquainted: he won those Cities (1) by taking part with those, who in this civil difference were the weaker, and other wise would have gone to the walls. By these means the wrath of the King against the Romans was well allayed for the present: nevertheless he created not all the time of peace to befink how he might gather more strength, and be able to war again, whensoever any good occasion should be presented unto him. He encroached therefore the revenues of the Crown, not only by raising taxes out of all the fruits of the earth, and letting import and customs upon all merchandise brought into his Realm by sea from foreign parts; but also revived the rents & issues of the old mines which had discontinued, yes & in many places ordained new.

Moreover, to replenish his country, which by many calamities following was dispopled, he not only took order that his subjects should multiply by forcing them toget, breed, and bring up children, but also translated a great multitude of Thracians into Macedonia: and for a good time wherein he was in repos and rest from the war, he kept his whole mind, and employed all his study how to make himself great, and augment the pruifance of his kingdom. Then old matters and quarrels were renewed, which might whet his temper and kindle his anger against the Romans. For the complaints which the Thessalians and the Pheraebians made for that their Cities were by him polled, likewise those grievances which the Embassadors of King

Ennius laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he seized and held by force, were heard by the Romans; so as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not, but that which moved the Senat most, was this, That they had intelligence how he intended to be Lord of the Metoeas: as for the Thessalians, they took left regard of them. Moreover there came the Embassadors of Athemae, who complained not for the los of some part of their territory, nor that he encroached upon their frontiers, but that all Athemae, hill and whole, was reduced under the submission and jurisdiction of the King. The banished persons also of Morone, who had been chased out of the City by the Kings garrion (for that they stood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Morone was in the hands of Philip, but the City of Aces also. Like wife there came Embassadors from Philip, to purge him of all these matters laid to their charge, who averred. That their King and Maller had done nothing but by commission and warrant from the Roman General. They pleaded and alleged, that the cause of the Thessalian, Pheraebian, and Magonian Cities ye, and the whole nation of Athemae, was together with Amandine, was all one with the Thebians, namely: That after Actebe, the King was chased and expelled, the Col, himself being employed and occupied in besieging the City of Athoia, sent Philip for to recover the States abovenamed, which being vanquished in war, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senat, because they would not determine and let down anything in the absence of the King, sent three Delegates or Commissioners to decide these controversies, viz., Q. Caecilius Metellus

M., Marcus Tullius Cicero, and T. Sempronius. Upon whole arrival there was published a general

Diet of all those States that were at difference with the King to be helden at Tempa in Thessaly.

When they were all met there in council, the Roman Legates, as umpires and judges, the Thessalians, Per-rachians, and Athemans as plaintiffs and accusers, and Philip as defendant to hear and receive the challenges and accusations against him; the chief Embassadors from the said Cities, pleaded against Philip bitterly or mildly, more or less, according to the several disposition of their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bare to him.

Now all the question and debate touching Philip, Philopoemen, Thracian, Phthia, Eurytia, and other towns about them was this: Whether those pieces, considering the Thessalians won and held them by force (well known it was that Philip had taken them from the Thessalians) belonged in right to the Thessalians, or appertained of old time to the Thessalians; for Actebe had granted them due to the K., upon these conditions, namely, if they were any of the appurtenances of the Thessalians, and if they combined and took part with the Thebians willingly of their own accord and not by contraint and force of arms. Upon like terms stood the controversy of the Perachian and Magne-tion. For the Thesalian had brought a cause in all their tenures, by reason that they held and possest those Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions, besides their substantial point properly to be decided the Thessalians came in with their complaints also: For that those towns (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them, yet) he should render them spoilt, sick and desolate. For over and besides those who were carried by casuality of war, Philip had carried away into Macedony 500 even the principal flower of their youth, and abused them like slaves in putting them to base ministr nies and servile drudgery, and look whatsoever by compulsion he redelected to the Thessalians, he had taken order afore that they should be good for nothing. As for example (say they) Thbes in Phthia, the only maritime City for much traffick and merchandise was in times past gainful and commodious to the Thessalians, and brought them great revenues and immense profits. But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade and negotiation by sea from thence to Demetrias, and having got bulks and boys, caufed them to be banked and pafs by Thbes, and direct their course for Demetrias. Nay, he could not so much as hold his hands from evil treating their Embassadors, who by law of nations are inviolable.

For he forced them in ambulce as they were in their journey to T. Q. thias, by which means the Thessalians all in general were so over-awed by him, and put in such fear, that there is not a man amongst them dare open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and Committs of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are far off, but an impertinent Lord have that fitteth ever on their skirts, and pricket them continually in the sides, and will not suffer them to live and enjoy the benefits granted them by the people of Rome. For take away from them the liberty of speech once, what freedom have they left? And even at this present, for all the assurance and confidence they have in the privilege of Embassadors they rather sigh and groan on their words, than speak frankly, and parlly with liberty. And unless the Romans provide better in some good fort, that both the Greeks remaining in Macedony, may be void of fear, and Philip also curb'd and kept short for being bold, it would be too great an imposition, that either he was vanquished, or they enfranchised, He is therefore to be holden with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and unruly horse, that will not be ruled with a gentle bridle. In this sharp and eager manner dealt the last, whereas the former had used fair language to appease and mollify his anger, beleeching his grace to pardom them in cafe they provoke their minds for their liberty, to lay down the rigor of a Lord and

Maller to bear himself like a kind ally and loving friend, & to take example of the Romans, and them to imitate, who chose rather to gain associats by love, than constrain them by fear. After the audience given to the Thessalians, the Perachians came in place and alleged that Commodus-

A City which Philip named Olympia belonged in right to PerrhaBes & called it, they were, that it might be restored unto them. They demanded also to have Amenas and Eretrium again.

Then the Athenians put in, and spoke for their liberty, and to have the forts of Acteae and Potium rendered unto them. Philip because he would seem more like a plaintiff than a defendant, and to accite rather than to be accused, began himself into with complaints. He found himself chiefly grieved that the Thessalians had won by force of arms the City of Leipus; part of the appurtenances belonging to his kingdom. Item, That the same Thessalians and the PerrhaBes together had forced Faras in Plevna, As for Xynus (an Attian town without all question), they had indeed laid it unto his feignory, but Parcebeus, which should be under Aristonact, by no right in the world was annexed to the Thessalians & comprised within their charter. For touching the matters (quoth he) charged upon me to odiously, namely of laying away for the Embassadors of frequening those port-towns or abandoning those: the one is a mere mockery and ridiculous thing: namely, to me to give account what have, merch. hands and mariners sail unto or arrive at: the other is, clean and contrary to my nature & that which I never could abide to practice. For their many years, he) Embassadors have never ceased and given over, to inform grievous matters against me to the Roman Generals, and to the Senate at Rome; and which of them ever to this day hath had to much a foul word given again unto him from me? Supposed & objected it is, that once they were troubled by the way as they were going to Quirinus, but it is not said with what haughtiness as to that, this manner of dealing & accusation last-voireth of quarrellers that aim would have somewhat to say, but it never so late, when they can find no matter of truth to charge a man withal. Thise Thebians beyond all measure abuse the kindness & indulgence of the people of Rome, & raging as men who had endured a long drought, they drink over-speedily pouting in their liberty, & nothing else to it, and know not when to make an end, and to break their draught. Like, for all the world to bondilanes suddenly set at freedom beyond their hope and expectation, whole manner is to break out into broad terms and alentious language and cannot contain but revile and sall at their very Manners. And, at last, in a furious fit of cholera he burst forth into those words, That the inn was not let and gone to bed for ever, but would one day rise again. This minatory speech of his not only the Thessalians took to themselves, but the Romans also confused as a plain censure. Upon these words stole some brute and murmuring in the assembly, but being in the end appeased & hinted he answered the agents for the PerrhaBes and Athenians in this wise, That the care and condition of those Cities, let in which they stood, was one and the same, namely, that the Col. Actaeus and the Romans passed them unto him by a deed of gift, as having sometime belonged to their enemies. Now if they who have the city shall also take away the same, they (as he) must needs quit his hold and lose them: but in doing so they shall to gratife their fickle, inconstant and vain allies, men of no regard, and good for nothing, do not that beloved nor other to a far better and more faithful friend. For nothing is there in the world more thankless and less while accepted than liberty, especially with them who know not how to use it & by abuse thereof will soon spill the grace of such a benefite. Then the Roman Delegates having heard the reason and allegations of both parties pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garrisons should quit the Cities above laid, and the Realm of Macedonia be confined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complaining to have been reciprocally offered from one to another there was a form and course of law to be let down which should contain a precedent and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and composed. Hereat the King was highly offended and displeased, but the Delegates were their ways toward Thessalians, to visit likewise the Cities of Thessal, and to hear their cases: where the Embassadors of King Eumenes made a speech to this effect.

If the pleasure of the Romans be, that the two Cities Acan and Maroneas shall be free, it is not for us in modesty to say any more, but advertise & admonish them to leave the same in real and no; in verbal liberty, and not suffer a gift by them granted to be impeached or intercepted by another. But if they have free care and consideration of the Cities and States planted in Thrace, yet more meet and reason it is, that thole places which sometime were subject unto Amintas, should fall to Eumenes rather than to Philip: by way of recompence for war-service. In regard as well of the merits of his father Acteaeus during the war against Philip, as of his own deserts, who during the war with Amintas, was personally present in all travels & dangers both by sea and land. And to this effect he hath besides an award of the ten Delegates passed already beforehand, who in the grant and donation of Cheronomus & Lysimachus, have no doubt given Maroneas & Acan likewise to be as dependants of a greater gift, considering the near vicinity and neighborhood of those other Cities. For, as concerning Philip, what hath he deferred at the hands of the people of Rome? What right of seigniory can he pretend, why should platoon garrisons in those Cities or far remote & distant as they be from the frontiers of Macedonia? I wish ye would call for the Maroneas, and hear what they can say, who are able to inform you more fully and certainly in all respects of the whole state of these Cities. Then were the Embassadors of the Maroneas called in: who affirmed, That the King had a garrison not in one place only of their City (as he had in other Cities besides) but in many quarters thereof at one time, so asMaroneas was palled full with Macedonians. And therefore (say they) the Kings favorites and flatterers are they that rule all and bear the sway: they and none but they, may be allowed to speak.
Speak both in Senate at the Council-table, and in general assemblies before the people: they go away with all honours & dignities, & either are invested therein themselves, or else confer them on whom they please. The belligerents, who stand either for defence of freedom, or in maintenance of the laws, either are driven their country and banished, or else a cold & blow their nails, for any advancement they come unto; & being subject and thrall to persons of no worth, stand like cyphers and hold their peace. Somewhat they said moreover as touching the right of their limits to wit, That Q. Fabius Labour, at what time as he was in those parts, conferred Philip within the bounds of the old Kings-street or high way, which directly leadeth to Pheraecia in Thrace, and in no place declineth toward the sea: but Philip afterwards had made a new castle, and drawn it with a compals about, in which he emplanted and took in the Cities & territories also of the Marianistes. To these challenges Philip began far otherwise than he did of late against the Thessalians and Pheraeblackns, and in this wise he spake: I have, quoth he, no matter to debate either with the Marianistes or Eumenes; but now at this present I am to content even with your Majesty's Matters of Rome) at whose hands I have seen thus long that I can obtain no reason and equity. I thought it meet and right that the Marianistes Cities, which had revolted from me during the time of truce, should be rendered again unto me: not for any great encrease of feignesy that thereby should have accrued unto my kingdom(though small towns they are god wot, and situated on the utmost frontiers) but because their precedent and example might have importuned much, to retain the rest of the Marianistes in their duty and allegiance. In no wise it would be grant-ted. During the Erolian war I was enjoyned by the Consul Atilius to besiege and affiance the City Lamps: and after I had been tooit out and wearied with maintaining skirmishes, raising fabricks, planting ordnance and engins against it, even when I was at the very point to scale the walls and force the City, the Consul declared and called me away; yea, and compelled me to levy the siege, and withdraw my forces thence. And for to make me some part of amends for this wrong done, permitted I was to win again and conquer certain small places and ports, rather than Cities of Thessaly, Pheraeblack and Asia Minor. And even those I, may say unto you Q. Cæcilius ye have taken from me within these few days. And now forsooth of late the Embassadors of Eumenes also (and God will) have premised upon this as a thing granted and without all question. That more it is for Eumenes to have & enjoy that which belonged to Antiochus than for me. But my judgment is far otherwise. And why Eumenes could never have continued in his Realm, unless the Romans, I will not say, had vanquished K. Antiochus but surely if they had not waged war against him. And therefore is he endeavoured unto you, and you no wiser beholden unto him. As for my kingdom, so far it was that any part or quarter of it should be in hazard and jeopardy; that when Antiochus of his own mean motion offered to buy my society with three thousand talents, and fifty covered ships of war, together with all those Cities in Greece which I held in possession aforetime: I refused all, and disdain'd his aliance, yea and I professed openly, even before that M. Aelius came over with his army into Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Consul, was employed in what part locower of the war, which he charged and laid upon me. Also when L. Scipio the Consul his successor, determined to lead his army by land to Hellas, I not only gave him leave to pass peaceably through his Realm, but also called up the high waies to be paved and gravelled, bridges to be made against his coming, yea, and furnished him with provision of victuals. And the said I not in Macedonia done, but also throughout all Thrace, where among other matters, this was not offer'd: but in consequence, to restraint those barbarous nations there from running upon them; and to keep them in peace and quietness. In consideration now of this kind affection of mine (If I may not call it a good desert) unto you, whether ye Romans in renon to give me somewhat to that I have, and augment and encrease my dominion by your targets and munificence or to take from me (as you do) that which I have either in mine own right or by gift from you? The Macedonian Cities, which you confesse to have been parcel of my kingdom are not restored unto me. Eumenes on the other side, he comes to make spoil of me, as if I were Antiochus, and (mark I pray you the devise of it) he pretendeth a decree of the ten Delegates to colour his most shameless, impudent & cautious falsehood; even that by which himself may be most refuted and convicted, For in very express and plain terms it is thus written. This Chonaeis & Hypsea are given to Eumenes. Where I pray you, and in what corner of the instrument and patent (and Eumeneus, Maroneus, and the Cities of Thrace) Shall he obtain that at your hands, and by your means, as given and granted from those ten Delegates, which he never durst to much as once demand and require of them? Tell me (if the thing be worth your much) in what place ye would range and reckon me? If your purpose be to persecute me as an enemy and mortal foe, I care not, but go on still as ye have begun: but if ye respect me a King, as your ally and friend. I beseech you, repaire not worthy of so notorious and mani-sented a wrong. This Oration of the King in some measure moved the Commissariouners, and therefore by framing a mean and indifferent answer, they held the matter still in suspense undecided, If (say they) the Cities in question were given to Eumeneus, by virtue of a decree set down by the ten Delegates, we will not change nor alter anything therein. But in case Philip acquired them by Conquest and force of arms, he should have held them as the gudement of his victory. In neither, we are of opinion. That the hearing and decision of this difference shall be referred over to the Senate: and to the end, that all may remain entire, the garnitons in

A whole Cities shall be withdrawn and depart; the next step, were the caues that principally engendered the affection of Philip from the Romans, and wrought discontentment in his heart: insomuch, as is evident, it was that the war was not entered into by his son Publius upon any new quarrel, and treated occasion, but upon these motives let unto him by his father to be pursued.

No inspiration there was there at Rome of a Macedonian war. L. Manlius the Proconsul was returned out of Spain, and when he demanded a triumph of the Senate, they allowed it him, the same in regard of his noble and worthy exploits might have been obtained, but for example it was not granted. For an order it was in Rome, by an intendment of their forefathers, that no man might triumph who brought not his army back with him unless he left unto his successor the Province fully subdued and settled in peace. Howbeit, Manlius was allowed an indistinct honour, namely, to enter into the City by way of Oration. In which solemnity he had borne before him in a pompous pageant two and fifty coronets of gold. Moreover in gold a hundred thirty-two pound weight and in silver six thousand three hundred. Also, he pronounced aloud in the Senate, that Q. Furius the Quettor was coming, and brought with him ten thousand pound weight more of silver, and eighty of gold, which he meant likewise to bring into the Chamber of the City.

This great commotion and insurrection there was of bondslaves in Apulia. L. Postumius the Praetor had the government of Tarentum, and he sat in inquisition upon a damned crew of certain herdsmen and gravers, who had conspired together, and used to rob by the high-way side, and in the common pastures belonging to the City; which Commission he followed with

C in his severity and rigor, that he condemned seven thousand of them. Many escaped and fled, but many were executed and suffered death. As for the Celts, long were they kept in the City of Rome, about the levy of soldiers, but at length they went into their Provinces.

The same year, C. Calpurnius and L. Quinctius the Praetors in Spain, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintering holds, and joined their forces together in Betium, advanced forward into Carusium; (where the enemies were encamped) with a resolution to receive the Roman armies, which were encamped together, and used to rob by the high-way side, and in the common pastures belonging to the City; which Commission he followed with and hardy legion.) fought right courageously: which the enemies, seeing that they could not o - H therwise forth to retreat and give ground, began to charge upon them with a battalion in coin-fation close together; and still they pressed hard upon them in the midst more & more in number, and even this line ranged, Calpurnius the Praetor seeing this battle dill more and in danger, est with all speed L. Quintilius Varus, and L. Munatius Fulvus, two Lieutenants, to either of the legions severally, to enrage and exhort them to stick to like men, and to make remembrance and relation. That in them alone consisted all the hope of conquering and keeping Spain; if "they never to little yielded back & lost their ground, there was not one of the whole army that "should ever see Italy again no, nor so much as the farther bank of Tagus, As for himself, he took with him the Cavalry of two Legions, and when he had wheeled a little about and set a compas with them, he charged hotly upon the flank of the foremost battalion of the enemies, which I sailed and urged still the main battell. Quintinius also with his Cavalry flanked the enemies on the other side, but the horsemen of Calpurnius fought more fiercely by odds than the other, and the Praetor himself in person was foremost of them all; for he was the first that drew blood of an enemy & so engajed himself within them that hardly a man could know of which side he fought: by his singular valour, the horsemen were mightily animaded; and by the valour of the Cavalry on horseback, the infantry also were enkinded to fight on foot. The principal Centurions were abashed and ashamed to see the Praetor in person among the pikes and swords of his enemies: and therefore every man for his part did his best, put forward the ports-enings, willing them to advance their banners, to the end that the soldiery might follow hard after. Then began they on all hands to set up a yntch and lively shout; they took their bier and charged upon them as from the vantage of an higher ground: by reason whereof they disarrayed them first, and like a far stream they bare them down before them, so as they could not stand upon their feet and sustain this violence of theirs, but fell one upon another. As many as fled toward the camp the horsemen pursued, and so intermingled themselves among the rout of the enemies, that they caused per-me& with them into their hold: where they that were left for the guard thereof. followed the fight, so that the Roman horsemen were forced to light from their horses: and whilst they maintained the conflict, the fift Legion came to second them, and consequently more and more succoured as they possibly could run to them: down went the Spaniards and were mangled in all parts of the camp: and not above 4000 of them all, fled away and fixed themselves: of which number, about 2000 (who still kept their armour) seized upon a hill near adjoining: the other 1 thousand being for the most part armed by the hands, were scattered all over the field. The enemies were at first above 3500 but after this battell see how few of them were left: and from them were won 133 enligns. O Romans and Allies, there died less above six hundred of auxiliary soldiers from out of the Province, about 150. Five martall Tribunes were lost, and certain Roman Gentlemen, whose death especially, made it seem a bloody vict'ry, After which the army above within the enemies camp for that themselves had no time to fortifie thier own.

The next morning, C. Calpurnius in an open audience, highly praised the horsemen, and rewarded them with rich harness and trappings decl.ing aloud, That by means of their good service principally the enemies were discomfited and their camp forced. As for Quintinius the other Prae-tor, he bestowed upon his men of arms, small chains and buttons of gold. The Centurions M likewise of both armies received gifts at theirs hands, and namely, those who fought in the main battell.

The Consuls having finished the levy of soldiers, and accomplished all things requisite to be done in Rome, led the army to their Province of Liguria. Sempronius departed from Pisa, and made a journey against the Apuan Lignarians; whereby, waiting their territories and burning their towns and fortresses, he made way into the forest and opened the passages as far as to the river Maxent and the port of Luna. The enemies took a certain mount (an ancient hold) where their ancestors sometimes had fixt themselves: but from thence they were by force dispossessed, by rea-on that the Romans overcame the difficulties of the avenues therto. Ap. Claudius likewise for his part, was equal in valour and good fortune to his Colleague, as having fought certain properate battles, with the Ligurian Enemies. He forced besides six towns of theirs, and took many thousands of prisoners within them. Of the chief authors of that rebellion, he caused three and four to lose their heads.

Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for election of Magistrates at Rome: and albeit Sempronius his lot it was to hold the laid assembly, yet Claudius returned first to Rome, becau-e P. Claudius his brother made suit to be Consul, He had for his competitors, L. Emilius Q. Fabius Labo, and Servius Silvius Galba all four of the Nobility. Old factors they were all, and becaus'e they had suffered the repulse aforetime, they renewed the suit for this dignity, as being so much the rather due, because it had been once denied them. And this was the cause that these four followed & pressed the harder for to obtain the same, because it was not lawful for any more than one of the Patricians to be created Cons, There were also of the Commoners certain persons well beloved and of good reputation that stood in election for the place, to wit L. Porcius, Q. Terentius Calveo, and C. Gabinius Tampullius; they also had taken repulse beforetime, and were put off still in hope one day yet to obtain that honourable dignity. Claudius of them all was only the new Competitor. Now men thought verily without any doubt & question, yea and defined in their consciences, Q. Fabius Labo, and L. Porcius Licinius to be Consuls, But Claudius, the Consul,

A together with his brother besmirched himself, and without his fellow attending upon him, traveled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place; notwithstanding the adversities of the Senate, and the consent of the Senators cried out upon him, and laid. That he ought to conduct and remember rather that he was the Son of Rome, than brother to P. Claudius, why then fast he not still in the Tribunal either as judge and president, and the court assembled, or else as a beholder and spectator only, without saying any word himself? Howbeit, he could not possibly be reclaimed from this disorderly affection of his which swayed him in labouring for his brother. This election was divers times also troubled with the great debates and contentions caused by the Tribunes of the Commons: whilst some of them faked against the Col, others again maintained his first, and took part with him. But in the end, Fadini took the field, and Appius went away with the game for his brother, so P. Claudius Pecteur was created Col, beyond his own hope, and more than others looked for. L. Portius Lictor held his own, and obtained the seat; and in his course it that the Commoners were moderated to work, &dewid so much affection and forrible means as Claudius did. After this, was holden the election of Praetors. And when there were, C. Decimini Flavus, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Claudius, Q. Nasor Naso, P. Sempronius Blafus, and A. Terentius Varro. Thus much concerning the acts achieved both in the home in the City, and abroad in the war, that year wherein Appius Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls.

In the beginning of the next year, in which P. Claudius and L. Portius bare the Conspirihip, when as Q. Caecilius, M. Fabius, and T. Sempronius (who had been sent to hear and decide the controversies between the two Kings, Philip and Eumenes, and the States of the East) had made report of their embassages: they permitted likewise the Embassadors of the said Princes and Cities, to enter into the Senate, who related the fall-time things again, which had been alluded before in the presence of the foresaid Legats in Greece. After this, the Senate addressed another new embassage into Macedonia and Greece, whereby Appius Claudius was the chief to visit and see, whether the Cities adhered or adhered to the Rhodians, Thessalians, and Peribabians were delivered unto them according, and to look that all the sea-coast of Thrace, were freed from the subjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoyed moreover to go into Peloponnesus, from whence the former embassie was departed in more doubtfull terms than if they had never gone thither. For over and besides other things they were sent away without any answer for their dispatch: and also they requelled the Achaian: for to assemble their general Diet, they might not obtain it. For which, when as Q. Caecilius found himself discontend, and gravely he complained, and the Macedonians withall made pitious mean, that the walls of their City were demolished and rated, their common people lend away in captivity into Achaea, and there held, and the laws of Lynceus taken from them, under which their City and Common-wealth until that day had been maintained and governed: the Achaian excused themselves most of all for the impertinency of refusing to hold a Council: and to that purpose they rehearsed a Law and Ordinance, whereby they were forbidden expressly to call and publish a Diet, unless it were in the cause of levyng war and contriving of peace, upon occasion that any embassadors came directly unto them from the Senate of Rome with letters, or commission in writing. But for that this matter of excite should not serve their turn again afterwards, the Senate gave them plainly to understand, that they ought to take care and order that the Roman Embassadors might at all times have means of free access to their Councils, like as they also reciprocally should have a Senate held for their fakes, as often as they would themselves.

After those embassages were departed, Philip was advertised by his Embassadors, that there was no remedy but he must abandon those Cities, and withdraw his garrisons: and hasting mightily offended & angered against all, yet he discharged his cholery only upon the Maronites. Unto Omonius, warden of the ports and sea-coasts, he gave commandment to kill the chief of the adverse part. And he by the means of Caistor, one of the Kings subjects and favorites, who a long time had dwelt in Maronea procured certain Thracians to be let into the town by night, there he committed murder and massacre, as it had been a City won by force of arms. And when the Roman embassadors made complaint to him, namely of such outrages committed to cruelty against the genteles Maronites, and to proudly and insolently against the people of Rome: in that they should be killed and cut in pieces as enemies, unto whom the Senate had ordained restitution of their freedom he made answer and said, that neither himself, nor any of those who belonged unto him, could do withall: but it was long of themselves and their variance one with another: whilst some of the Citizens drew upon them, and others entwined to King Eumenes. Which ye may (as he) soon know to be a truth, if ye will but ask the Maronites themselves: for this account he made, that whilst they were all terrified with so late and fresh a massacre, there durst not one of them open his mouth against him, Appius replied again, and laid, That they were not to make an enquirie in this so evident and notorious a case, if it were in any respect doubtfull: but if he would discharge and clear himself as innocent of the action he should lend to Rome Omonius and Caistor, who were named to have committed the outrage that the Senate might examine them upon interrogatories. This word at the first troubled and dismayed the King, that his colour went and came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himself, he made answer, That (as they needs would) he cared not much to lend Caistor, for that he had dwelt & continued in Maronea, but as for Omonius, who neither was at Maronea, not not so much as in any quarter near unto it, how possibly could he be charged or touched with the matter? Now as he spared Onomiothus the rather of the twain, and was loth to have him come in question, as being his more dear and honourable friend: so he feared him much more than the other, lest he should betray and disclose the thing; for that himself had conferred with him thereabout; and besides, he had served his turn divers times as a Minifter to execute, and been privy unto him as a complice to plot such like disensions. Càssander also, as it was very thought, was poisoned and made away, by certain that were lent of purpose to accompany him through Epirus to the sea side; and all because the villany should not be detected and come to light. Thus the Legates departed from the parley and conference with Philip, as shewing in their countenance, that they were nothing well pleased: and Philip on the other side went his ways as resolutely to levy war again: but forasmuch as his forces as yet were not sufficient to do any exploit, and because he would delay the time between, he determined to send his younger son Demosthenes to Rome, both to purge his father of those matters wherewith he was charged, and also by humble request to appease the anger of the Senate: supposing, that this young gentleman, who had been left as an hostage at Rome, and there had shewed a good testimony of a Princely nature and royal disposition, might much avail in the cause. In the mean while himself under colour of aiding the Byzantines, but in very truth to strike some terror into the Princes of Thrace, made an expedition against them: and when he had in one battle discomfited them, and taken prisoner their chief Captain Amadornus, he returned into Macedony, having sent certain messengers to solicit the barbarous nations inhabiting near the river Ister, for to enter and invade Italy. In Peloponnese also the coming of the Roman Legates was expected, who by this commission were enjoined to pass out of Macedony into Achaia: against whom because the Achaeans would not be to seek what to say. Lycurtos their Prætor summoned a public Council aforeshore. In which there was party as touching the Lacedemonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become informers and accusers, and danger it was, lest when they were vanquished they would be more to be feared, than all the time that they waged war. For during the wars the Achaeans found the Romans to be their good auxiliaries, but now the same Romans are more friendly to the Lacedemonians, than to the Achaeans, seeing that Areus and Molibades (banished persons both out of Lacedemon, and by the means of the Achaeans restored again to their place) had undertaken to go in embassage to Rome, against the Achæan nation, which had so well deferred at their hands; and there gave so hard language against them, as if they had been chafed and driven out of their country, and not restored thereunto by them. Hereupon arose a great outcry from all parts of the assembly, for to put to question, what should be determined expressly of them by name, and in this fit where all went by choler, and nothing by counsel, condemned they were to die. Some few days after came the Roman Embassadors, for whose sake a Council was held at Citium a City in Arcadia. But before any matter was treated on the Achaeans were surprized with exceeding fear, considering and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carried with any indifferency for their behoof; forasmuch as they law Areus & Molibades (condemned by them in the last Council) to be in the company of the said Embassadors, and no man durst open his lips and speak a word. Appius declared, That the Senate was much displeased at those matters whereas the Lacedemonians had made complaint; namely, That first in a tumultuous fray and conflict, they were murdered, who had been called forth by Phil. pater, and came to plead and speak in their own cause: Then, after they had exercised their cruelty thus against their peers, to the end, that in no part their inhumanity should be wanting, they had raised the walls of a right noble and famous City, aboliished their most ancient laws, and put down the discipline and government of Lycurgus, so renowned throughout all nations. When Appius had made an end of his speech then Lycurtos, both in regard that he was Prætor, and also because he took part with the faction of Philopomen (who was the author of all that had been done at Lacedemon) made answer in this wise: "More hard it is for us now, O Appius, to speak before you, than it was in the presence of the Senate. For then we were to answer the Lacedemonians, who accused us: but at this present we have you to be our accusers, before whom, as competent judges we should plead in our own defence. Howbeit, we have submitted ourselves, and undergone this unequal and hard condition, presuming upon this hope, that you will lay aside that accustomary heat which not long since you used, and put upon you the peril of a Judge to hear with indifference and equity. For mine own part, considering that you are WHILE have but related these matters which the Lacedemonians both here in place before Q. Cecillius of late, and also at Rome afterwards complained of, I would think that I am to answer therefore not unto you, but unto them in your hearing. You charge us with the murdering of them who being called out by the Prætor Philopomen to plead their cause were killed. This crime I hold that it ought nor to be objected against us by you Romans, nor so much by any other in your audience. And why is't because it was expressly specified in your own treaty and accord of covenants, that the Lacedemonians should have nothing to do with the maritime Cities. At what time as the Lacedemonians took arms, and feigned by force in the night those Cities, which they were precisely forbidden to meddle withal; T. Quintius, if the Roman army had been in Peloponnese, as aforetime no doubt we must needs think, that being thus surprized and evil entreated, they would have had recourse either for succour. But since ye were so far off, whether else should they flee and retire themselves, but to us your allies, whom they had seen before to help and succour Gyrthium, whom whom upon the like cause they knew to have affiled Lacedamon together with you? It was in your quarrels therefore that we enterprised a just and lawful war. Which being an act of ours, by others commended, and which ought not by the very Lacedemonians to be condemned, and confessing that even the Gods themselves have approved thereof in that they gave us victory, how cometh it then to pass, that you bring these matters into question which are by right of law warranted? And yet a great part thereof in no respect toucheth and concerneth you. Then we called them to come forth to answer their suit, who had raised a commotion of the multitude, who had forced the maritime Cities, who had remarked them, who also had miscalled the principal citizens, we are to answer therefore and to it that properly appertains. But that they were murdered in the way as they came into our camp, was nothing to us, but your donians (o which number those two also are and who at that time were with us for that they chose the coil Towns to retire into for their habitations) supposing that their own death was bought, and that there would have been outrage committed upon them, ran upon those by whole means they were driven out of their country; even upon an indication, that they might not so much as pass their old age in banishment with safety. They were the Lacedamonians then and not the Athenians that slew the Lacedemonians whether justly or unjustly, that is not the question, rather speak to it. But what say ye to this O Athenians, how can ye deny that ye are incapable, in which ye have also sided the Laws and the most ancient discipline of and but working themselves, and not for a defence into the City. And Lacedamons at this day should they again from death to life, he would take their in their ruins, and say that he acknowledged new his own native country and anient Sparta indeed. You Lacedemonians shoul not have expected help from the Athenians but your selves ought with your own hands to have expelled all and defiled all the tokens and memorials of tyranny. Those walls were the watermarks and as mon woud lay the unfeemly and deformed scars of your thraldom and fercitude. And you who without walls for the space almost of 8oo years had lived in freedom, yeas and for a certain time who had been masters of Greece became slaves during a hundred years, and loned and retained within walls, as ye had been lettered by the leer. Now as touching the walls, which ye pretend to have been taken away by us, I happest verily that the tyrants they were, who leagued the Lacedemonians of their ancient laws; and that we have not taken from them theirs (for none they had of their own) but rather have given them ours: neither have we done otherwise than well by them; but regarded much the good of their City and Common wealth in that we have united them in our solemn council of Parliament and incorporated them unto us to the end, in that all Pompous there, should be but one body, one State, and one

Conn. Then (I wot well) they might have justly complained to have been wronged then they might have grieved and said they had not been well季id. In case we our selves had lived under one kind of laws, and put them to be ruled by others. I know full well, O Appius that all my face is hitherto is neither becomning allies to site unto their allies, not decent and meet for a nation that is true but rather (to speak more truly) fit for slaves debating before their masters, for it is found of the trumpet if that voice of the public krier were not in vain, whereby ye ordered and declared That we Athenians before all others should be free; if the confederation hold firm and stable; if our alliance and amity be entertained and obtained equally and indifferently why demand not of you Romans what you did alter the winning of Cepore? Seeing you will have us Athenians to make account unto you, what we did to the Lacedamonians whom we conquered by war? Set case that we called some of them to be killed. What of that?

Commanded not you (I pray) that the Senators of Cepore should lose their heads? We have demolished the walls indeed, but ye have not only murdred their walls but wholly turned them out of City and territory. But (you will say) the confederation in behalf of the Athenians is equal and indifferent in outward appareanc, and in truth and both their liberty dependeth upon the good will and pleasure of the Romans, who indeed have the pre-eminoence of the feignory and dominion besides; I know it Appius, as well as you can tell me, ye and (although it behoveth me not to be) I am not overmuch offended and discontented therewith. But this I beseech you let there be as great odds and difference as ye will between us Athenians and you Romans:

provide this only, that your enemies and ours be not with you in as good regard and account, and may that they be not in a better precise and condition than we our allies and affaticats. For, that they should be equal to us, we have been the cause in that we granted them our own laws, in that we admitted them to be in power in the general diet of the Athenian State and commonalty. But will ye have the truth? the conquered have not sufficient to consent and suffice the conquerors; enemies demand more than allies have and enjoy, and those things which are confirmed by oath, ratified and confirmed by monuments and instruments of writings, cut any engraven in stone, for a perpetually memory to all posterity, they would force us and well from us even with our perry. Truly it. O Romans we honour and rely on you; and if you will needs have it to, we dread and fear you also: but yet, as we both honour and also fear the

The nine and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

After this debate and variance was appeased, there arose another in the neck of it, occasioned by the death of P. Decimius the Pretor. Q. Fulvius Flaccus, (who had been Ediles the last year before,) likewitite. Vado in the Flamin of Jasper, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, bado to he in his room late de cased. As for the till o these rehearsed (because he was Edile Curule) he shewed not himself in his white robe, but he made more mean and laboured above all the rest, having to his adversary and rustic the Flamin above said. At the first he seemed equall on unto him in the suit; but afterwards when he began to have the better of him, certain Tribuns of the Commons stood upon this point, and alleged, that his name was not to be accepted as eligible; for that one and the other said, though they might not take nor exercise at one time, the functions of two Magistrates: and namely both Curule or of State. Others again said, that it was meet and reason that he were dispensed with, and exempt from the Laws, in the behalf thereof, to the end, that the people might be at Liberty to elect whom they would for Pretor. L. Porcius the Consil was first of this resolution, not to admit his name: and afterwards, because he would seem to do by warrant and authority of the Senate, he assembled the LL. thereto, and said, that he pronounced and put to question before them, that for a man to be a Edile, or Edile, should be in the Person of the Pretor, and that he was in the light and in any precedent tolerable in the State: for his own part he was minded, unless they were of a contrary opinion, to hold the general assembly for the election according to Law. Then the LL. gave their advice, that L. Porcius the Consil, should commend and treat with Q. Fulvius, that he would be no hinderance, but that he should freely for the navigation of a Praeto in the room of C. Decimis departed, might be held by order of law. As for the Consil was thus in hand with him according to the act of the Senate FL. consent made answer, that he would do nothing, unifying his own person. By this doubtful and indifferent answer of his kept those men in doubt (who expended and confirmed as they would have it,) that he would accommodate and apply himself to the authority of the LL. of the Senate; but at the time of the election he found more earnestly than before complaints of the Consil and Senat, that they were weak and were cut off from their hands the benefit of the people of Rome intended unto him; and to bring him into ill will and obloquy.
A obloquy of the people, they made much ado about two offices and a double dignity: as if all the world saw not, that after he was declared and pronounced Praetor, he would incontinently resign up the Edileship. The Conful, perceiving both him fully resolute and set upon a pitch in the fur, and also the fear and affection of the people inclined more and more toward him, brake up the assembly aforesaid, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent session of Senators it was ordained, That for as much as Flaccus was little or nothing moved with the authority of the LL., of that honorable court, he was to be dealt withal in a general assembly before the body of the people. When the people were met together at the summons of the Conful, he propounded the matter unto him before them. Flaccus teemed never a jot, but persisted still in his opinion, and gave the people of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they slew themselves willing to elect him Praetor.

B to often as they had time and place wherein they might testify and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindness of his fellow citizens, he never meant to reject and abandon. This constant and resolute speech of his, kindled and enflamed so great love and affections in them toward him, that all peradventure he had been chosen Praetor out of hand, in case the Conful would have received his name. Much strife and debate there was amongst the Tribunes, one against another; and between them and the Conful, until at length the Conful held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wise, That forasmuch as the willfull Fliborne's of Q. Flaccus one side, and the inordinate affection of men on another side, was such, as the solemn assembly for selecting of a Praetor in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the laws, the Senat agreed and resolved, that there were already Praetors enough, and P. Cornelius should administer and execute both jurisdictions in the City, and exhibit the plays and games in the honour of Apollo.

After this troublesome debate about the election, was by such wide and valorous courage of the Senat suppressed, there were another further greater; by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the persons agents therein more in number, and for quality and place mightier. There stood in election to be Cento's (and that with earnest endeaunce and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus, P. and L. both Scripsi Ca, Marcus Fabius and L. Enius Pompeius, all Patr. And of commoners, M. Porcius Cat, M. Falcius Noblius, T, and Marcus both Scipio, the one renowned Longus, the other Thalassus. But M. Porcius over-went them all by many degrees, as well theo of the Patrocinians as also of the commons, notwithstanding they were come of most noble families. This man carried with him so vigorous an spirit and prepared wit that howsoever he was born and defended, it seemed he was able to make way of himself to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisite for the managing either of private busineses of his own, or publick affairs of State: cunning he was in country husbandry, as well as in civil policy. Some were advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places by their deep knowledge in the law; others attain to promotion by eloquence: and there be again, who have risen and become great through martial prowess and feats of arms. But this man was by nature sotrainable andpliant to all alike, that whatsoever he adddected and gave himself unto, a man would have said, he had been born and framed even from his mothers womb to it and to nothing else. In war a most hardy and valiant soldier: and in many longen fields highly renowned. Being mounted once to high places of honorable calling, a right excellent commander he proved, and General of an army. In peace again for sound counsell in the civil law, paffing well learned: for pleasing at the bar and making orations, most eloquent. Neither carried he himself fo, that his tongue florished only whilst he lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his singular eloquence: but it liveth, nay, it flourished still, immortalized as it were and recommended to posterity in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extant many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his own cause as for the defence of his friends, and inveighs also against others: for able he was to put down and weary his adversaries not only by declaming and accusing them, but also by pleading his own cause. Fervent quarrels and enmities there were exceeding many, that tormented him: and he plagued others with as many: and hard it is to say or set down, whether he was urged and pressed upon by the nobility, or himself counseller and bated them more. Doublet by nature he was a little and rigorous his speech was sharp biting, and beyond measure plain and free: but he carried a mind with him that flopped to no delights and lusts whatsoever: his life to severe and precise, as it was untouched and without all spot of blame: despiing all flattering words, and constraining earthly riches. In truth and frugality, in sobriety, in patience, in inexperience of trauaille and danger, his body was steeled to the very back. And as for his mind and courage, it was such, as very age and time (which abated and consumeth all things else) was not able to break and daunt: when he was fourscore years old and he pleaded at the bar for others: he made orations for his own defence, and wrote books: and in the ninetieth year of his age he performed Sergius Columba before the people to receive his judgment by them. As all his life time before the nobility was set against him so when he stood now to be Conful, they pressed hard upon him: inform'd as all his competitors (excepting L. Flaccus, who had been his colleague in the Consulship) compleated together, how they might give him the repuli and put him besides the Censure: not only for that their own teeth watered and they were desirous themselves rather of that honor: nor because they repined to see a new rite Gentleman, and one of the first called to be a Conful: but also because they looked for no other but that his Consularship would be rigorous and prejudicial to the name and reputation of divers men: considering how he had been crost crostood and hurk by very many, and was desirous himself to wait them a while, but be met. He with them again. For even then, while he laboured and fued for the place, he used imparative speeches, and gave out, that they only were opposed against him, who feared they should have a Censorship apparently vested without partiality and respect of persons. And here with he maintained and upheld the suit of L. Valerius with him, saying that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, he should be able to repel the wicked extremities newly come up and rise in the City, and to bring in regard against the ancient manners and fashions of the old men. We were much moved in these respects and confederations: and so muffled the heads of the nobility, they not only created him Censor, but also adjourned unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that go-erment.

After the election of Censor was ended the Consuls and Pretors took their journeys into their several Provinces. All have Q. Nasus: who before that he could go into Sardeius was staid behind no less than four months, about certain inquiries of poisoning; whereas he fate upon many without the City of Rome, in corporate burghs, market Towns and places of great refor-s, for that thought him manner of proceeding more convenient. And if we will to believe V. An-tius, he condemned two thousand persons.

Semblably, L. Pedumus the Pretor, (unto whom the government of Tusculum by lot fell) did good justice upon great conspiracies made by certain graffers: and with great care and diligence followed the enquete of the Buchanans, and dispatched the relics thereof quite and clean. Many of them who were adventurer and made not appear, but gave the slip and left in the lurch their batties bound body and goods for them, and lurked in that quarter of Italy he either judged and condemned as guilty and concurred, or caused them to be apprehended and sent to Rome unto the Senate, who were all call in prison by P. Cornelius.

In the other part of Spain all was quieter, by reason that the Lusitans were in the last war subduced: but in the other part, A. Tarentum lured Capua a Town of the Suefetans, which he assaulted with mantlet and other fablacks of war and sold all the prisoners: which done, he passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spain also.

The old Pretors, C. Calpurnius Piso and L. Quinctus returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and content of the LL, or the Senate allowed to triumph, and first C. Calpurnius triumphed over the Portugals and Celtiberians. In which triumph, he carried in shoes 8 golden-s, and 12000 pound of silver. Within few days after, L. Quinctus triumphed over the same Portugals and Celtiberians. In which solemnly, there was represented in first, such as was not in the former.

The Censor, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, whiles men hung in suspense between fear and hope what they would do. He reviewed a new choice of the Senate. Seven Senators they dispiaded and depoted from that dignify: amongst whom, there was one mark, for his nobility of birth and honorable offices which he had born, namely L. Quinctus Flaminius who had been Comul. An ancient order they say, it was in time of our fore-fathers, That when the Censors had put any out of the Senate, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, exist there be divers scrupul of Comul, against them whom either he called and displaced out of Senat, or from whom he took away horses of service: but of all others, the fourest and bitterest is that of his, against this L. Quinctus: which if he had pronounced as an accuser before he had noticed him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very own brother T. Quinctus (if he had been then Censor) could not possibly have kept L. Quinctus in the state of a Senator, Among other grievous matters he arraigned against him, That he had trained with him from Rome into his Province of France (in hope of many great rewards) one Philippus Pontius, a notorious and crafty Ganimede. This boy, as he was fooling and playing the wanton with the said Quinctus then Comul, tried to upbraided him with this, That he was had away from Rome, against the very time that the show of word-players at utterance was to be exhibited: and this he said, to shew how ready he was to satisfy the pleasure of him his lover.

Now it chance as they were making good beer together, and having taken their wine liberally were well beat there with news came and reported it was in the banket time, That a certain noble man of the Boians was arrived, with his children as a renegat from the adverse part: I was desires to speak with the Comul, for to have a favour from his mouth of safe-conduct: who being brought into the pavilion began to party with the Comul by a trickman or interpreter. And in the midst of his speech: How fell thou (saith Quinctus to that wanton deiny, his Catamite) because thou hast mislead and lost the office of those word-players at Rome, wilt thou lie presently here this Frenchman die in the place before? He made not any great semblance unto him in good earnest of his desire that way: but the Comul at the first beck of that beally fifth and baggage, cought the naked sword which hung over his head, and fist gave the poor Gaul a wound in his fierce as he was speaking unto him, and afterwards as he made shift to flee from him, and called upon the protection of the people of Rome, and the affiance of those that were prefent, Quinctus ran him quite through the field. Valerius Antius, who never had read the oration of Cato but gave credit to a flyable tale, without any head or author, tells the tale with some other circumstance howbeit much like in substance of matter, as tending his lecherous lust and bloody cruelty.

He writes, that Quinctus whiles he abode at Placentia, sent for a famous courelian (upon whom he was enamoured) to a banter, and as he counted and made love to this trumpeter, wanting himself A unto her, among other discourses he recounted with what rigor he had followed certain inquisitions; what a number of prisoners he had in irons condemned to death; and how many of their heads he minded to chop off. Then this harlotry lying next beneath him, said, That she had never in her life seen any man to cut ones head off, and it was a sight that all other she would faint see. Whereupon, this kind amorous knight, to gratify the queen, caused one of their poor souls condemned to die, to belet out of prison into the banqueting room, and presently to be beheaded before her face. A cruel fact it was & inhuman, whether they were committed as Cato hath objected, in his oration, or as Valerius hath written in his history, that any human creature should be thus manhandled as a sacrifice; and the table be sprinkled with his blood, amid the cups standing full of wine and the dishes furnished with viands, where and when the manner and sublime was to last B and take the first essay in the honor of the gods; and that devoutly with grace and good prayers; and all to content and lead the eye of a wanton and shameless Hang, lying in the bosome of the Conful. In the end of Cato his oration, this condition was offered unto Quinctius, That if he would plead unguily, and deny this fact and others which he charged him with, then he should put in a real caution, and stand to his defence and trial: but if he confessed himself guilty, then he would help him to consider whether he thought any man would griеve and be sorry at the ignominie which he was to receive, being transported beside his understanding with wine and women, made but a sport and pastime to fed mens blood at a very banker. In taking a review of the Cavalry or Gentlemen of Rome, L. Scepio Afraticus had his great horse of service taken from him. This Centurioth was likewise executed with severity and rigour to all forts and degrees, and namely, in the prizing and valuation of their goods. For Cato commanded the Sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, and apparel of women, also of their chariots and coaches if they amounted to the sum of 1,0000 asses, and to enrol the same in the Censor's book. Item all bond slaves under twenty years of age, sold after the last tax or assessment for 1,0000 Asses or upward, that they should be valued at an higher price by ten fold than they were esteemed worth: and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the City chamber after three in the thousand, These Censors cut off all water either running out of any common stream into a privat hose, or derived into particular fields and grounds. And all homes either build by private persons upon common grounds, or any ways encroaching and leaning to publike places they caufed to be demolished and pulled down within thirty days. After this, they let out divers pieces of work to be wrought at a price, of that money which was ordained to that purpose; namely, to pave certain pools with stone, to foure the drenches and finks where need was; and in the mount Avenue and other places where none were already to make new. And particularly of thesmelves Plaucus caus'd the cauity or what is to be made against the waters called Nepuana, that the people might pass to and fro by that way: and also a street-way through Formamini, and Cato for his part built two galleries, * Maximum and Titium, in the Mineries; and bought four shops for the City: he build there also the latter Hall or Palace called Porcia. As for the City revenues, they did let and let them forth to farmers, at an exceeding ranked rent: but all the City works they put out to undertakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains abovefoe being once cancelled by order from the Senate, and new made at the importunat limb and that with D outries and tears of the Publicans, as well farmers as undertakers; then the Censors by proclamation commanded those to avoid far from the subfaltation, who did dafolat the former leases and bargains; and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they demifed the fame profits and revenues again to others. This was a cenfeorship of great note; full of rapine ill will, which troubled and molest M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to be the author of that severity and rigor exercised therin. The same year, two Colonies were erected and inhabitants sent from Rome to civit. Pollentia into the Picene territory, and Placentia into the Gauls country. Six acres of land were allotted to every one of the coloners, and the same Triumvirs, namely, Q. Fabius Laboc. M. Furius Plautus, and Q. Furius Nobilius, were they that both parted the said lands, and also had the leading and planting of the forefald Colonies. The Consuls that year achieved no memorable exploits at all, neither at home in City, nor abroad in war. Against the year following they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcelus and Q. Fabius, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entered into their governments, put to question as concerning the Provinces, as well their own as the Pretors. For there had been chosen Pretors C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter (who also the year before was in election for the place) S. Pol, Pompianus Aburnius and P. Cornelius Sestus, also L. Poppius, L. Julius, and Cn. Scribonius, Utno the Censors was assigned the province Liguriae, together with the charge of the same armies which P. Claudius and M. Porcius had conducted. As for both the Provinces in Spain as well beyond as on this side therus they were refered with their ordinary forces, for the Pretors of the former year by special commission without calling any lots at all therefor. The new Pretors were enjoined to dispose and part their governments, that C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter might, exercise one of the jurisdictions of Rome. So he was L. chief justice for the forreiners, and Sicenum over the cities, Unto S. Pol, Pompianus fell Sicily, to L. Poppius Apulico to L. Sestus Cilicia, and to Cn. Scribonius Sardinia. As for L. Julius he was enjoined to make hali and set forward on his journey for the Tramalpine Gauls (beyond the mountains) had passed over by the ftreights of the, forreits and waies unknown beforetime into Italy, as hath been beforefaied, and were building them. a Town in that territory, which at this day is called Aquilenia. This Pretor had in charge to im-pitch them in that enterprise, so far forth as he might possibly without war and force of arms: and it there were no other remedy but that they must of necessity use violence, then to certify the Concilis for: for agreed it was that one of them should lead the Legions against the Gauls. In the end of the former year there was a general assembly held for the choosing of an Augur wherein Sp. Pollio Pater Albins was created in the room of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus he deceased. But in the beginning of this present year P. Licinius Crassus the arch-Pretly departed out of this world, in whole place M. Sperinum Tadunus was inveted for the Bishop. But C. Servilius Geminus was created the arch-pretor or high-priest aforesaid. In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a done of flesh and a fiew exhibited of two sword-fencers fighting at sharp: likewise there were represented funeral plates and games, which continued three days: and after that solemnly, if a feal was holden during which, when the tables were let & spred accordingly all over the grand-place of the City, suddenly there arose a tempest with great storms, which forced multo men to crant and booths and there: but after a while when the weather was fair again they were taken down and had away and men commonly gave out and said, that whereas the Prophets & wizards had foretold among other their faral prefage that they should be forced to quarter & pitch tents in the market place of Rome: now that prophetic was fulfilled, and they were freed and excused from farther danger. And no sooner were they ealled and delivered of that temple, but they were troubled with another for that it had raised blood two days in the court-yard of Valesan and the Decemvirs published a solemn application for the expiation of that prodigious expi.

Before that the Consils departed into their provinces, they brought it into the Senat for to have audience, the embassies come from beyond Sea. And never before that day were so many of those foreign parts seent at Rome. For from the time that the fruit was blown abroad amongst the nations bordering upned Macedon, that the Romans gave no darctor to the complaints and accuculations commended against Philip, that many had sped well by complaining to every City and State in their own behalf, ye, and many private persons in particular (for all neighbour he which was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and ealed of their wrongs, or to charge their fioraments and be mended and comforted for their miseries. Likewise from King Emmenes there arrived an embassies accompanied with his own brother Athenes to make complaint, as finding themselves grievied that the garrisons were not withdrawn out of Thrace at a to inform that Philip had sent certain aids into Bithynia to Profers who made war upon Emmenes. Now Demetrius (Philip his lon) at that time a very young Gentleman, was to answer to all these challenges: and an ealy peace of world was much desired. He himself had all the matters objected to, or to think upon the passing of every answer according. For over and besides that the articles were many in number: most of them were of very small consequence and importanly, strike about limits and fund-land-marks, about caring away men and ravishing women; old driving of custod of mifirifying justice partially and with affection or else of none mifirired at all; of sentences giuen and judgments passed in caitns either by force or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demetrius could speak to these points and give them good evidence, nor themselves be well informed and cleey instructed by him: being moved also and grieved to see the youth to raw a & oder in the eaffairs and therewith so much troubled in spirit, gave order to enquire and demand of him. Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father as touching the premises? And when he answered and said, Yes, they thought the first and principal thing for them to do was to see and hear what were the answers of the King to every speciality and particular, and thereupon they presently called for that book of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents thereof. Now therein were set down certain brief abstracts of pleas and defenses, to each federal point of view. In primis, that some things he had done according to the decrees & awards of the Roman Delegats and commissioners, Item, Whereas he had left somwhat undone the default was not in him but in the very parties that accused him. He had interchanged between, certain grievances and complaints, as touching the inquity and hard penning of those decreees and how matters were not scanned and debated before Caesar with that indifferency and equity as was meet and required and namely that without deffer of his part, all men were set against him and insuluted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the heart of Philip was wounded and called against the Romans. But when the yong Prince excused some of these matters, and for the self promised and undertook, that all should be done to the utmost as it pleased the Senat to order and let down: then it was thought good to deliver this answer unto him. That his father had in nothing done better nor more to the contentment of the Senat than that he seemed willing (howsoever matters were passed already, to make satisfaction to the Romans by the means of his Son Demetrius. As for the Senat, they could dissemble, forget put up and endure many things done and past ye, and were swallowed verily in their hearts, that they might believe and trutl Demetrius as knowing a favorite, that although they fept his body again to his father Philip yet they had his heart and affection with them stillis a sure pledge and bond yet and that he was a friend to the people of Rome for forth as his reverent duty to his father would permit and give him leavest him withal to understand that for to do him honor they would send Emfitadors into Ma-cedonias to the end that it ought not been so fully effredtated as it should have been, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame or penal satisfaction to be made for anything hitherto omitted: yes, and defcrues they were that Philip should understand, that by

The mediation of Demetrius and for his sake, he flooded yet in good terms of peace and friendship with the people of Rome. These things intended and done for the increase of credit and reputation, presently turned to the displeasure of the young Gentleman, and in the end to his utter ruin and overthrow.

Then were the Lacedaemonians admitted to audience in the Senate. They moved many petty matters and trifling controversies; but those that principally touched the main point were these: to wit, Whether they should be reformed again whom the Achæans had condemned, or not. Items, Whether they were guilty or not guilty, whom they murdered? Moreover, they put to question, Whether the Lacedaemonians were to be comprised within the general assembly and Council of Achæa; or, that this State (as before time) should have their rights and franchises apart by themselves from all others in Peloponnesus? The Senate ordained and awarded: Imprensus. That they should be reformed. Items. That the sentences pronounced against them should be reversed. Items. That Lacedaemon should do service to that high court and public. Dict of Achæa; and finally, that this accord and award should be engrossed, inscribed, and signed as well by the Lacedaemonians as Achæans.

Q. Martius was sent Embassador into Macedonia: who also had direction and order given him by the same commission, to visit the State of the allies in Peloponnesus; for there also remained some troubles after the old quarrels and variance years, and the Meleagrians refused to appear at the general council of Achæa. Now if I would let in hand to record the causes and circumstances of that war, I should forget my purpose in the beginning of my work, wherein I resolved not to touch at all any discourse of former histories, no farther than they were linked to the Roman affairs: Howbeit one memorable occurrence there happened, which I cannot pass by namely, that albeit the Achæans had better hand in wars, yet it chan ed that Peloponnesus their Pretor was taken prisoner by the Meleagrians, as he made an expedition to seize upon some, by prevention which the enemies were devious to be maisters of. Surprised he was in a valley of great disadvantage, and some few horsemen with him. It is reported, that by the help of the Thracians and Carians, he might have fled and escaped: but for very shame to abandon those men of arms, which were the nobilit of Gentlemen of that nation & whom he lately had made choice of: he had not the power to do otherwise: but to set on the latt, for whilsts he came himself behind in the rearward, because he was desirous to make means for their evasion through the straits of that pass, and to that purpose valiantly received the charge of the enemies, his horse fell and cut him at once: to his with his own fall and his horse lying upon him he had like to have gone away in a swoon: a man now three hundred years old and ten; and withal, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering disease, which had mightily waited and consumed the strength of his body. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him; and so soon as they knew who he was, they rested him upon his feet from under his horse, no leses respective than if he had been their own General in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himself, and forth of that by-valley standing out of the pas: they carried him into the high way: and were so far pleased and overcome with joy to unexpected that they could not well believe their own eyes that they had got him. Some dispatched van-couriers to M sene with the news: hereof: namely, that the war was brought to an end, considering that Peloponnes was taken and was their prisoner. At first the tidings seemed so incredible, that the foremost meilteger was held not only for a villain, but also for one not well in his wits: but after that there came one another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the fame at length it was believed. And then, fee what they did! before they knew for certain that he approached near unto the City: they all ran forth of the gates by heaps to see the man: all (I say) bond as well as free, women and children one with another. In so much, as the gates were choked up with the throng and throng of the pref: for no man could believe it hastily it was true, the thing was so strange unless he might see him with his own eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him, thereunto much ado put by the multitude whom they encountered, and to enter in at the gate: and so think they floated in the pref: that they took up all the ways beside: so as he could not be brought forth to be seen. Now because the most part of the people might not possibly have a sight of him, they got up all at once into the Theatre, which flooded near into the way, and poldered it full and with one voice they cried aloud, That he might be brought thither and presented unto the view of the whole people. The Magistrats and principal citizens, fearing lest the compasion that might arise in mens hearts upon the beholding of so worthy a personage would raise some trouble and commotion: whiles some comparing the reverence of his former authority and Majestie, with his present condition and calamity: and others calling to remembrance his manifold defects and putting good men, might haply be touched with pity: set him a far off in the open light of them all: and then at once took him hastily out of their view: for their Pretor Directors gave out openly and said, That the Magistrats were to enquire and demand certain points of his as touching them in him of the total war. Then he was brought into their Council-Chamber, where their Senate assembled and began to confute about him. It was now well toward evening: and so far off they were from resolving in other matters, that they could not bethink themselves and agree, in what place they might keep him that one night in safeguard. Afflicted they were and amazed to consider and think upon the greatness of his estate pull, and of his noble nature and valor: and no man durst receive the charge and custody of him in his own house, nor trust any one besides with his his keeping. At length some there were, that put them in mind of the publick treasury of the City, vaulted under the ground like a dungeon, and walled all about with strong square stone, into it was he let down bound as he was, and a mighty huge stone (being the cover of the vault) was by an engin laid over, to envelope him sure, Thus reposing moretrust for his safe custody in that place than in any person, they waited and attended the next morning. When morrow day was come, the whole entire multitude in general, recommending the benefits and good turns done of old by him to their City, were of mind to pardon and spare him, and by his means and mediation, to seek for remedies and redress of their present direftries and calamities. But those persons by whose motive and inducement the Messenians had revolted (and such were they as ruled all the common-weal) conjoined apart in secret, and concluded with one consent to put him to death: only the doubt and question was, whether they should do the thing with speed, or by delay. But those prevailed in the end who were more greedy of present revenge, and so they sent one unto him with a draught of poison. When he had taken the cup in his hand (by report) he gave not a word but only asked, whether Lycorcas (the other General of the Achaeans) were escaped alive, and the least harm done to him? When answer was made, that they were in safety: That is happy, (quoth he) and therewith drunk off every drop in the cup right heartily, and a while after yielded up his vital breath. But long joyed they not of his death who were the bloody authors of this cruelty: for the City of Messene being conquered by force of arms, among other capitulations delivered these malefactors into the hands of the Achaeans, who demanded presently to have them. The bones and reliques of Philopomen were likewise rendered unto them, and interred he was by the general Council of all Achæs, in such solemn way, that in heaping upon him all honours that could be devised for an earthly man, they forbore not also to adorn him as a God immortal. The Historiographers as well Greek as Latin, attribute so much unto this man, that some of them have recommended to posterity (as a memorable thing of all others that hapned this year.) to wit, that in this one year there died three renowned Captains, Philiopomen, Annibals, and P. Scipio. See how they have matched him in equality with the greatest warriors and noblest Generals of the two most principatl nations in the whole world.

Then came T. Quinctius Flamininus in embassage to King Prusias, whom the Romans had in supposition and jealousy, both for that he had received Annibals after the flight of Antiochus, and also because he made war upon Eumenes. Now were it among other matters Flamininus charged Prusias, that he entertained in his court the most impious enemy of all men living, unto the people of Rome; who still solicited his own native country to take arms against the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, persuaded King Antiochus to do the like: or rather that Prusias of his own accord to gratify Flamininus there present, and to do the Romans a pleasure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Annibals, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon the first communication and conference between them, there were soldiers sent in continence to beseech and guard his house, Annibals evermore forcait in mind some such time and end of his life, seeing the deadly and inexpiable hatred that the Romans bare unto him: reposing besides no confidence at all in the fidelity of these Kings and having withal some experience already of the inconstancy and levity of King Prusias. Moreover, he had in honour this coming of Flamininus, as fatal unto him, and a mean to work his final destruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided of force and against the inconveniences and dangers, whereon with all sides he was encumbered, and have a ready way of occasion to use himself; he had devised and caus'd to be made seven doors for ege's out of his house; whereof some were very privy and secret vaults, because they should not be envizaged with guards. But King's commandments are of that force, that whatsoever they would have to be searched out and discovered, cannot be long hidden. For the guards so compassed and enclosed the whole circuit of the house, that it was impossible for any to get forth and make an escape. Annibals being advertised that the Kings' soldiers were at the gates, adhered to steal away at a pattern, which stood narrowth out of the way and whereof the Constancy was most secure, but perceiving that the soldiers had beaten it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, that and that every place was invested with a strong guard, he called for the potion which he had of long time before ready prepared for all such occurrent occasions and uttered these words withal, 'Let us rid these Romans of this their continual fear and pain wherein they have been all this while, since that they think it so long to stay for the death of one old man. Flamininus shall obtain no greater or memorable victory of so great a disarmed thus as I am and betrayed into his hands. But this every day shall prove and tell, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from their ancient manners. Their forefather (ed he) advertised King Prusias their enemy armed in field, and living with an host of men against them in Italy, they gave him warning I say to take heed of poison; but these living at this day, have sent their Embassador, even one that had borne the dignity of a Conul, to advise and counsel Prusias wickedly to take the life away of his own child. Then after he had caus'd the person of Flamininus and his whole realm, and called upon the Gods, and the city of the law of hospitality, to bear witness how he had violated his faith and broken promise with him, he let the cup of poison to his mouth and drank it off. This was the end of Annibals. Plutarch and Strabo write, that Scipio also died this year. But I accord neither with them nor with Valerius. From them I f划算, because I find that when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Censors, the same L. Valerius being Censor, was elected President of the Senate, where-
A as Africamus had been President for ten years space together, during the time of two reviews by Cnenors next before. And so long as the said Africamus lived, there would have been no other chosen President in his room, unless himself were to have been called and deprived of the Senators dignity, of which disgrace and none of infamy, there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for P. Valerus Ambrosius, he is sufficiently refuted by M. Naevius, a Tribun of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration extant, and the same penned by P. Africamus, and bearing his name. This Naevius is recorded in the rolls and registers of Magistrates, by the title of Tribun of the Commons in that year when P. Clodius and L. Porcius were Cornuls, but he entred into his office during the Consularship of Appius Claudius and Q. Sempronius, the tenth of December. From which time to the fifteenth of March, are three months upon which day P. Clodius and L. Porcius began their Consulship; So, it semeth that he was living during the Tribunship of Naevius and that he might well commette a crime against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Caecus and M. Porcius were Cnenors. But in my conceit the death of these three (the most renowned personages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with the other in this regard that they happened all just at one times, more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and univerable to the person late and glorious life of his. For first and foremost in this they all jumped together that they neither died nor were entered in their native country. Again, Annibals and Philopommi were both poison'd, Annibal was banished and betrayed by his own friend and host, Philopommi was taken prisoner, and left his life in prison and irons. As for Scipio, although he was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of apparatus at the day assigned unto him and being cited to his anwser, in his absence, willingly banished not himself only for his lifetime but his corps and immans also after his death.

While those affairs palled in P. Eponinus (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and digressed) the return of Demetrius and the Embassadors into Macedon diversely wrought in men's minds, and amended them fome in one thing, and fome in another. The common people of Mazedon, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and call a laudable aspect upon him as the author of peace and withal they defined him without all doubt to the Kingdom after the decease of his father. For albeit he were younger than his brother Perseus, yet men thought and spake, that he was begotten in onnity by Philip of his lawful wife, whereas he had Perseus by a consub, who carried no token and mark of a certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius resembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be. Moreover, withal, Demetrius said, that the Romans would place and etablishe Demetrius in the Royal throne of his father, but Perseus was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folk fink not to give out abroad in their common talk. Whereupon not only Perseus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age would little boot and advantage him, considering in all respects he was inferior to his brother, but Philip also himself, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleased, thought that his younger son was amite in his eye, and trusted him more than was for his ease. Offered otherwheresthe, that the Macedonians returned unto him so much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be any more royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to speake a truth, the young Prince himself returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt with pride than was becomimg as who presumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but look how much favor and honor in respect of the Romans he won among the rest of the Macedonians, so much envy and ill will he procured himself thereby not only with his brother, but with his father also; and especially after that other Roman Embassadors were arrived, and that Philip was forced to part with Thrace and withdrew his garrisons, and to do other things either by virtue of the old award of the fift commissioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senat. Well, he performed all, but with an heavy heart and many a deep sigh and groane, and so much the rather, because he observed and saw how his son Demetrius converted more with the Embassadors, and frequented their company other than his. Howbeit he obeyed, and did whatsoever was enjoined him by the Romans, because he would minitost unto them no occasion of laying war against him out of hand, And supposing it was good policy to asserting their minds from all suspicion that he minded any such designs tending that way, he led his army into the midst of Thrace against the Odryans, Dinehelets, and Beffians. He won the City Philoppopolis, abandoned by the inhabitants who were fledd, and had retired themselves with their whole families to the high mountains next adjoining; and when he had wasted the lands and territories of the Barbarians that inhabited the champaign country, he received them under his subjection by composition. Afterwards, having left a garrison at Philoppopolis, which soon after was chaced and expelled by the Odryans, he determined to build a Town in Demroprius, a region of Paeonia near the river Erginus, which influet out of Thrace and keeping his onft through Paenia Cithargem it left, and lighten into the river Axios. Not far from Sebota the old City he built a new and called it to be called Peribus thereby to do honour to his eldest Son Perseus.

During the train of these affairs in Macedon, the Cornuls took their journey into their several Provinces. Marcellus sent a messenger before him to L. Porcius the Pro-continis, to give him to understand that he should present his legions before the new Town of the Gauls. But at the first approach
The approach of the Consul, the Frenchmen yielded the place. Twelve thousand were that bare arms, and most of them had by force gotten their armour out of their country villages, which was taken from them maugre their hearts, with all things else, that either they had gotten out of the country by pillage and robbing, or brought with them of their own. Whereupon they addressed their Embassadors to Rome, to make complaint of these abuses and wrongs: who having audience given in the Senate by G. Valerius the Pretor, declared, how by occasion that Gaul was furthered with a multitude of people, they were constrained as well for want of ground and possessions as also for need and poverty, to pass over the Alps and seek themselves some place of habitation. And where they saw any quarters forest, desert, and uncultivated, there they had planted themselves, without offering injury to any person: where also they had begun to build a Town, which might be a good proof and argument, that they came not to do violence upon any City or Country Village. And now of late M. Claudius had sent unto them a missilage, that unites they submitted and yielded, he would war upon them: whereupon they preferring certain peace (although it were less honorable) before the doubtful hazard and adventures of war, surrendered, rather to be in the protection and safeguard, than under the subjection of the people of Rome. But a few days after, they were commanded to quit both City and Country. And thereupon resolved in their mind to depart in silence and laying never a word into what place locver they could, there to seek their fortune: but then they were disarmed, yeas, and spoiled and stripped of all that ever they had, and nothing left that either they drove before them, or carried about them. In regard whereof, they were humble suppliants to the Senate and people of Rome that they would not proceed in more rigour and cruelty against them, harmles persons as they were, and submitting themselves unto them against professed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senate caused this answer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italy, and presuming to build a City upon other men's territories, without permission of the sovereign Roman Magistrates, who had the government of those parts: nor yet the Senate was well pleased, that they should be thus depredated, considering they had yeilded. And therefore minded they were to send with them their Embassadors to the Consul to command them in their name to see that all their own goods should be restored again unto them, so that they made return thither from whence they came: who also should go forward immediately over the Alps, to give the States of France warning to keep in their people with them, and hold them in their native country: forasmuch as the Alps were the frontier limits standing in the minds to confine between them, and therefore those Mountains neither ought nor might be passed of one side or the other: and to make account of this, that they should speed no better now in transgressing their bounds, than at what time as they first made away and passage over them into Italy. The Embassadors employed about this business, were L. Furius Putorius, Q. Minucius, and L. Manlius Academius. Thus the French, after restitution made unto them of all that was their own by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italy. Now when the Roman Legates were come, they had good words and courteous answer from the Transalpine nation. And those amongst them that were more ancient than the rest, blamed the people of Rome for their overmuch lenity, in that they let those persons go, who without warrant from the whole State, durst be so bold as to take a voyage to settle upon any lands belonging to the Signory of Rome: and were so hardy as thereon to build a Town. For surely they decreed not less than to abridge grievous smart for their rash demeanor. Moreover and besides, whereas the Romans have given them their own goods again, they feared much that so great ingratitude of theirs, would induce and encourage others to enterprize the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the Embassadors, and liberally presented them with rewards.

M. Claudius the Consul, having thus expelled the Gauls out of his Province, began to lay the ground of the Ilirick war, and for this purpose wrote his letters unto the Senate, for a warrant and commission to pass with his legions into Iliria. The Senate was therewith contented. But whereas they were in question and consultation about conducing a Colony to inhabit the Aquilia, they could not agree with them to send, whether Latin or Roman citizens. But in conclusion the LL. N. M. thought it better to plant there a Colony of Latins. The Triumvirs for to effect this, were created P. Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Academius.

The same year were two Colonies of Roman citizens created at Mutina and Parma: and two thousand persons were to either place translated out of the territory which lately was occupied by the Boians, and before time had been in the tenure of the Tuilans, They of Parma were endowed with eight acres of land, and those of Mutina with five a piece. The Triumvirs-Commissioners who had the disposing and managing of the business, were M. Emilius Lepidus, T. Euhubius Carus, and L. Quintius Crispinus. Likewise the colony Saturnia consisting of Roman citizens, was brought into the territory of Lusitanus, by the consent of Q. Fabius Laber, C. Afranius Stellus, and T. Senec Gracchus; deputed Triumvirs therefore: who set out for every man ten acres of ground.

The same year A. T. erenius the Propoctor, not far from the River Iberus in the Anuleans country, fought fruitfully against the Celtiberians, and forced certain Towns which they had fortified. Rest Spain beyond Iberus was quiet this year, because both P. Sempronius the Propoctor lay sick of a long disease, and also the Lusitanians (as good hope was) setted still and quiet, as being by nor man provoked to stir. Neither was there any memorable expede archived in Lusitania by Q. Fabius the Consul, M. Marcellus was called home out of Iliria: and after he had discharged his army,

The spring season that year was very stormy and tempestuous. On the seventh of April, the sea was very much agitated. The feast of Apollo about noon-tide, suddenly there arose a mighty bisterous wind, which overthrew many edifices as we laced as profane. It cast down the brazen statues and images in the Capitol: it caught up the wicket of the door belonging to the Temple of the Moon, (which is in the Aventine) carried it away and set it fast to the back wall of the Temple of Ceres. It overturned and laid along other statues in the great circle or show-placed called Cesius Maximus, together with the pillars upon which they stood. The lanterns and pilasters in the same place, from the roof and top of certain Churches, and carried them clean away. And therefore this tempest was held for a prodigious token, and the Atrufpues presided for the expiation and satisfaction thereof. Likewise the same provision was made in regard of a report from Rome, that a mare was foled with three feet: and from Formia, that the Chappel of Apollo (and namely at C. j.a.) was struck I with lightning. For these prodigies, there were twenty greater beasts killed for sacrifice: and a supplication was made one whole day. And about the same time, intelligence was given by letters from A. T. Remius the Preitor that P. Sempronius, when he had continued above a year in the province, was departed this life, in the farther Province of Spain: which was the cause that the Pretors were made whole again, and to make the sooner to pass into Spain.

After this, the embassies from beyond the sea had audience given them in the Senate. The first was that of the two King Eumenes and Pharnaces, and also of the Rhodians, who explained for the great losses and overthrow by the Sinopians received. And about the same instant arrived also ambassadors from Philip from the Aetians and Lacedemonians, who had theri answer and dispatch, after a speech made by Marinus, who had been sent to visit the estate and affairs of Greece and Macedonia. But as touching the forsworn Kings of Asia and the Rhodians this stood for their answer: namely, that the Senate would send their Ambassadors and Commissioners to take knowledge and see to all things there in place, but as concerning Philip, Marinus had so told his tale, that he put the L. of the Senate in fear and perplexity: for in his declaration he contended, that Philip indeed had accomplished the will and pleasure of the Senate, but in such fort, as it was evident to be seen, that he would do no longer than he was held thereto and compelled of necessity; for apparent it was, that he minded to make war again, considering that whatsoever he either did or failed to tend no other end. For it was and formost he caused all the multitude to be removed and translated (with their whole families) out of the cities by the sea-coast, into that quarter which now is called Eumenes and in that part was named Eumene and gave those cities aforesaid to the Thracian and other barbarous nations to inhabit: supposing that this kind of people would be more fatal and fruitful in him in his wars against the Romans. And verily this deed of his bred a great discontentment and murmuring throughout all Macedonia: informations, as few there were of them, that those left their natmve habitations together with their wives and children, that could bite in and contain their father's grief and heart-breaking, and say nothing; but being pricked and nettled more to anger than curbed and bridled with fear, they brake out and were heard of; and cry out upon the King as they went along in the way in troops and companies. Hereupon his fel diemack by nature was called that he had all men in jealously, and no time or place there was but he inspected. In the end he began to give it out openly, that he could not make account to be in safety and security unless he apprehended and kept in prison the children of those persons whom he had before-time killed for to dispatch and make away them also (in time) one after another. This came in to itself haimous enough and enormous the calamity and wrong misery of one house made more odious and detestable. Murdered he had many years before Herodotus a noble man and a Pur of the Thesala and some timeafter, he flew also his sons-in-law, who had married his daughters. These Gentlewomen being left Widows, had each of them by their lineages a little Son: and the names of these women were Theoxena and Arch. As for Theoxena she was in no wise merry again, albeit she had many fitters that woed her: but Arch was wedded to one Perseus, the very principal and noblest perfidious of the Elean Nation: and when she had born him many children she died, and left them all very young. Then a teriety priests took the wife was married to the forsworn Perseus, to the end, that she might have the bringing up of those her sisters children with her own hands: and in truth she was not more kind to her own pretty for thin to those her sisters children: but so tenderly regarded them all alike as if she had been them of her own body. Now when she heard one of the Kings ed & and proclamation which was gone forth, for the apprehension of all those infants whose fathers before had been put to death; supposing that these children should be exposed only to the abuse and fearful mockery of the King but also to the luft and villany of his guard she conceived in her mind an horrible dejection: yes, and the flush not to say. That with her own hand she would rid them of their lives, rather than they should come within the clutches of Philip. But Perseus her husband (who alhorted the very naming of so abominable a fact) said that he would convey them out of the way as if he were Arch, to certain truly friends of his there, and would himself in proper person accompany them all the way thither, and take part with them of that exile and banishment. So they put themselves in their journey all together: he and his wife and children from Thessalonia toward Arcadia, into a remiss arrival and left which yearly they use to celebrate with much ceremonious pomps in the honor of Eneas their first founder. Now when they had spent that day in feasting full solemnly, about the third watch of the night (when all others were found asleep) they were embarked in a ship prepared beforehand by Perseus.

have fent us again, but his heart and fould they are poftfe& of, ever fince he was an highluggage at H. 4. Rome. All the Macedonians in a manner have their dies upon him yet, him they court, and give out in private, that they will no other King than whom the Romans mall let up. Old Philip was of himfelf badly enough affected in his mind, but upon their luggations stuffed into his head, he was the worfe, and more defiquinated and let out of framing: he entertained their burffilies, and let them nearer to his heart than he made fair in outward show and cowntenance. Now it fortuned that the time was some of the ordinary review of his army, the solemnity whereof was usually perfted in this manner. They cut a dog oveftart the midft in two halfs, the head and foreparts together with the entrails were let on the right hand of the high way: the hind parts on the left.
Between this flaccitude thus divided, the companies in their armour paifed in a fhew. Before the front of the vangard were carried the coats of arms and royal ensigns of all the Macedonian Kings that ever had been from the beginning. Then followed the King himself in perfon with his children. Next marched the Kings guard and cohort, with the lifec of his body. And lat of all, in the rear of behind came the ret of the multitude and commons of the Macedonians. Of either side of the King went his fons, two lufly Gentlemen. Perfens was abont 30 years old, and Demetrius five years younger: the one in the mid of all his age and strength, and the other in the very prime and flour thereof. An happy father had he been for fo fair illife, seeing this proof, this ma-terity and perfection of theirs, if the grace of God had gone withal, and that they had been well dispofed and affected in mind. The manner and cultume of this Review and solemn fight was (after the flaccitude duly accomplished) for the whole army to feif and tourney in this wife that being divided into two battalions, they fhould one charge the other, and repreft the fhew of a very conflic! and let field. And whofhe should be the chief leader and captains in this brave battle, but the Kings two fons? But believe me they jettel never a whit, nor made a vain fhew for diport, butf went to it roundly in good earneft, as if they would determine now who should be King a-other day? Foul work they made with their woorden walters and headles piks; many were wounded and nothing wanted there but sharp iron, of a very bloody battle indeed. That regiment which Demetrius commanded, had the upper hand by odds. Perfens fhewed himself highly displeafed and angry theretof: but contrary with his friends and favorits of the wifer forte rejoyned at it, and made remonflance, That this was the only thing to minifter quick occafion unto him for to challenge and accufe his yonger brother. Now the fame day, the one as well as the other alcafed their companions, who had thus performed the jousts and tourneys of either fide with them.
Perfens was invited by his brother to supper, but he refufed and denied to come. Houwertfhuch was the good fellowship amonfl them, and fo merry were the yong gallants and lofty Cavaliers, that they paffed the fettall day in all joy and mirth, either part with their Captain, and pifed the wine call liberally. Then in their, ups they told to discount free of their running and paltime, and began to tell out merry conceits and broad jels at their adverflaries of the contrary fide, in-forrnuch as they forbare not to glance at the very Captains themselves. Now had Perfens lent a privy fpie, one of his geifts, to illen what good talk there was at his brothers board, but he demeaning himfelf & walking not fo circumftantly as he fhould, was encountered by certain youths, that chanced to come on the of the hall or pater where they ate at supper, and was evil entreated and well beaten for his labour. Demetrius nothing aware thereof, among other tale talk, Why go we not (am, he) and banket with my brother, and if there remain any anger and difpleafure behind after our jouflying in jett, appeafe and mitigate the fame in fimplicity of heart and mirth-making? Mary, no better, tried they all again with one voice, fave only thofe that feared to be met with prefently and ferved alike for milifying & knocking the fulide fpie. Demetrius would needs draw even them alo with him: whereupon they carred weapons hidden under their apparel, for fear of the work that they might defend themselves, if any violence were offered. But what can be carried fo secret, but out it will, where there is ifantime discord in one family? All was full of spics and little knives, as well in the one house as the other. For there ran a pie-thank and tale carrier, before unto Perfens and declared unto him that there were coming with Demetrius four young men with privy keys by their fides. And albeit he will well enough what was the caufe thereof (for he had heard that one of his geft was by them beaten) yet to aggravate the matter and make it more odious he commanded the drove to be feft locked, and from the upper rooms and loft of the house and out of the windows to the street fide, he kept off and repelled thofe (that came to banquet and be merry with him) from approaching the drove, as if their coming were for no other pur-pofe but to murder him. Demetrius after he had for a time cried out in the street and taken for this disgrace and indignity, faying it was long of the wine and nothing else that he was thus excluded, returned again to his own home to make an end of the banket there: and all this while knew nothing what the matter was. The morrow after, Perfens, as soon as ever he thought he might have access to the speech of his father, came to the court and in the sight of the King brook ftar off with a troubled countenance and heavy cheer, and not a word with him. How now (go his father) what is amifs with you? is not all well? Ah, my good lord and father (sah) I would you knew that it is the fair gift & grace of God that I am a liveman at this hour. That brother of mine, gooth not about it any more by way of secret pr efficies and hidden ambushes: for the night that was, he came with armed men to fet upon me in mine own house, and to take away my life, I was driven (father) to shut the doors againft him, and to save my felf from his furious rage,wifhin the defence of the walls thereof. When he had thus poftfe& his father with fear
A and obstinacy together: Nay, (quod. he) I will prove all plainly before your face that you shall know it is a truth that I say. If your graces can be content to give me audience, Andien. e (quod. he) ye may well say, and that with patience; and immediately he commanded Demetrius to be called before him. And withal, he sent for two of his old friends to all of him, and to take their advice, to wit, Lycurgus and Onias, who with nothing of the quarrel and variance between the two brethren, for they had been strangers a long time at the court. In the meantime, while he walked up and down, and attending their coming, courting and disputing many matters in his head, and his son Porus stood (till a while) after word was brought that the parties were come, he retired aside with two of his friends, and as many of his guards into an inner room, and permitted his sons to bring with them into the place, these friends a piece unarmed. And when he was set thus be-

B gan to speak,

Here it is, I most wretched father, to be a judge between two sons: the one plaintiff, the other defendant in the case of partizans; and to find among those of mine own house and blood, the foul stain of that felonious crime, either falsely forged or indeed committed. Certainly long ago I feared such a thought and trembled toward, and I saw it slant afar off. When I perceived your unbrotherly looks one toward another, when I overheard some unhappy words, I passed between you. Yet other whiles I was in good hope that the heat of your anger might cause a proper and, and the suspicions and jealousies be cleared and pass away, considering that even professed and mortal enemies have laid down arms, and indeed peace and become friends at last, ye; and great quarrels and enmities between private persons have had their end. I hoped that one came or other, ye would remember how we were natural brethren, that ye would call to mind, how we were little children together, and had conversed with all simplicity, and singletons of heart familiarly in your infant years, and finally, that ye would think upon my good intentions and take especial care upon myself; how I have blamed my parent and my brethren and heard the examples of brethren at their own hands, and how they have thereby induced themselves and their race overthrown their own houses, yes, and utterly subverted whole Kingdoms? On the other side, I laid before you better patterns and precedents to follow, and name of the concord, agreement, and unity, between the Lacedaemonian and KK, that reigned two by two together to their own good and the public welfare of their country for many hundred years; but the same City fell soon to decay and ruin, when the faction once was taken up to serve the tyranny and to enslave every man for himself alone. Moreover, I see before your eyes these two brethren hereby Eunomus and Atalus, who at the first began with so little to that they were in manner abashed and ashamed to take upon them the title and style of Kings; and at this day are equal in grandeur of dominion to my self to Antiochus, and to any Kings of this age living; and that by no other means in the world, more than by brotherly love and mutual concord, Nay, I laid not too but discovered unto you and recited in didy examples of certain Romans which I had learned by ear, or observed of mine own eye, sight and experience; and namely, the two Quinque, T, and W, who ware both against me, The Scipios likewise, P, and L, who vanquished and subdued Antiochus: their fathers also and uncles, which were brethren and whole concord and unity all their life long was such, as it was not disjoined in their very death. But neither the wickedness of those first recited, and a semblable end correspondent to their ungracious life, was able to scare you from outrageous discord; nor yet the good heart and meaning of the latter two together with their happy fortune and indue, that you may be wise. During my natural life, whilst my breath is within my body both yours and mine, you will be happy. For I have done the best that I could do for you, and it will be to your interest to do the same for the children. And if I live long only, ye have to live, until that I receiving the one of you, might be prevented by my death all put out of question, and make the other (as for their present) undoubted King. Stilly ye are the best of father and brother, ye can abide neither the one nor the other, there is no good in you at all nothing is there that ye hold dear, nothing that you count holy and inviolable, but in lie and sense and of all there is creep and enter into you unfavourable desires to reign and that hath wholly possessed your hearts. Come on therefore now, show and wound your fathers as with your anger, and tales and wicked words; debate and dispute the matter with reciprocal accusations you shall shortly decide and determine it by dint of sword; in that case let no man speak a word, not one word of all that either you can allege truly or lie to devise and invent falsely. Mine ears are now wide open, but shall hereafter for ever be close shut, against all secret fancies that ye shall whisper and report one against the other. When he had breathed out these words with great indignation the Philistians the 3 began all to weep much and did weep, and for a good time there was silence, and not a word until at length Perfectus began and said: I should believe I have opened the door in the night that I should, and received into my house armed guests to banter with me, yes, and held out my throat unto them for to be cut, since that nothing is believed unless the deed hath been done and disputed; since that the same is laid upon me (who have been overturned and whose life hath been forgotten) which were more befitting to speak unto a wood and a rock by the high way-side: it is not for ought that we will that these here, give your abundance and so that you have no more sons but Demetrius, and call me a bastard and supposition of yours, as brother of a concubine. For if you held and allowed me legitimate if you vouchsafed me the place, the degree and love of a son, you would never dare and storm a gainst me so as you do, for discovering the ambulat fort the (as, and explaining thereof; but a after him rather that laid in wait to surprize me: neither would you set forth and make to me small account of my life, as to be moved neither for the danger past wherein I was, nor at the time to come if such wait-riers may escape unpunished. Now if there be no remedy, but that we must die and say nothing, let us hold our tongue and be mute: let us only pray to the Gods before that this intended mischief begun in me, may also take an end in me alone, and that you be not, he who is to be wounded and pierced through my body. But in case (like as by the very in-lust and suggestion of nature, they are that ahd that set upon in a desert wildness, be taught to enter and call for mens help and succour, although they neither saw nor knew of my before) in case (I say) it be lawful for me likewise to open my mouth and speak, when I fee the naked sword drawn upon me: then I beseech you for your own love, even for the love of I your good self, and the name of a father (which whether of us twain have more esteemed and regarded, you have full well known long ago), to give me audience, and to hear me as if you had been awakened at my cry and pitiual lamentation in the last nights riot, and came in the way where I was forced to call. Help, help: and as if you had taken discretion in the manner, with in my gait, in the very entry of my door, accompanied with armed men, as an attendant and un-deer hour of this night past. These plaints and moneys which then I would have uttered with by disorder and confused cries, in that Luidain affright of mine upon the deed doing the same I now make the morrow after. Ah brother, we have lived now a good while, not (I wot) as brthren that should banket and make merry one with another. It is the crown that you look after, that is certain and pat peradventure: but your hope to attain unto it, is crossed divers K wiles. My birthright and mine eldership is a block in your way between you and it: the law of passions is against it: the ancient custom of the Macedonians, he keth it; and finally, the will, pleasure, and judgment of our father is opposite unto it. Mount you cannot possibly to high, but by the effusion of my heart blood. You go to work, you stay all means, you leave no stone unrolled, and nothing unattempted to effect that: but to this day, either mine own wary diligence or happy fortune hath guarded me and withstood your wicked particide. Even yesterday, during the time of the solemn review and purging of the army, during the time of running at tilt and jousting in time of the shew and patillse, resembling a skirmish, you missed very little of makings a bloody bateall of it, and a deadly conflict indeed: and nothing else saved me from death, but this, that I suffered my self and my men togo by the worse and be overcome. From this material combate, as if it had been no more but a game and sport among brethren, you would need have trained and drawn me to a suppert. Why: think you father, that I should have suffered a among those uffets unarmed, who came in arms to banket with me? Do you believe, that I should have been in no danger of their naked swords of steel at night who in the day time and within your sight, laded on such load with * wooden swords and balloons. that they had like to have kil-mbed me? To what end else came you, brother at that time of the night: why came you as an enemy, considering I was in choler and my blood was upper, wherefore came you accompanied with tall fellows privately armed and with short swords under their garments? I durst not venture to sit at supper with you: should I have received you then, coming as you did with armed men to ban-quett with me? Father, is the door had been opened whereas you hear me now to make my complaints, you should have been by this time busied about my winding-sheet, here, and funerals.

I lay not heath and urge matters in flanderous manner, after the fashion of these accusers at the bar: neither collect I bare conjectural presumptions to enforce & conclude any doubtfull points: for what need I to do? Denith be that he approached my door with a troop of menior that he had in his train a company, such as wore weapons covertly under their apparel? Do but sends for them whom I tell you, I shall in faith, what will not they dare to do that can do this? and yet Irow, they will never be to hardy and shameless as to deny it. If I had taken them in the manner with their weapons about them within mine entry, and I brought them before you, then you would say, it were a plain cafe and out of all doubt. If then, they confess as much with their mouth, hold them as culpable as if they had been surpriged in the act doing. Now curte and plaine: the greedy appetite and thirst after a Kingdom: now fall to raife and call up the juries out of hell to let brethren together by the ears: but good father, let not your curtes and extractions thus flie at blind random: make some distinction yet and difference, between him that lyeth in wait, and the party who is forelaid. Let him be holden guilty that fought to kill his brother, let him feel with all the gods of his father to be his enemies and angry against him, but as for him who was in danger to lose his life through his brithers mischiefous practice, let him have his reigne and recource to the mercy and justice of his father. For alas, whithether else should I flie for confessing that neither the solemn review and purging of my arms nor the running and jousting of the men at arms neither mine own heart nor mine body nor the very night reason (which nature hath given to mankind for covert & repose) affordeth me safety and security? If I go to my brother (being hidden to supper) die I shall: if I receive my brother with in my dores (comming to be a-quanter) die I must. So that whether I go or stay all is one: I cannot avoid but fall into trains and ambashes, hid for to take away my life. To what place shall I retire and betake my self: None have I regarded nor nothing have I relied upon, but the gods & your good self, father. As for the Romans & in no such terms with them of grace and favour so to trust upon your succour: may, you all with me hanged, because I take the wronges done unto you by them, The Romans, Demetrius alone is altogether in their books, They are all for him, and pass for none else,

He call them his King, during the lie of his own father. Now I seem to betouched, offended, and grieved here with by and by I am sure to have it charged reproachfully on both sides of mine ears, not only from others, but also from your mouth father, that I aspire and seek to be King, for mine own part I would both they and you knew, that if the diadem and crown were there let between us both I would none of it. For who is he that should need to undermine & supplant, for to step into his place and succeed? None there is at all but my father before me, and long may he be. I pray God, and I wish to arrive him no otherwise, but if I be worthy & deserve that he should likewise desire the time. If my father will make me his heir and inheritor of the kingdom, I will accept thereof. He indeed coveteth to be a king, yea, and most unspeakably coveteth he, that he might make pace for himself, and to step before the course of nature, the order of age, the custom of the Macedonians, and the law of nations. But what imaginest Demetrius, suppose ye? Mine elder brother (thinketh he) stands in my way between me and eyes to him appertaineth the kingdom by right and by my fathers will. Let us rid him out of the World,

What? I am not the first that sought to be a king; by murder of a brother. As my father he is aged, he is delect, and bereaved of a son, he will have more care to look to his own person, than mind to revenge the death of his son. The Romans, they will rejoice, they will approve and maintain my father, Tho' be nice points, and there be ticklish and doubtful hopes, but believe me they are not altogether vain and frivolous, For thus stands the case, and this is the sum of all: Well may you preserve me out of danger, now whilsts I am alive, by inflicting punishment upon those who take weapon in hand to kill me but let their enterprise speed once and take eff feet, you shall never be able to purify them to the purpose and revenge my death.

When Perseus had made an end of his speech, they that were present in place call their eyes with upon Demetrius as if he would have made answer immediately, and so were all silent a long time, and said not a word for they perceived evidently that he could not for weeping open his mouth:

but in the end he was urged by them to speak, and then after that necessity had humbled his grief, thus he began: My father, all those means of help which were ever wont to serve the defend dant in good stead, I am prevented and disappointed of, by the plain of my accuser. By those fail and finding means, I was well and tried to work the ruin and undoing of another, he hath made my true tears impudent which nothing out of mine eyes, proceed from a melting & wound ded heart within. And whereas himself hath not ceased (ever since that I returned from Rom to practice secretly with his conforts and complies both night and day to lay wait for my life, now he begins first with me, and will needs put upon me the vifor, and have the world believe that he play the part not only of a secret and cunning waifer, but of an open thief and a notorious murderer and cut-throat. He leemeth to fright you with his own danger, that he might make even you the very means and instrument to hasten forward the death of his innocent brother. He flath that he hath no place of refuge in the whole world: to the end that I might have no parcel at all of hope left so much as in you. Thus circumvented as I am, left alone, forsook, de-flute, and void of all succour, he chargeth me with being in favour and grace with forrain strangers: a thing I wis, that doth me more harm than good. Moreover see how he procedeth like a practised and cunning barrister, in that he interteth and mingleth the last night's work together with the blame of my former life: to the end that he might make more impious by the couiple of mine other years past, this criminous matter also (the simple truth whereof you shall know) anon) and withal confirm and maintain this vain infamous and slander, of my hopes, my will, and intended designs, by this subtile invention of his, by the fained & forged table I lay of that which was pretended the night that was. He hath not failed moreover to make you believe that this acculat of his was not premeditat and studied upon beforehand, but framed ex tempore, and occaftoned only upon the fudden in right and trouble overnight. But in good faith, Periogel I had been a traitor to the King my father & the realm. If I had complied with the Romans and other of my fathers enemies, me thinks you should not have waited for this nights devised table, but you ought to have accused me before this time of treason. And if that imputation were vain and frivolous without this fummis, and served to discover and bewray your envy & spight which you bear against me, more than it did etheth every crime which is in me: yet you should have let me alone and forborn this day, or put it off until another time; that it might have been dearly seen whether of my side I did wait for the other, you or I, upon a strange & extraordinary manner of hatred. As for me (to farth as I possible can in this saufain trouble of my spirits) I will endeavour to speak lerely of each point, which you have heaped up together so disorderly, and reveal I will the ambiances and trains of this night, yours or mine, fall out as it shall. He would have it thought that I practised to kill him, for this intent forsooth, that when mine elder brother were once made away, unto whom the inheritance of the crown appertaineth by the right of nations by the custom of the Macedonians and also, as he faith by your judgment; the yon-ger might step into his place, and succed him whom I had killed. What meaneth then, and wherto serteth that other part of his Oration, wherein he faith, that I have been so respective to the Romans, and that upon the afiance that I have in them, I hoped to be King? For if I were perfidated thus of the Romans, that they could set up whom they pleased to be King of Macedon, & if within I prefumed so much of their good grace and favor to me,ward, what need had I then to commit a particlde? Was it because I had a mind to wear a diadem embrowd with my brothers blood by me murder'd and was I deirous to make my self odious & execrable among them, with whom eithe either for mine heiney indeed, or at least wales for a counterfeit shew ther-of I have won some credit, such as is if haply it be any at all? Undes perhaps, you think that T. Quintus (by whose virtue and counsel, you reproach me that I am ruled) advised me to kill my brother Quintus, I say, who is to kind into his own brother, and liveth with him fo lovingly. This plain and acciter of mine hath collected not only the affection of the Romans which they bear unto me but also the opinion which the Macedonians have of myse, and in manner de the content of all Gods and men in my behali; in which regards all he took himself not able to match me in this quarrel and difference about the Kingdom: and yet hee, how the lame man faith to my charge, that as if I were in all other respects, inferior unto him, I was fain to have recourse to this laft hint of practising mischie and wickednes. Will you have this to be the case?

Will you be content to join issue in this point? That whether of us twain feared the other to be reputed worthier of the Kingdom, he should be judged & condemned to have fought and conceived the death of his brother? But let us discuss and examine in some forre or other, the order and manner of this pretended and deviled crime, He hath burdened me, that I have laid for him many and sundry waisseyet hath he knit up all these means and conched them together in one dies work, I purposed to kill him (faith he) in the open day-light, after the solemn review and sifting of the army even when we jousted together, and deemed to charge one another in bat-tel-wale eye upon the very day (God he knoweth) of the said solemnity. I intended Iwis (believe him if you will) when I invited him to supper, to make him away with a cup of poion, I would have stabbed him (what else?) or run him through with my sword, when I came to ban-ket with him & was accompanied with some of my train armed and having weapon about them.
Yon fee, father, what proper and choice opportunities I had picked out to commit this pretended murder, namelie the very day of diports, the time of supper, of bankey and collation. As for the day, let us examine it, and the manner thereof: was it any other than that, wherein the army was mustred and solemnly purged? when between a sacrifice cut in twain, the royal coats of all the army of Macedonian Kings that ever had been, were carried aloft in a flately fway; and we alone your two tons (father) marched on the side of you before the rest, and the whole Macedonian army followed after. When I was thus cleansed and purified by this expiatory sacrifice (prophyl I had committed any sin before that deferred expiation) and especially at the very first instant when I beheld before mine eyes (on either side of the way) the parcels of the beast scarified entertained I then in my thoughts the practical of poison & the handling of swords pre-
A pared aforesaid against the banker, to perform a parricide, that afterwards I might with some other fuclicitics expiate and cleanse my conscience thus stained & defiled with all kind of wickedness? A likely matter surely. But a spirit corrupt & blinded with the humour of flattering another upon a desire to gather matter and make all suspicions careth not to huddle one thing upon another confuted. For if I meant to have poisoned you at supper, what was there more unfit to set forward that delinquency than to provoke you to anger, by running eagerly upon you & fighting with you so thoroughly, that thereby you might take good and just occasion to refuse being required, for to come to supper? And when in your choice you had once denied to sit with me, was it not the next way for me then, to endeavour how to appease you, and seek some other opportunity, since I had prepared the poftion for that present only? But I must leap from that defigament to another, even to the killing of you by the sword, and that upon the very same day, under a pretence of banqueting with you? If I thought that fear of death you forbade my table at supper time, how comes it that I imagined not feemably, that for that faid fear you would avoid my company at banquet after supper? There is no cause why I should be ashamed, Father, if upon such a festal day as it was I drank wine liberally, and took perhaps a cup too much as among my companions. Nay, I would it might please your majesty to enquire with what mirth, and meriment I feated yesterday at home, and this joy set as the father out, because in that was like paffime of lufy youth, our fide went not by the worle. But this misery & unhappy fear upon that our mirth, hath well debiled and cooled the wine: spent it hath the strength thereof tumbling up into our hearts, which it had not come betweene, as we great laiers.

B. As we were had to this hour lien found asleep in our beds. Well, if I had minded to affail, and force your house, and that done to murder you, the matter thereof, would I not think you, have for born for my part one day to bib and quaff wine freely, and likewise kept my louder from drinking drunk, but because I should not alone plead my simplicity and make my excuse thereby, this my good brother also, who God wot is none of these murphy and futilious creatures, comes in with his wit and faith, I know nothing. I charge nobody neither who I what to say else, but that they came armed to banquet with me. If I might be so bold as to ask how you came to that knowledge, that you cannot chafe but confefs that either my house was fuel of your spies, or those armed men of my train took their weapons to openly, that every one saw them. And because he would have you believe, that neither himself made any enquiry before, nor at this time putthef the matter with the any acculator spirit, he willed you to demall of them whom he named, whether they had not their swords about them, to the end that after you had fought into it as a matter doubtful, and found them to confess it, they might thereby be held convicted, But why rather will you not, that examination should be taken in this manner: whether they took their swords with them to kill you or not? And whether they did fo by my warrant direction, and priuity? For this is it that you (brother) would make the world believe, Is it which you would have to appear, and not that which my men confess. But the cafe is plain, yea, & they will be known no other, than that they were armed in their own defence. Whether it were well, or ill done, they are of age to make account and render a reason of their doings. Do not you mingle my cafe with that action of theirs, which intereseth it nothing at all. But rather declare, whether we meant to affail you openly or secretly? If openly, why were we not all armed? Why was there none of us besides those persons that did best your spif? If secretly, what was the train and order of the execution of that design? After the banket ended, and the letter of the banker retired from thence, should those four have lain behind to fall upon you when you were asleep? How could they have carried it to clofe as not to be spied, for that a little before, they had been seen in a baize? And say, they had killed you: by what means could they escape themselves? Was it possible that your house should be forced and with all swords? Fie, fie, Perfid.e speak no more for shame of this night, but come again to that rather which galleth you in the heart, which kindleth your envy, and lettereth you in fire. How cometh it to pass, O Demetrius, that men speak abroad that you shall be King? Why should you be deemed of some more worthiy than my self, to succeed the royal estate of my father? How is it that I am in doubt of my hope, which but for you, were sure & certain? There are the sincerest thoughts of Perfid.e, although he believe nothing: these make him of a brother to become an enemy: these caufe him to be mine accuser: these conceits are that fill your palace your court, and your realm, with murmurs, slanders, and jufpicion. But for mine own part, father, like as I ought neither to hope for your royal crown, nor at any time peradventure, to make words and dispute about it: because I am the yonger, and because it is your will and pleasure, that I should give place unto mine elder brother: lest became me not herefore, neither do it become me yet, to demene my self to any action that I should seem unworthy to have for you for my father, but to be capable of all dignities whatsoever. The one point I should attain unto by indirec courts and wicked vices, in not yielding unto him, as right and reason would but the other by my good carriage and sober behavour. You reproach me with the Romans, brother: and those things which in right ought to turn to my praise and glory, you blame and reprove me, For, it was no lack of mine that I was delivered to the Romans as a hostage, or sent to Rome as Embassador: but when I was appointed by you father, I refused not to go. At both times such was my demeanor that I had an eye still and good regard, not to discredit either your highness, or your kingdom, or the Macedonian nation. And therefore were the cause, father, of that friendship which I have with the Romans, Romans. As long as you and they are at peace, I shall be well affected to them: begin war once; I that was an hostage and Embassador among them, and (though I say it) not unprofitable for you my father, even I, will become a most spirituall and mortal enemy unto them. Neither do I at this day require that the favour I have in the Roman State may lead me any way: only I beseech you that it may not prejudice and harme me. It began not by occasion of war, neither is it referred for the time of war. For assurance of peace, I was a pledge and hostage: for maintenance of peace I was employed in embassage. Content will I be, by the one and the other, in case I neither pur. hale fame nor incur blame. If I have committed any impicity against you father, if I have done or designed any wicked part against my brother, I relieve no punishment. I crave no pardon or favor. If it be innocent, I desire only and humbly beseech your grace, that I be not overweighed with the heavy load of envy and ill will, since I can be overthrown by no crime justly objected unto me. This is not the fift day, that my brother hath accused me: but this is the first day, that he is seen to be my accuser: and full little have I deserved it at his hands. If my father had been displeased and angry with me, I would have thought that you of all others being the elder brother should have been a mediator and intercessor for me (the yonger) to my father, and a means to purchase a pardon for my folly and the error of tender youth: but see: where my suffrour and refuge should have been, there contrary-wife is my ruin and overthrow. From my feasting and banqueting, from my mirth and good cheer, by his means have I been haled hither not half waked, but with mine eyes full of sleep, to answer in the cause of particide: and forced I am to plead mine own case without my counsel, without my proctor or advocate. If I had been to speak in the defence of another, I would have taken time to study remembrances and frame an oration. And yet what was I to hazard there, but the reputation of wit and learning. Instead thereof, I not knowing for what cause I was sent for, heard your Majestie first (wroth and angry as you were) to command us to plead our causes: and then my brother, who hath stood up to accuse me. As for him, he hath pronounced an Oracion judicious (for, and devising long before hand: but I was allowed no longer time: than whiles I heard my self accused) to think me what to plead or to examine and take knowledge of the matter that he hath laid forth against me. In that present moment of time, could I think you (so sudenly as I was) either give ear to my accuser, or consider and think dully of mine own plea, and ended it, was, with that sudden trouble and unexpected occasion, that much ado I had to understand what I was charged with: so far was I from desiring what to speak in mine own defence. What hope should I have now and in L what case were I if I had not my father for my judge at whole hands (albeit I am not so well beloved as mine elder brother is: yet since I am the party defendant, I ought at least to find as much pity and compassion. For I beseech you (O father) to save me, in regard of my self and you: but he requireth you to take away my life, only for his own assurance and better security. And what will be done against me think you, after you have made over the crown and sceptre into his hands: who now already thinketh it meets and reason to dispose of my blood at his good pleasure? In uttering of these words the tears gushed forth so abundantly, that they stopped his mouth so, that he could neither speak or draw his breath. Then Philip after he had commanded them to go apart and communed a while with his friends, spake and said that he would not decide their cause upon these words of theirs, nor upon one hour debating, but by enquiry into M both their lives, and observing their behaviour indeed and word, as well in great matters as in small. Herely they all saw well enough, that the accusation of the precedent nights act, was sufficiently refuted and evicted & the only thing in Demetrius to be suspected, was the overgreat favour that the Romans bare toward him. This was the very feed of the Macedonian war, sowed as one would lay, during the life of Philip, but the war was after to be waged most of all against Perus.

The two Consuls took their journey into Liguria, the sole confular Province of them both: and because they had achieved their exploits fortunately there, ordained there was a solemn procession for one day. It fortned that there came two thousand Ligurians or thereabout, to the utmost frontier of the Province of Gaul, where Marcellus lay in leaguer, requelling to be received under his N protection. Marcellus after he had commanded the said Ligurians to give attendance upon him, in the same place, required by his letters the advice of the Senat. The Senat gave order to M. Qulntius the Lord chief justice of the City, to write back again unto Marcellus to this effect. That it was more meet that the Consuls, unto whom that government appertaind, should give order and determine (as touching the Ligurians who yeelded and submitted) what was expedient for the common-wealth, in that behalfe than the Senat. As for them, if they were to give their opinion, they thought it not good to accept of the Ligurians surrender: and being once received then to be difmarred: but they were of this mind and advice, that it was requisite they should be sent and referred over to the Consuls.

The Pretors at the same time arrived in their Provinces, to wit, P. Marcellus in bai Spain, where he had been Governor before during his former Pretorship: and G. Fulvius Flaccus in the higher: where he received the army of Aventum; for that other side of Spain beyond Illerum, had been left without a Lord Deputy by occasion of the death of P. Sempionius the Pro-pretor. While Fulvius Flaccus afflicted a Town in Spain named Ubica, the Celtihrians made head and came upon him: where many and sundry hot skirmishes pass'd: and wherein many Roman fouldiers were both hurt and slain. Howbeit Fulvius held till his resolution, and by no forcible means whatsoever, could be brought to levy the siege. The Celtiberians toiled out of heart with divers combats, retired and departed. The City then seeing their forces dislodged and gone, within few days was forced and ran to: and the Praetor gave the pillage thereof to his soldiers. Thus his use, after he had gained this Town, and P. M. other, when he had retired and rallied his forces into one place, which had been dispersed without any other memorable act performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And there were the exploits in Spain, during that summer, Leuon, who was departed out of that Province before, entered the City of Rome in a petty triumph by way of ovation. He carried before him in files, eight thousand three hundred and twenty pound weight of silver, and four score of gold: besides two golden coronets weighing 67 pound.

The same year the Romans were chosen Arbitrators between the people of Carthage and King M. F. as touching their territories: and came personally to see the place in controversy. And thus flood the case: Cala the father of this M. F. the Carthaginian, had won the ground in question from the Carthaginians, Sphax after thereof clad Cala thereof; and consequently to gratify Athenob, his wife's father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and let them in possession again. Now laid all, even this very year, M. F. had disposed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both sides in the presence of the Romans, with no less courage and reverence of spirit than at other times when they tried the issue by dint of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claim and put in their plea. For that first it appertained to their ancillors in right of inheritance, and afterwards was conveyed to them by the treaty and donation of Sphax, M. F. counterpointed again and aledged, that he had both recovered the said territory, as parcel of his fathers realm, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the case was clear on his side, in regard as well of the just title as all of the present possession whereat in he was: saying, that in his case he doubted nothing else but that the modesty of the Romans should prejudice him, for fear lest they might be thought to be partial in the cause and respective to him. A King their ally and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their award against the common enemies both to him and them. The Commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienate the right of possession, but let all as they found it, and referred the entire decision of the matter to the Senate of Rome.

Nothing was there done after this in Liguria: for first, the enemies were retired for safety into their wilds and forests out of the way: and afterwards they called their army, and flit away every man to their own villages and castles. The Comiti like were unwilling to break up and dismiss their forces; and thereupon sent to the L. of the Senate to know their pleasure in that point: who advised the one of them to discharge his own regiments, and repair to Rome for the election of Magistrates the next year; and the other, with his legions, to winter at Pisa. A rumour there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in arms: but it was not known what quarter of Italy this multitude thus levied, would invade. But the Consuls thus agreed together, that Con. Babin should be present at the general assembly at Rome, for the election aforesaid, because M. Babin, his brother laid to be Comit. Then was the assembly holden for the creation of Comiti, and elected there were, P. Cornilius Lentulus, and M. Babin, Tampilus. This done, the Praetors also were chosen, namely, the two Quintus Fabius, the one Messana, and the other Lucius T. Claudius Nero Q. Petlius Spurius, M. Pinarius Piso, and L. Duranius. When these were entered into their magistracy, the Provinces were by lot after this manner disposed. The Liguriae fell to the Consuls: as for the Praetors, Q. Petlius was Lord chief Justice for the citizens pleas, and Q. F. Messana for the strangers: Q. Fabius Buto had the government of Gaul, T. Claudius Ner of Sicily, M. Pinarius of Syracusa, L. Duranius of Apulia together with the Istrians: for that the Tarentines and Brundins had given intelligence, that the seas-coasts were much troubled and annoyed by the robberies of pirates and men of war from beyond Sea and the like complaints were made by the Messalians, of the Ligurian navy. For these causes order was given, and warrants went out for to levy armies: that the Consuls should have four legions between them, containing in every one 5 800 Roman footmen and 200 horse: also to enrol 15 000 footmen and 800 horsemen of Latin allies. In the Provinces of Spain (both the one and the other) the six Praetors continued in tie their government, with the charge of those armies which they had already: and for a supplement to reinforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed 3000 foot and 200 horse of Roman citizens together with 6000 of the one and 500 of the other, from out the Latin nation. All this while they forgot not their navy at Sea. And the Consuls had in charge to chuse for that purpose two war-dens called Dumvirs, who after they had out of the Aegadian into the Sea twenty ships, and let them alone, should furnish them with mariners, and those Roman citizens in h as had been slaves and were enfranchised: and that natural Romans were born should only be Captains and have the command of the said vessels. These two Dumvirs so parted and ordered them with the defence of the maritime coasts, with ten ships appeas that the Cape of Minervas should be as it were the middle point and mark between them: so the one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Messinia: and the other the left side even to Brimin.

It was seen at Rome and reported from various parts many uncouth and strange prodigies. In the Church-yards belonging to Volca and Concordia, it rained sheep blood: and the bishops made relation, that the Spears [of Mars] shook and moved of their own accord.

All
Also at Laconia the image of Juno Sospita shed tears. Moreover, the plague reigned so hot in the country that villages are marked. Towns masts and places of frequent resorts, and within the City of Rome that they were not able to furnish the funerals accordingly and inter the dead. The L. L. of the Senate, being in great anguish and trouble, in regard of those fearful tokens and the loss of their people, ordained, That as well the Conuls should kill greater beasts for sacrifices unto what Gods they thought good, as also the Decemvirs should visit and peruse the prophetical books of Sibylla. And by virtue of their decree there was public supplication proclaimed at Rome for one whole day, at all the altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses. By their counsel also and direction, both the Senate adjured and the Conuls also published throughout all Italy for three days previous solemnities and devout holy-days. The rage of this pietas was so great, that whereas there passed an act by the Senate to enroll 6000 footmen and three hundred horses from out of the Latinis (in regard that the lancers of Conac were revolted and the Iulians up in arms within Sardina); with which power M. Poppion the Pretor was to fall over into Sardina: the Conuls made report again unto them, that such numbers of people were dead already, and so many lay sick, that it was not possible to levy that proportion of fighting men. So the Pretor had commission to furnish out that defect of soldiers, with a supply which he was to receive of Cd.
Babinus the Pro-conul, who then wintered at Pisa: and from them directly to take the less and paue over into Sardina.

L. Duronius the Pretor (unto whom the Province of Apulia was allotted) had a commission besides to make inquisition for the Baccaniars, for there remained yet some relics of the former ene-mities which had begun already the former enquiry and search of the matter rather than effected ought and brought it to a final end: and therefore the L. L. gave order to this new Pretor to cutoff this mis-chiefs in the spring and breeding thereof, before it get more head a second time, and upon growth spred further. Moreover, the Conuls by the advice and authority of the Senate, preferred certain laws unto the people, as touching the inordinat riot and ambitious seeking after offices of government. After this they brought into the Senate the terror embassages: and gave audience first to them that came from the KK. to wit. Eumenus Arisates the Cappadocian, and Pharnaces of Pontus, But no other person had answer they had than this. That they would send certain Delegates and commissaries to bear de idee and determine their controversies. After them, the Embassadors of the Lacedemonian exiles, and of the Achaeans, were admitted into the Senate.

The banished persons aforesaid were put in some good hope, that the Senate would write their letters to the Achaeans for their restitution. The Achaeans declared as touching the recovery of their. Mess age and the publication of all troubles there, with the great contentment of the L. L. of the Senate. There arrived moreover two Embassadors from Philip King of the Macedonians, named Philadeles and Peter, about no suit that they had to the Senate, but sent rather as spies to under prince and to learn from what personage points that Perseus had charged Demetrios with, and namely of certain speeches that he should have with the Romans, and especially with T. Quintius, and against his brother about succession in the Kingdom. These twain were chosen by the King as indifferent persons, and nothing affected one either to the one brother or the other: howbeit they were the ministers, confidants and confidantes of Perseus, in his intended mischiefious plots a-against his brother, Demetrios (as one ignorant of all designments against him, but only of the late wicked prank of Perseus which he had not brake) at the first, was neither in great hope, nor yet in utter despair, to be reconciled unto his father. But afterwards, he had lest confidence every day more than other in the good affection of his father toward him seeing his brother continually to bus into his ears many matters, and passeth his head with tales against him. And therefore he looked him in secretly about him that he trope not away, and namely, that he let no words fall, or did any thing that might be offensive and breed more jealousy and abuse all, who wholly for the publice contention and commonwealth of the Romans; in such sort, that he would not have them so much as to write any letters unto him: knowing well, that his fathers heart would be exasperated against him by his imputations and especiall

Philip because he would provide that his foenders and men of action should not degenerate and were wont through idleness and disuse of arms and that under one he might avert from himself all intimation that he intended any war against the Romans appointed the City Secbi for the Renov-mation of his army and marched into the quarters of Madaia. A great desire he had to mount the crest & top of the hill. Romans because there was an opinion commonly received & which he had given credit unto that from thence a man might discover within one proposal, & the Perik and Adadick leas, the rive. After also and the Alpfo thus he thought that the view of these places would land him in no small head in projecting & plotthing the war against the Romans. When at the diligent inquiry of them that knew those quarters well, as touching the seat of that mountain, he had learned and found it clear and certain, that there was no way at all for to conduct an army thither and that a few men & thowe nimble and lightly appointed should find enough to do and exceeding much difficulty to pass, he took his younger son, whose he was resolved not to have with him in that expedition; and because he would seem to dole and many life dif mencents he had with some familiar and privy speech first he demanded of him confederis to great difniculties of the journey preferred unto them, whether he were better to hold on the way till he a-follow his design or give over? But if it should go forward (eq. he) I cannot forget that which A "befell to Antigonus in the like case, who, being upon a time much toiled at sea in a boilerons "tempest, and having with him in the same ship all those that were of his blood, is reported "to have given this good advertisement and helion to his children, that they should always re- "member, and also give their puerility warning never to venture all their goods in one bottom, "nor to engage themselves together with their whorable and off-spring in any peril and danger, "Remembering therefore (q.d.) this good precept and counsel of his, I will not hazard both my "lions at once in this present jeopardy which I see before mine eyes: but for a while as I propose "to take mine elder son with me, I will send my younger back into Macedonia, for to uphold and "maintain the hope of my puerility, and for the defense of my Kingdom in the mean while. Dem- "metrius found him rightwise, and with well enough that he was left away for no other intent but B that he should not be present in counsel, when upon the view of those places abovesaid, he was to be devie, and commit in what cost lay the nearest and shortcrost way to the Adriatic Sea and to Salmy, and what course they should plot for the management of the war. But there was no reme- dy; he must not only then obey his father, but also toth him up and seem to approve and like well of that which he said, for fear left it might be thought, that it went against his flamock to yeeld obedience unto him, and to be held in more jeolousy and suspicion than before. Howbeit, to the end that he might pass into Macedonia with safety. Didas one of the Kings Deputies and Governor under him of Paeonia, was commanded to accompany and conduct him with a mean guard and convoy. Now was this Didas one of those conspirators that had sworn the death of Demetrius, whom Perseus had made surete to his part like as he had many other of his fathers friends, even since men began to make no doubt, unto whom Philip in affection was enlined, and whom he meant to make ther apparent to the crown. And at this very instant Perseus had charged him and given him instructions, by all obsequious services to inflinate and wind himself into most familiar talk, and to come to near within him, that he might draw from him all his secrets, & disco- ver the very inward and hidden thoughts of his heart. Thus departed Demetrius attended with a train about him more dangerous to his perion, than if he had travelled alone without any company. Philip first passed through Medica, and then forward over the defarts lying between Medica and Ammon, and at the seventh days march was come as far as to the foot of the mountain. Where after he had rested and itated, he made to choose of those whom he minded to take up with him the morning after he set forth & put himself in his way. At the first, the labour was not great, nor the pains much to overcum the nethermost hills but the farther they went and the higher that they advanced, the more wild and woody still they found every place, yeas, and they met with many that had no pasage at all. At length they were mounted to a path or way so dark and thick, that for the trees standing to thicke together, and their boughs plaited and inlacered one within another, scarcely or hardly could a man see the skie through them. But when they approached once the pitch and creft of the mountain, behold (a thing not lightly seen in other parts) they light upon to grove and thich a mist, which overspread and covered all that they had as much ado to match forward, as if they had travelled in the dark mid-night. At last by the third days end, they gained the very top of the mountain. Now when they were come down from thence again, they made no leis report thereof than the common opinion was that went of it; which I believe E verily they did of purpose, because they would not be mocked and scorned for this their foolisb and vain voyaging, rather than for that they could indeed within the same prospect and from one place, view seas, mountains, and rivers, situated and distant so far asunder, Much mowed they were all, and for toiled in this untoward way: but the King above the rest, by reason that he was far fpeer in age, and unweldy of body. Well after he had done sacrifice there upon two altars consecrated to Jupiter and the Sun, he descended in two days, whereas he had made three of it in ascending: and that which he feared most, was the cold nights, which there in the beginning of the dog-days were like to those of midwinter in other places. Many difficulties he wrested and strove withal during those days, and being returned into his camp, he found no better. Nothing was there but extream want & penury, as being pitched in a place compassed about on every side with defarts and wildernes. And therefore when he had itated there but one only day to rest and repose his men, whom he had taken with him in that journey, he hasted away, and in a running march, as if he had fled in rout, entred the country of the Denheers, Thee Denheers were his own confederate allies, but the Macedonians (such was their need and necessity) pilled and spoile their confines, no less than if they had been professed enemies. For first they waited & defroiled their hols, granges, and farm houses, afterwards certain wicks and villages also, robbing and rifting as they went, to the great dishonor of the King; who could not chufe but hear the piteous complaints & mone- yes of his associats crying to the Gods, Patrons of alliances, and calling upon his name for help, but could have no redres and remedy. When he was purveyed of corn from thence, and returned into the country Medica, he began to assail a city which they call Petra. Himself in person lay encamp- ed in the avenue and ready way upon the plains, but he sent his son Perseus with a small company to fetch a compass and give the assail from the higher places that commanded the Town. The Towns men thus hard beat with terror on every side for the present yielded on composition, and gave hostages: but after the army was retired, they forgetting their pledges, abandoned the city, and fled for refuge into certain forts, fenced places, and high mountains. Philip having wea- ried his loindies with all manner of travel to no effect, and withal entertained more jeolousy and suspicion of his son Demetrius, by the lawd practise and falfe suggestions of Didas (the Governor of of Paonia) returned into Macedonia. This Didus (as hath been said before) sent to conduct Demetrius home, abused the simplicity of the young Gentleman, who was nothing circumspect and wary; but seemed disinclined and complained to him (as good cause he had) of those that were nearest in nature and blood unto him; he, I say, by flattering, by soothing him up, and seeming wistful to be offended and grieved for his part at hard usage, laid snares and grins, and set traps for him; and in conclusion, by his double diligence and offering his voluntary service to do him pleasure, protesting also to be true and fast unto him, yea, and to keep his counsel, fetched out of him the very secrets of his heart. Now had Demetrius a purpose with himself to flee to Rome, and to effectuate this designment of his, he was persuaded, that of a special grace and favour the Gods had lent and offered unto him this Didus the Pretor of Paonia to be his helper and assistant; for through his Province he conceived some hope to pass and escape with security. This intent and plot of his was both immediately disclos'd to his brother Perseus, and also by him declared to his father. And first were letters hereof brought unto him, while he lay at the siege of Petra. Afterwards Herodorus (the principal friend that Demetrius had) was committed to ward, and withal, order was taken to watch and observe Demetrius that he started not aside; but all underground and close, without temblance of any such matter. These occurrences above all others, caused the King to have a dolorous and heavy return into Macedonia. These new acclamations thus prefixed troubled him much: howbeit he thought good to expect the return of those whom he had sent to Rome as spies to hear all and find out the truth. In the anguish and agony of these cares and perplexities, when the King had continued several months, in the end those Embassadors came home; who at first ere they set foot out of Macedonia, had devise'd and framed before hand what reports they would make from Rome. These messengers, to make up the full measure of all their wicked and divellish practices, delivered also into the Kings hand a false and forged letter, sealed with a counterfeit signet of T. Quintius. The said letter was indited to this tenor and effect, That Quintius should seem for his own excuse to say, that albeit young Demetrius, carried away with an inordinate desire to be King, had flipp'd a little, and treated with him about some such matter; yet would he do no prejudice any one about K. Philip, neither would he be thought or found a man to give any ungodly and ungracious counsel. These letters struck it dead fierce and made the King believe, that all the former importations hitherto upon Demetrius were true and past all peradventure. Whereupon Herodorus presently was put to the rack and examined; but after he had endured intolerable pains a long time, and confess'd nothing, he died in the end under the tormentors hand.

Perfect accused Demetrius again before his father, for that he intended and provided to take his flight through Paonia, and there came forth certain to testify against him, saying, that he had corrupted, inveigled and induced them to accompany him in that journey, but that which made most of all against him, was that same devise'd letter of T. Quintius. Howbeit there was no grievous sentence pronounced openly against him to the end that rather by some covert and causeless practice, he might come to his death; and this, not for any fear that he had of him, but doubting left some open punishment execut'd upon him, might reveal and discover his secret designment, of making war upon the Romans.

Philip himself taking his journey from Thestolonica to come to Demetrius, sent Demetrius his son to Aesopus, a city in Paonia, and the same Didus still to accompany him: but Perseus he address'd to Amphipolis, for to receive the hostiles of the Thracians. Now it is reported, that when Didus took his leave of him and departed, the King gave him in charge to kill his son Demetrius. Didus then, either purposing indeed or making semblance to sacrifice, invited Demetrius to the celebration and feast thereof, whereupon he came in Aesopus to Hercules. And (as men say) at this supper he met with a cup of poison. He had no sooner drunk it, but immediately he felt that he was ipse; for within a while it began to work extremely, and for very doulour and pain, he was forced to rise from the table and retire into his bed-chamber: where he pitiably complained of the hard heart and cruelty of his father, of the murderous mind of the paricide his brother, and of the tre-herous villainy of Didus: and all this while endured deadly wrings and torments in his belly. But afterwards there were sent into the chamber, one Thyras Stuberba, and Alexander of Berytus, who enwrapped his head and throat with the bed-cloths, carpets and counterpoints of taffitry, and held them so hard, that they throttled and smothered him, and in the end flipp'd his breath that he died. Thus was this poor innocent young man piteously made away; whole enemies one single kind of death could not content and satisfy, but needs they must kill and murder them twice.

Whiles these things happened in Macedonia, L. Aemilius Paulus, who continued still in government after his Comitanship expired, marched with his army against the Ligurians Inguanes in the beginning of the spring. So soon as he was entred into the confines of his enemies country, and thence encamped, there came Embassadors unto him under colour of seeking peace, but indeed only to excite and fire, Paulus made them answer, That he could contract no accord with them, unless they yielded first: which they seemed not so much to refuse, but said, That they needed some time to persuade their nation unto it, being a rude and uncivil kind of people. And when they had tedious time allowed to effect this, they requested moreover, that the Roman soldiery might pass over the next hills adjoining, either for fewel or forage, forasmuch as those lands were the only tilled and well minered grounds of their appurtenances and territory. When they had obtained from them, this they assembled all their forces on that side of the hills, from whence they
A had averted the enemies, and laddainly with a mighty multitude charged upon the Roman camp, and assaulted all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible means they continued the assault in each fort, as the Romans had not so much as either time enough to set forth and display their enigia, or room sufficient to put their army in order of battle; but were compelled to defend their camp more by standing thick thrown together against the enemies in the very gates than otherwise by hardy fighting. But about the going down of the sun, when the enemies were retired, Paulus dispatched two light horse-men with letters to M. Ropius the Consul, as far as Pisa, that he should come away with all speed to succour him, being in time of case befied. But Ropius had delivered up his army before to M. Iunius, the Tribuns, the senators went unto Sardinia. Howbeit he both certified the Senate by his letters, that L. Emues the Fleet, as far as Liguria, and he wrote also to M. C. Marcellus, whose province was now adjoining, to bring over his forces (if he thought it good) out of Gaul to Liguria, and deliver L. Emues from Pisa. But alas! these succours should have come at all too late; for the Liguarians the venor were day returned and advanced against the camp. Emues, albeit he not only knew that they would come, but also might have brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept himself to cloister within the strength of his rampier, mincing to hold off and not to fight, until Ropius might with his army come from Pisa. Now the letters of Ropius sailed great feast at Rome, and to make the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the City, some few days after he had made over his army unto Fabius, put them out of all hope, that the army which was in France could not possibly pass into Liguria, by reason of the war with the Britains, who immeased the planting of the colony of Aqui/a; against whom Fabius was gone, and might not possibly retire from thence, now that the war was once begun. The only hope they had therefore of aiding Emues was this, (yet the fame seemed to be with the latest, considering the urgent necessity of the time) in case the Consul made haste to go into their prouinces, which to do all the LL. of the Senat callet slow and earnestly unto them. But the Consuls denied it hastily to stir one foot before the levy of soldiers was fully finished; alleguing that it was not their slackness, but the violence of the plague, which caused it to be so late ere it were performed. Yet for all this was the general accord and content of the Senat, that they could neither will nor chuse but go forth of the City in their rich coats of arms, and by proclama nation to assign a certain day, upon which all the soldiers whom they had enrolled should meet at Pisa: and commission they had to take up military auxiliaries, all the country over as they went, to prefide them forth presently and have them away. Moreover, the Pretors, P. Petilius and Q. Fabius were both of them commanded, the one, namely, Petilius, to enrol in half a tabularium legionaries of Roman citizens, and tender the military oath to all that were not above fiftie years old: and Fabius, to levy of the Latin allies fifteen thousand foot, and eight hundred horsemen. The two Duvmvirs or Wardens for the navy and the ports were created, namely, C. Marcius and C. Lucertus, who were soon provided of ships ready rigged, trimmed and furnished to their hands. And Maniens, who had the charge of the coasts upon the gulf of Gaul, was commended to bring his fleet with all speed possible along, to the track of the Liguarians, if possibly he might any way stend L. Emues and his army. Emues after he perceived that no aid appeared from any place, supposing verily that the two horse men above-said, were intercepted and stifed by the way, thought good to put off no longer, but alone with his own forces, to try the fortune of a fight. And the coppen before the enemies came (who now already began more coldly and heavily to affaim them themselves) he put his men in battall array at the four gates of the camp, to the end that upon the signal given, they should all once from all parts rally forth. To the four extraordinary cohorts, he adjointed two other, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, and commanded them to break forth at the false postern gate called Extraordinaria: within the gate Principalis on the right hand, he embattled the Halitari or Lutiators of the first legion, and the pricipes of the fame legion in the rearguard to fecound them, commanded both by M. Scrivulis and L. Sulphus, two military Tribunes military. The third legio he marshalled full against the other gate Principalis on the left hand. This change only was here, that for the Pretors were set in the front, and the Hauliari behind in the tail of them. Sex. Inlvis Caesar and L. Aurelius Cotta, two military Tribunes had the leading of this legion. Q. Fabius Manlius a Lieutenant, having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Quelloria. Two cohorts and the Triarii of two legions had commandment to stay behind for the defence of the camp. The Generall himself in person rode all about from gate to gate, exhorting and encouraging his men: using all the forcible means he possibly could devise, to provoke and what the fluxacks of his foildiers, and to give a poynant edge to their courage and choler: one while reproaching his enemies for their falsehood and treachery, who having ceased peace and obtained truce; during the time of the said truce, against all law of nations were come to affaim the camp: another while shewing and declaring unto them what shame and indignity it was for the Roman army to be befied by the Liguarians, who more truly may be accounted thevves and robbers than go for warlike enemies. If (quoth he) you should escape from hence, not by your own vertue and valour, but through the help and succour of others, with what face shall any of you able to meet, I say, not those fouldiers who have vanquished Annibal, defeated Philip, and subdued Antiochus, the mightieft King, and greatest commander of our age: but even them who many a time have hunted and chased the very fame Liguarians like brut beasts, over the wilds and forrests as they fled, and bewed them in pecces in the end.

That
That which the Spaniards, that which the Gauls, that which the Macedonians and Carthagians, dared not entreprise, namely, to approach and enter upon the remnant of the Roman camp: shall a Ligurian enemy adventure to do? Shall he of his own accord presume to befeigel and assail our camp, whom heretofore when we best all the blind buffets, by woods and thickets, to start him out, we had much ado to find, he lay to close and lurked to covertly? At these words the Gauls set up a connotatant crow in token of applause, and answered him with a general shout, saying, there was no fault on their part, seeing that no man had given them the signal to stuff forth and make a folly. For let him but once say the word to sound the trumpet, he should see and find, that both Romans and Ligurians were the same still as before-time. Now the Ligurians kept two camps on the near side of the mountains against the Roman legate, from whence (for the first days to the sun was up) they used to advance their ensigns, and march forward I well armed and ranked in battle array; but then they put no amm on their backs, nor took weapon in hand, before they had filled their bellies well with meat and their heads with wine: they came forth (I say) inspected and cut of order; as who hoped and trusted assuredly, that the enemies would not march under their ensigns without their rampart. Against then (coming thus in skirmish) the Romans suivd forth at once, out of all the gates in one instant with a mighty shout, which not only they who were within the camp set up, but also the laces, scullions, landers, and other drudges that follow the camp redeemed. This was such an unlocked for occurrence to the Ligurians, that they were fet, in so great an affright therewith, as if they had been surprised & beleaguer all about with sudden ambushments. For a small while there was some flaw of a conflict, such as it was; but anon they took their heels and fled for life; but as they fled, they left their lives K behind them in every place. Then the men of arms had the signal given to mount on horseback, to pursue them & not suffer one to escape alive: & to in this festival rout they were driven to shake their camp for safety: but in the end were dissiiized and turned out off: also. That day were slain of the Ligurians not so few as fifteen thousand, and 2500 taken prisoners. Within three days after, the whole nation of the Ligurian Ligurians, yeelded absolutely, and put in their hostages. A search was made for all the piles and mariners, who had ex-relish piracy on the sea, and they were all laid up fall in prison. Sempiby C. Mummius one of the Duumvirs or wardens of the navy met with two and thirty ships of that sort, belonging to men of war upon the coast of Liguria, and boarded them. To carry these news to Rome, 1st letters to the Senat, L. Aurelius Cotta, and C. Sulpicius Cotta were sent to Rome: who also were to require that L. Escipio, (when his time was expired) might depart out of his province, and bring his soldiers from thence with him, and to discharge them of service. Both these demands were granted by the Senat, and solemn procession besides was ordained in all churches and chapels, and at every shrine and altar for three days space. The Pretors also were commanded, solicits, to call and dimine the legions of the city, and Fabiius, to remit the Latin allies the levying and murthering of their soldiers. Also there was order given to the Pretor of the city, to write unto the C. a. to give them to understand, that the Senat thought it meet and reason, that the fubjed soldiers (who were enrolled in half for the fuddlin tumults and stans) should all speed be licenced to depart. The same yeer the colony of Gravers was planted in the territory of Tuscania, which in times past was conquered from the Tuscusians, and five acres of land was set out to every man. The T. Livius who had the charge thereof to distribute the lands, were C. Calpurnius Vispo, P. Claudius Pulcher, and C. Terentius Litra. A yeer it was of note, in regard of the drought that happened the year following, and the dearth of corn and all other fruits of the earth. For recorded it is, that in six month space it never rained one drop.

The same year it forord, that as certain plow-men and labouers plowed and digged some-what deep within the ground, in the lands of L. Persius (secretary, (which lands lay under the hill Isemnulm) there were found two coffers of tone, each of them about eight foot long and four foot broad, the lids and covers thereof were bound and lided with lead. Both these coffers had a superscription upon them in Greek and Latin letters to this effect, That in the one of them lay buried Same Pomponius the fon of Pomp, sometime King of Rome: and in the other, were belswed the books of the land Namn. The owner of this ground opened these coffers by the advice and counsel of his friends: and that which carried the title and inscription of the books thereafter, was found empty, without any shew or token of the religies of a mans body or soul thereof, by reason the bones and all were rotten and consumed, in continuance of time after many years past. In the other were found two fardles, wrapped within wax candles (for cear-clthes containing either of them leven books; which were not only whole and found, but also seemed very fresh and new. One set of them were written in Latin, as touching the Pictitey lawe; the other in Grecian, enstiled, The discipline or doctrine of Philosopher, such as those days might afford, Venerio Amstias faith moreover, that they were the books of Ptolemy, according to the common received opinion of Namn, that he was the disciple of Pitypos of egypt, giving credit to a probable lie, resembling a truth. These books were first read by those friends of his who were present at the place where the coffers were opened; but afterwards as they came into more men hands to be read, it chanced that O. Petrus, the lord chief judge of the city, deigning to peruse those books, borrowed them of L. Persius, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, by reason that the abovenamed Quamnius Petrus had chosn the fore and Lucius into the deceny of the States and secretaries, who after he had read the titles with the summaries and A and contents of every chapter, and finding the most part thereof, tending directly to abolish the state of the religion then established, laid unto L. Petilius, that he purposed to fling those books into the fire; before he did so, he would permit him to use what means he thought by order of law, or other woman would serve his turn to recover the said books out of his hands, and good leave he should have to take that comic without his displeasure, or any breach of friendship between them. The Scribe or notary aforesaid went to the Tribunes for their assistance, the Tribunes put the matter over to the Senators, before whom the Pretor said plainly, that he was ready to take his corporal oath, if it were to put to it, that those books ought neither to be read nor kept. Whereupon the Senate judged, that for such a matter the offer only of the Pretors oath was sufficient, and that the books should be burned with all speed possible in the open place of assemblies called Cumitii; but they awarded with all that they should be paid unto Q. Petilius the right owner as much money for the books, as the Pretor and the more part of the Tribunes of the Common's acquitted them worth. The Scribe would touch none of money; but his books were burnt in the said place before all the people in a light fire, made by the ordinary servitors attending upon the fœtices.

The same summer there arose suddenly a great war in the higher Spain. The Celtiberians had gathered a power of five & thirty thousand men, a number more then lightly at any time before they had levied. Now was Q. Fulvius Flaccus, lord Deputy of that province. He for his part, because he was advertized that the Celtiberians put their youth in arms, had raised and assembled before the town Eburas, after he had planted a mean garrison within it. A few days after the Celtiberians pitched their tents within two miles from thence under a little hill. When the Roman Pretor perceived they were come, he sent his brother Martius Fulvius with two companies of the horsemen of allies in espial, to view the enemies camp. Billing him to approach as near to the trench and rampier as he could, and to see what compass the camp took, but to forbear skirmishing, and in any hand to retire, in case he perceived the cavalry of their enemies made out against him.
According to this direction, in did in every respect. And to fore certain date together, there was nothing done, but only these two companies of horsemen shewing off, and afterwards retiring back to loom as the cavalry of the enemies effused out of their camp. At length the Celtiberians also came forth and advanced forward with all their power, as well horse as foot, and having let them in ordainance of bataill, flasted as it were in the midde between. The whole ground was a smooth and even plain, fit to join a bataill in. There stood the Spaniards (119) expecting their enemies: But the Roman Pretor kept his men within the rampier four miles together still; and they likewise of the other side held the same pace full in bataill array. The Romans all that while filtered not a foot. The Celtiberians then seeing the enemies relented fight, held themselves quiet also within their camp: only the horsemen rid forth: and they kept a corps de guard, to be in readiness if peradventure the enemies should be buffed and come abroad. Both of the one side and other, they went out of the back side of their camp to purse forage and fuel, and impeached not one another. The Roman Pretor, supposing now that after so many days rest, the enemies were born in hand, and hoped fully, that he would never begin first, commanded L. Aelius to take with him the left wing of the cavalry, and fix thousand of the provincial auxiliaries, and to fight a compasse about the hill which stood behind the enemies; and from thence to loom as they heard a cry, to run down again and charge upon their camp. And because they might not be discovered, in the night they departed. Flaccus the next morning by peep of day, sent out C. Scribonius, (a colonel of the allies) against the enemies camp, with the extraordinary horsemen of the left wing: whom when the Celtiberians beheld both approach nearer to them & also more in number then usually they had been, they put forth all their cavalry at once out of the garisons & withal gave the signal to the infantry also to come abroad. Scribonius, according to the directs on given, lo loom as ever he heard the first noise and shout of the horsemen turned the head of his horse, and retired back full upon the camp; there with the enemies followed more freely first the horsemen, and within a while the footmen also, making full account to be mete with the Romans leaguer that day, and verily now were they put out hal's a smile. When Flaccus supposed that they were turned far enough from their camp, for inclosing in, he issued forth at once in three places with his army arranged before in order of battalions within, and causeth them to let up a mighty cry, not only to astonish the footiers to the combat, but also that their fellows behind the hill might hear it. Who made no stay, but presently ran down and fell upon the eneimies, as they had in charge, where there were left in guard not above five hundred armed men. By reason therefore, that they within were few, the enemies without to many, and the enterprise to find out and unlooked for, they were mightily terrified, and so in manner without any skirmish and resistance at all, their hold was forced and won. Aelius set on fire that camp, which might as well be seen of them that were fighting in the plain. Now the Celtiberians which stood behind in the rearguard, were the first that discovered the flame, but afterwards it was noted and went current through the main bataill, that their camp were lost and all on a light fire. The enemies were greatly amazed, but the Romans much more animated. For now they might hear the sound of their fellows, having the upper hand, now might they see the cent of their enemies burning with bright flames. The Celtiberians for a while stood in silence, doubt fall what to do; but afterwards, perceiving they had no place of safe retreat, upon their direction they should fall to running away, they saw no other hope but in fighting it out, and do they began to renew the skirmish in which, with more resolution than before, fiercely they were encountered and charged in the midst of their battle by the Silesians; but against the left flank and wing, where they saw the head and advanced the enemys with more boldness and confidence. And verify that left wing of the Romans was at the point to have retreated, but that the right wing fell stayed and incurred the man and woman that were left within, Ebrar and another, came from town in the very midst, and burst of the confed; and Aelius from another part, placed on their backs. Down went the Celtiberians strong armed, and were cut in pieces between.
As many as remained, made flight to flee and escape on all hands in every quarter. The cavalry was sent out after them two times in several bands; who also committed great slaughter and execution.
That day were slain of the enemies about 23,500; 4,000 taken prisoners, with five hundred hurt and above; besides 80 military enemys gotten from them and carried away. A great victory this was, but not without blussent of the Roman part; for of two legions they died somewhat more than two hundred; but of Latin allies 2,500, of forren men, much about 2,400 the lives in the field. The Pretor then retires with his victorious army into his own camp. Aelius was commanded to abide still in that of their enemies, which he had forced and won. The next morrow they tell to gather up the spoils of their enemies, and those who had born themselves valiantly in that service among the rest, were rewar'd with gifts in a full and frequent assembly of the whole army. After this, when the hard and marred were brought back into the town, Ebrar, the K legion were led through the country, Corpetasia, towards Combricia. This City which it was once besieged sent to the Celtiberians for succour; but they came not in time: not for any slack-ness of their part, but because after they were departed from home, & had entered on their journey, the Xew was a hundred and clad them, which they were not able to pass for the continual rain that fell over, and besides, the waters were cut and the rivers swelled to height, that possibly they could not come forward; whereas upon the besieged inhabitants being in dispair of help, from their friends, retired the town. Ebrar likewise was forced by the storm and tempestuous weather to put his army into the same City. Now the Celtiberians, who were on foot in their journey, and not aware that their friends had intrusted, at length having pass'd over the rivers (when the rain gave over and the weather took up) came to Combricia, but seeing no camp whereabout the walls, and supposing that it was either removed to the other side, or the enemies dislodged and gone, they approached the town, and marched closely and tetchingly so forward in disarray. The Romans fall'd upon them at two gates, fell upon them (distressed as they were) and put them to the rout. But how what hapned? that thing which huse they them that they could not make head resistance, and left themselves to begin fight (namely) because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies about their colours. The same stood them in good stead to lose many of their lives that fled. For they ran to scattering, and were to spread all over the places that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thick together, to compare them about on every side. Howbeit 2,400 of them were killed, and above 5,000 taken prisoners, besides 400 hurt, 62 ensigns of war won from them. Those who after their flagging fight retired homeward, met with another troop of Celtiberians coming forward, unto whom they reconcounted the yielding up of Combricia and their own misfortune; by which means they caused them to turn and go back again, who immediately lapt away in their villages and forts.
Then Ebrar departed from Combricia, and conducted his legions through Celtiberia was-sting and spoiling as he went where he forced many castles until the greater part of that country was reduced under his obedience. These affairs passed in high Spain that year. As for the lower province, Manlius the Pretor fought fortunately in certain battles against the Portugals.

The same year a Colony of Latins was placed in Aquileia, within the territory of the Gauls; and thither were conducted three thousand footmen, and every one of them were endowed with fifty acres of land. The Centurions besides had a hundred, and the lieutenants a hundred and forty acres specie given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Naesica, C. Flamininus, and L. Manlius Acidinus. In which year also two Temples were dedicated, the one to Venus Erica near the gate Collina (which L. P. Varia-licius the son of Lucius dedicated, being a Dunumvir depur'd for that purpose, and had been vowed before by L. Porcius the Confid in the Ligurian war) the other to the goddess Lecta, in the herb market: and of this chappell M. Acilius Glabrio the other Dunumvir, b'd the dedication; where, before erected and set up in the honor of his father Glabrio, a gilt statue, which was the first gilded image that ever was made in Italy. This Glabrio the father was he, who had vowed to consecrate the said Temple that very day on which he fought the battle against R. Antiochus, at Thermopyle, and by warrant from the Senat, had bargained for the building thereof at a price. In those dates wherein these holy houles were consecrated, L. Emnlius Paulus the Proconsul, triumphed over the Ligurian Irgunes. He had born before him three and twenty golden Coronets, and besides them there was no gold or silver else carried in that triumph. But many principal Ligurians, men of mark, whom he took captive, were led before his chair. He dealt among his boulders, 300 Asles specie. The fame of this triumph of his, was much more rencended by this occasion, that the Ligurian Embassadors were to have a perpetual peace with the Romans by saying, That their whole nation were resolved, never to take arms again, but by commandment and licence of the people of Rome, Q. Fabius the Pretor, returned this answer unto them by the advice of the Senat. That it was no news to hear this language from the Ligurians; but it stood them upon and was becommg rather, to carry a new mind, and the same agreeable to their speech: and therefore they should go to the Contuls, and do by them which they were enjoined: forasmuch as the Senat would believe none but the word only of the Contuls in the behalf of the Ligurians, as touching their true and sincere meaning to observe peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians: but there was a battle fought in Canoba, with the Islanders there; in which M. Furius the Pretor flew 2000 of them in the field: which defeat compelled them to give hostages, and besides 100000 pound weight of wax. From thence the army was conducted into Sardinia, where passed some fortunate battles against the Ligurians, a nation at that day not fully quieted & appeased. In this very year also were the hundred hostages rendered back, gain to the Barbarians, with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their own parts, as in the behalf of K. M. Rufius, who, at that time with an armed garrison, held the possession of that territory in question. The Contuls in their province still and had nothing to do. M. Babini was sent for to Rome, against the general assembly for the election of magistrates: who created Contuls, A. Pabolius Albinus Lucretius and C. Calpurnius Piso. After this, were elected Pretors Tb, Sempronius Gracchus, A. Pabolius Albinus, P. Cornel. Maneretus, T. Minucius Mellius, A. Hœfisius Manucci, and C. Mancius; and they all entered into their magistracy upon the 15 day of March.

C. In the beginning of that year wherein A. Pabolius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso were Contuls: A. Pabolius the Contul brought into the Senat those persons who were come from Q. Fulvius Flaccus: out of the bitter province of Spain; to wit L. Minucius his Lieutenant generally, and the two Colonels, T. Minucius and L. Maffilius. These men after they had made report of two battles fortunately fought against the Celts, that their country yielded and brought under their subjection; and that the term of government in that province was expired; and no more left to be done there; so as there was no need either of the ordinary money which was wont to be sent for soldiers pay, or of corn to be carried unto the army for that year: requisted of the Senat first to regard of their happy successe, to yield honour and praise to the immortal gods: and then, that Q. Fulvius might depart and come his wages out of the province, and bring with him that army of his from thence, whole valiant service, both himself and also many Pretors before him had used: which (say they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisite and needful in a manner to be done: forasmuch as the Celts were so stiffnecked and obstinate, that it seemed impossible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dismissed: or else break out into some dangerous fire of a mutiny, if a man should go about to keep and hold them back by strong hand. The Senat gave order that Liguria should be the province for both Contuls: which done, the Pretors also called lots for theirs. To A. Hœfisius fell the civil jurisdiction over the cities; and to Minucius over the foragers: P. Cornelius had the government of Sicily; C. Mancius of Sardinia. Unto L. Pabolius was allotted the farther part of Spain, and to Tb Sempronius the bitter. This Sempronius (because he was to succeed Q. Fulvius) fearing his province should be left naked and disfurnished of the old soldiers, I demand (ad be) of you, O L. Minucius, since you bring word that there is no more trouble behind of that province, whether you think that the Celts will continue fast in their allegiance for ever, to as, that province may be protected and hold in obedience without any army at all? And if you cannot undertake to assure us of the faith and loyalty of their Barbarians & do advise us in any hand to maintain an army in those parts, whether you will give counsel to the Senat, for to send supplies into Spain that they only should be called and discharged, who have served out their full years required by law, and so that new and raw soldiers be mangled with the rest of the old? or that the old soldiers should full and whole be removed out of the province, and new legions enold, and sent either in their stead? considering that the small account that usually is made of such fresh and untrained soldiers, were enough to induce and move even the more quiet and peaceable part of Barbarians to rebel and make war again? Soon said it is, but not fiscally done, to have made an end of all troubles in this province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to war, and prone ever and anon to make insurrections, Some few Cities, as far as I can hear, and namely, those which being near unto the soldiers lying in winter garrison, were by them held in awe and kept down, have yeelded and are become subject, but they that were further off, be in arms still and have weapon in hand. Which being so, I tell you (my L. L.) even now before hand, that I will perform my service to the Commonwealth, with the help of that army which is there already at this present, but in case Flaccus bring away those legions with him will chuse those our retors which are in peace, to winter in, and nothazard my young and new soldiers among them; to be presented to the devotion and mercy of most fierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answered to their demands in this manner, That neither himself nor any man else was able for his life to divine and foreordain what was in the heart of the Celts now, and what they would mind and intend to do hereafter; and therefore he could not deny, but the better policy it was to lend an army among those Barbarians (peaceable though they seemed to be at present) before

cauae as yet they are inured to government, and cannot well skill of being subjects. But whether H it beme more expeditent to employ new forces, as the old, it is for him to speak and set down, who upon his knowledge can by how loyally the Celtharians will carry themselves in time of peace, and is withall assur'd, that the souldiers will hold them content and quiet, if they be detained any longer in the province. But if a man may conjeeture, and give a guess what they thin their heart, either by their grumbling words secretly one to another; or their speeches uttered in the presence and hearing of their General, when he maketh orations to them in publick audicence I tell you truly they have cried out with open mouth, that either they will keep their Generall with them in the province, or home they will with him into Italy. This debate between the Preter and the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter propounded before the Senat by the Conuls, which thought it meet and reasonable, that order should be taken for their own furniture and in that forth with men, money, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were spoken or treat of as touching the Preter his army. So, ordained it was, that the Con. should have their entire army of new souldiers, to be in each of them two legions of Rom.
citizens with their cavalry, together with the small and unaccustomed number at all other times of Latine allies, namely, 15000 foot and 800 horse. And with this power they had in charge to make war against the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Babus, they continued still in place of command, and were willing to hold their provinces, until the Conuls were thither come. Then they were commanded to discharge the army which they had, and so to return to Rome. After this, speech there was concerning the army of Tib. Sempronius, and the Conuls had warrant to enroll now a new legition, consisting of five thousand and two hundred foot and 400 K horse; and besides, 1000 footmen, and 50 horse of Roman citizens. Likewise the Latine nation was charged with a levy of 7000 foot, and 300 horse. With which army it was thought good, that Tib. Sempronius should 3 go into the higher province of Spain. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all those souldiers, as well Romans as allies, which had been transported over into Spain before the Conulship of Sp. Posthumus and Q. Marcius; and more than that (after a new supply was come, the upplintage in two legions above 1400 foot, and 600 horse, and the over-plus of 12000 footmen of Latins, and six hundred horsemen; and namely, those whose valours service C. Fulvius had tried and found in two battles against the Celtharians. Moreover, thereon proceeded and thanksgiving were by authority ordained for his happy managing of the affairs of the Common-wealth; & the rest of the Pretors were lenient into their provinces, Q. Fabini Edus had his commission renewed to govern Gallia full. Thus it was agreed in the Senat-house, that there should be eight legions maintained and kept in pay, three over and above the old army in Liguria, which was in good hope shortly to be committed. Howbeit, even these forces (being no greater then they were) barely could be made full and complete by reason of the pestillence which now three years had raged, and dispeopled the City of Rome and all Italy. During which plague the Preter T. Minutius, and not long after him, the Conul C.Caefarinius died: with many other brave and famous persons of each degree and quality. So as at length these men began to hold this depopulation and calamity for a prodig-cous stroke and strange wonder. Whereupon C. Serelius the Arch-bishop was charged, to search out means for to appease the wrath and anger of the gods, and the Deceivers like-wit he peruse, the books of Sibylia: the Conul, to vow certain presents and oblations, to Jun Apoll, Asellapós and Lady Smyr. and to set upon their images garnished with gold: which he vowed and executed accordingly. The Deceivers proclaimed supplications & prayers to deities together for the health of the people, throughout the City, and in all market towns and places of frequent resort and affectly. Above twelve years of age, wore chaplets & garlands of flowers upon their heads; & bare branches of laurel in their hands, whiles they were at their prayers & devotion. Moreover, ther was crept into mens heads a suspicion that some devilish and wicked hand might be the cause of all this. Whereupon by an act of the Senat, a commission was granted unto C.Caefarinius the Pre-tor (who was inlubircted and chosen in the room of T. Minutius) to make search and diligent inquiry after all confessions of poison & the praetors thereof, within the City, & for the compass of ten miles about every way; in like manner, to C. Minus, for to sit in the enquiry thereof bef-fore he enrolled above into his province of Sardinia in all the mist-towns and places of assem-blly which were more than ten miles off, from Rome. Of all others, the Conul his death was most suffered. For given out it was, that Quarta Hostilia his wife, had murdered him; but when he was fnecost, that her own son Q. Fulvius Pletus, was declared Conul in place of his father in law and mothers husband, the death of Piso the Conul began to be more infamous and suspicions a great deal then before. And witnesseth there came forth ready to depose, that after Albuns and Piso were pronounced Conuls (in which election the fald Pletus was rejected and suffered a repulse) his mother reproached him therewith, and laid it in his dhis, that this was the third time that he had for the Conulship and gone without: adding moreover, and willing him to be ready to stand for it again, for that the would work and bring it about, that within two months he should be Conul. Among other testimonies and depositions making for the cause and tending to the same, that speech he also, taking effect too truly and so just within the time, was thought ful sufficient to condemne Hostilia.

In the beginning of this spring, whiles the levy of souldiers flaid the new Conul at Rome, whiles the death of the one and the choosing of the other into their place, caues all thing there A to go more flowly forward; in the mean time, Corneius and Fabius had done nothing worthy of the remembrance during the Consulship; led their armies against the Ligurian Apuans. These Ligurians, who before the coming of the Consuls into the province looked for no war, were surprized at unwilling; and to the number of 12,000 of them yeelded: whom Corneius and Fabius resolved (upon advice had first with the Senate by letters) to transport from the mountains, into plains and spacious country from their own home; to the end they should have no more hope to return, for otherwise they supposed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samnis country a certain territory belonging in common to the people of Rome, which sometimes had been in the tenure and possession of the Tarraucas. In which place they being deific to plant the Ligurian Apuans, published an edit, That they should defend down the mountains Asides, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that ever they had. But the Ligurians sent their Embassadors oftentimes to intreat, but they might not be forced to abandon their domestical gods, the place of their nativity, and the sepulchers of their ancestors; and there with promised to deliver up their armor, and to put in hostages. Howbeit, seeing they could not prevail, and having not strength and power enough to wage war again, they obeyed the edict and proclamation. So there was translated from thence at the public charges of the City, to the number of four thousand persons free born, together with their women and children: and unto them was allowance made of 15,000 Sellerces, toward the building of new houses. And to distribute and divide land among them the same men (to wit, Corneius and Fabius) had commission given to also removed them into those parts. However at the request of their train, there were Quooscerus or five commanders of soldiers granted unto them by the Senate, by whole advice they might manage all. These affairs being finished, after they had brought with them to Rome their old army, they obtained of the Senate a grant to triumph. And those were the first that ever triumphed under a war before. Only the enemies were led in flux before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and won for to be carried or led in pomp; neither was there ought to be seen in their triumphs, which might be dealt and given among the soldiers.

The same see Fulvius Flaccus the Pretor in Spain, by occasion that his Successor flayed long ere he came into the province, brought forth his army into the field out of his wintering camp, and began to wait and spoil the farther parts and territories of Celtiberia: from whence the inhabitants came not in to inform and do their homage and fealty. By which deed of his, he rather provoked and angered the barbarous people, then terrified them: for when they had secretly gathered together certain forces and companies, they beleaguered and barred the passage Mainaturnum, by which they were afferrd that the Roman army would passe, as L. Paullusus Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spain, Gracchus his colleague charged him, to adversary Fulvius Flaccus for to bring his army to Tartessus, for that he proposed there to discharge his old fellows to distribute the supply which he brought, & to range, in order at his army by companies. Notice was given to Flaccus of the very day (which was the 29th) upon which his successor would come. This new occasion caused Flaccus to lay aside the enterprizes which he intended, and in all haste to withdraw his forces out of Celtiberia. The barbarous people knowing not the cause hereof, but supposing that he had some holding of their revels, and how they had in secret cast armies, and that thereupon he was fore-advis'd, guarded and stopped the passage much more particularly. Now to soon as the Roman army was cut off into the past one morning betimes at the break of day, the enemies arose sudainly: once out of two parts, and charged the Roman: which when Flaccus perceived, he gave commandment by the sound of the Cetturias, that every man should keep his place and find his ground, to have his arms and weapons in readinesse, by which means he appeas'd the tumult and striight in his hold. Then after he had brought all his labouring beasts with the baggage, unto one place the embattled and put in array all his bands and companies, partly by himself in person, and partly by his Lieutenants and Colonels, according as the ground and the time required, throwing no sign at all of fear, but putting his men in mind of the enemies, in these terms: Ye have (quoth he) to do with those that twice already yielded have yeelded unto us, who are inured and practiced in wickendness & perjury; not bettered in vertue and courage: those I say who are like to make our return home honorable and glorious, which other wise would have been obscure and nothing memorable: it was as we shall carry to Rome for a triumph, our swords all bloody and newly bathed in the green wounds and lieath massacre of our enemies; and bear away the spoils of their bodies, all embers and full dropping with their blood. Time would not permit him to lay any more, for now the enemies advanced forward, and the charge was already given in the utmost skirts of the army, and among the main battels encountered and joyed in conflict. The fight was hot and cruel alike in all parts, but the fortune divers: for the Roman legions in the main battel fought valiantly, and the two wings of either hand did their devote as bravely. The auxiliary strangers had to do with enemies armed in deed at all points like to themselves, but better foulders by ods then they were in lurch fort, as they were over-charged by them, and could not make good their ground. The Celtibrians perceiving they were not able to match the legions in ranked battel and close hand, fight, called their companies into a pointed and coin-formed battelion, for to pierce perforce and enter upon their enemies in which manner of fight they are to strong, that it is not possible to withstand them, wherover they give their violent charge. And then the legions also were put in disarray, and and the whole main battle after a fort, was disabandoned and broken. Which disorder and fear full trouble when Flaccus perceived he rode a gallop to the legionary men of arms: What? (qtd. he unto them) is there no help at all in you? and shall this army here be thus defeated utterly and come to nought? Whereat they cried on all hands to him to give direction and speak only the word what he would have done, & he should see how they would belief themselves in the execution of his command. Mary (quoth he) double your troops, you that are the hormen of two legions, and run your horses with full carrier against that wedge-formed battalion of the eneemies, where they preface upon our men; and this shall you perform with the more violence of your horses, if you disride them and let them have full head, and to set spurs and rush in among them: which we have re- din stories, that the Romans many a time have professed to their great prate and honour. No sooner said, but done it was; plaue were the bridles over their horse heads; twice they ran through the mids of them to and fro in turn and side to another, brake all their lances upon the enemies, overthrew them, and made foul work and slaughter among them. When this pointed bataillon of the Cetiberians was once broken, (even the whole and only hope they bad;) then they began to fear and tremble, then were they at the point to quitt the fight, and to look about them which way to take their flight. The extr ordinary Cavalry in the out-wings (seeing to brave a service performed by the Roman horfmen) were enkindled and incendied by their valorous example, and of their own accord without attendance of any mans commandment, charged upon their enemies, thus disordered and in disarray already. Then the Cetiberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Roman General seeing them once turn back and throw their pin-parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna aequiatri, and to exhibit ga-# the honor of lap Opt. Macc. The Cetiberians, thus disabandoned and scattered in the rout all over the length of the strait passage, were killed and cut in peaces. It is recorded that there shewed that day seventeen thousand enemies, and were taken prisoners alive more than three thousand, together with 27 field enigns, and well neer eleven hundred horses. For that day, the victorious army lodged within no camp at all; yet was not this victory to clear, but it cost them the loss of some foundiers; for of the Romans were slain four hundred seventy and two; of allies (and namely of Latins) 1019; and together with them, sixtoundiers three thousand. Thus the army having by this good hand recovered their ancient honor and glory, was conducted to Turcocy.
Thb. Sempronius the Preter, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius in the way as he came, and shewed how he rejoiced on his behalf, for this good managing and G happy achieving the affairs of the commonwealth: which done, they agreed together with great accord as touching the foundiers, namely, whom to care and send away, and whom to retain in service. Then Fulvius having dispatched the foundiers that were discharged, took his journey to Rome; and Sempronius conducted the legions into Celtiberia.

Both the Confuls led their forces into Liguria, and entered the country in two divers quarters.
Ptolemaeus with the first legion and the third, beat and invested the two mountains Balisga and Suifmontium, and to thrivably he kept the narrow pases of those parts with his gardions, that he cut them off from all traitors, and manned them with extreme severity and want of all thing.
Fulvius with the second legion and the fourth. After he had assaild the Apus Ligurians from the coast of Pife, received submission and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the said Macc, and when he had embarked upon seven thousand of them, he sent them over to Naples, encalving along the Tuscan sea. From whence they were brought into the Samnian country, and a certain territory assigned them to inhabit amongst the rest of this countrymen. As for Ptolemaeus, he cut down the vineyards, and burnt the corn of the Ligurian mountaineers, so long until they were driven by all manner of calamities following war, to come in and submit, and to deliver up their armor and weapons. From thence Ptolemaeus departed and took the sea, because he would visit the coasts of the Ligurian Lingaues and Intemelians. Now before that those Confuls came to the army which was appointed to meet at Pise, it chanced A. Ptolemaeus, & M.
Fulvius Nobiliter, the brother of Q. Fulvius, were the commanders, and had the command there.
This Fulvius was a Colonell of the second legion, who during the time of those months, wherein by turn he had the command and charge thereof, dissimulated that legion, having bound the Centurions by an oath, that they should make payment back of their wage many whole and truly to the Queders in the chamber and treasury of Rome. Notice hereof being given to A. Ptolemaeus at Placentia, (for thither it hapned that he was gone) he rode after those called foundiers, and purpumed them with a company of light horfemen. As many of them as he could overtake, after he had checked and rebuked them for their fault, he brought to Pise; of the rest he gave information to the Conful. Who put the matter to question, and after it had been debated in council, about of the Senat palled against the said M. Fulvius, that he should be confined and sent into Spain beyond new Carthage. And letters he had given him to carry from the Conful to P. Manlius into the far ther province of Spain. As for the foundiers, they were commanded to return again to their colours, and for an ignominious disgrace of that legion, ordained it was, that for a full years pay they should be content and take up with six months wages. And what soldiers required not to the army accordingly, the Conful had warrant and commissio to make sale of him and all that he had.

The same year L. Duverius, who was returned with ten ships to Brundisium from out of Illyricum (where he sat as Preter of the former year) leaving his ships there in the road, came to Rome.
A where in discoursing of the acts by him done, he laid the whole fault of all the recovery and peace at sea upon C. Sempronius, the King of the Illyrians, saying, that all the ships which had lain upon the coast of the Adriatic sea, came out of his realm. For which he had sent Embassadors to complain, but they could not ever find means to speak with the King about it. Now they were Embassadors arrived at Rome from Sempronius, who avouched, that when the Romans came to parle with the King, he bann'd to be lack in the most remote parts of his kingdom: and therefore Sempronius, their King and mater requested the Senate, not to give credit to those false accusations and forged flanders which his enemies had raised and informed against him. But} Durio, in councilled moreover, that divers and londry persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his dominion, had received many wrongs: yea, and by report certain Roman citizens were slain and

B detained at Corcyra. Whereupon it was in council thought good that they should be brought to Rome, and that C. Claudius the Pretor should have the hearing of the matter, before such time no answer would be given unto King Sempronius or his Embassadors.

Among many others that the plague this year continued, certain priests and prelates also died, and namely, L. Valerius Flaccus, a bishop, in whole room was chosen C. Q. Fabius Labo. Also P. Mamilius one of three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feasts. In whole head Q. Fulvius the son of Marcus was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very young, and not out of his em* Pretexation. But as touching the King of sacrificers, who was to be chosen in place of C. C. Servius the Archibishop, and Cornelianus, who was that which Dobellus one of the Dunumvir for the navy. For when the bishop would have had him to resign that office, that he might consecrate and inaugurate him the King sacrificer, he refused it to do. For Lycus

C which cause the bishop put a round fine on the Dunumvir his head. Then Dobellus appealed to the whole people, and before them it was to be tried, whether the said fine should be taken off or paid. Now the end of the when most of the tribes called into the mails for to give their voices, advin'd the Dunumvir to obey the bishop, and vowed the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that office which he had, so long it lighted at the very instant from heaven, which is the only continuous sign that interpreted the assemblies of the people. Whereupon the Colledge of the bishops made an humble temple of concurrence to inaugurate Dobellus, but they consecrated P. Claudius Scipio, who had been in the second place. In the end of the year C. Servinus Sempronius like the Archibishop himself departed this world, who also was one of the ten Decemvirs deputed for the holy ceremonies. And Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was by the colledge of the bishop, elected bishop in his room. But M. Aemilius Lepidus was created the sovereign Pontifex, not without many noble persons made lust therfore. Likewise Q. Marcius Philip and Decemvir for the holy ceremonies, who chosen in his place. Moreover, there deceased Sp. Posthumius an Augur, in whole head P. Secio the son of Africenna was elected by the Augurs. The same year granted it was to the inhabi-bants of cities, at their own request and petition, that they might commonly speak Latin as also to the publiccries, to make portia of goods in the Latin tongue. The Senat gave thanks to the Pilus for the offer they made them lands, wherein to plant a Colony of Latins. And three Triumvirs or Commissioners for that business were created, namely, Q. Fabius Buteo, Marcus and Publius, both named Postumus, and both named Lanicus. Letters were brought from M. Marcius the Pretor (who having the government allotted unto him of Sardinia, but commission also to enquire after the praetise of poynoning in all places, not within ten miles of the City of Rome) importing such much, that he had condemned already 3000 persons, and that the informations and pretentions multiplied daily, by reason of new masters discovered still, and therefore either he was to give over that inquisition, or to resign up his province Sardinia.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus returned out of Spain to Rome with great honour for his acts there achic-ved. Who remaining yet without the City, because of his triumph, was created Quintus with L. Manilius Asidius, and within few dates, made triumphal into Rome, accompanied with his soldiers, whom he had brought home with him. He carried in triumpha 2000 * golden coronets. Moreover in gold 33 pound weight, besides 173,200 pieces of coin in Olean silver. He dealt to his soldiery fifty Denari pieces out of the booty and pillae which he had gotten. To every Centurion it gave him double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that served on horseback silver. The like he did by the Latin allies, and to all in general he paid double wages. This year was the law first proposed by L. Iulius a Trib. of the Com. atouching the year of the age requisit and meet for to be given for any publick office, or to exercise the same. And hereupon it came, that the whole race of that family was named * Annals. Many years after there were created four Pra-tors according to the law Biblio, which provided that there should be each other year chosen four Prato from princes and cities, to let his triumph. and C. Valerius in Sardinia. Q. Fulvia the Consul, before that he went in hand with any at.

Jars of State, said he would both discharge himself and all the City of the duty to Godward, in performing the vows which he had made. He declared that on that very day when he fought his last battle with the Celts, he had made a vow to exhibit games to the honor of that most mighty and gracious god Jupiter, and likewise to build a temple to Fortuna Taurina: and how thereto the Spaniards, he had contributed certain items of money. So a decree passed, that those plains should be let forth: and two Decemvirs chose, to give order and bargain for the edification of the same temple. Likewise there was set down a certain time of many to be disputed for the deferring of the charges: to wit, not exceeding that sum in the solemnity of the plains, which was allowed unto Fulvius Nobilior, when he exhibited the like sports after the end of the Etolian war. Item, that for these games he should not seek or fend for, gather or shave, receive or do any thing, contrary to the Act of the Senate, which in the time of L. Aemilius and Cn. Babinius Consuls was made touching such pallices. This decree the Senate ordained, by occasion of the supercilious and excessive expences employed about the plains of T. Sempurnus the Aedile; which were very chargeable not only to Italy and the Latin allies, but also to foreign provinces. The winter this year was very sharp, by reason of snow, and all manner of tempestuous weather. The trees were then tender and subject to frost and cold, were all blighted and killed: besides the winter lesion continued much longer then ordinary in other years. And thereupon the solemn follominy of the Latin holidays were troubled and disordered by a sudden and inapproachable frost and tempest upon the hill [Alba] that by an ordinance of the Bishops, it was celebrated again the second time. The same temple cast down certain images in the Capitol, and disfigred very many places with thunderbolts and flashes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of Jupiter in Tarraeina, the white temple at Capua: Item, the gate there called Romana, and the sateestments of the walls in divers places. Among these wondrous prodigies it was reported also from Romagna, that a rule was foaled with three feet. For this cause the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the books of Sibyls: and out of that learning they thought to what gods sacrifice should be made, & what number of beasts was to be killed. And because many places were with lightning defaced, they ordained that a solemn supplication should be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the foresaid games and plases which Q. Fulvia the Consul had vowed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten days together. After this followed the election of the Centoars, wherein M. Emilius Lepidus the Arch-bishop, and M. Fulvius Nobilibio, who had triumphed over the Etolians, were created. Now between these two men, there had been notorious enmity, oftentimes testified and feared in many sharp and bitter debates, both the Senate, and also before the people. When this election was ended, that two Centoars according to the ancient use and custom, sat upon their ivory chairs of estate in Mars field, near the altar of Mars. To whom there soon repaired thither, the principal Senators, accompanied with a troop besides of citizens: and among the rest, Q. Caecilius Metellus made a speech to this effect:
"My masters, you that are Centoars, we have not forgotten that an eon while were chosen by the universal body of the people of Rome: to be superintendents and wardens over us for our manners and behavior: and that it became us to be taught, admonished, & directed by you, and not by us. Howbeit we ought to tell and declare, what there is in you, that either is offensive M to all good men, or at least which they with were amended. When we behold and consider you severally apart, either you, M. Emilius, or you M. Fulvius, we have not this day in the City of Rome any men, whom if we were called to a new learning for to passe our voices again, we would prefer before you to this office and place of dignity. But when we see you both together, we cannot chuse but much doubt and fear that ye are very badly matched and cuplaimed as com-mansions in government: & that the common-weal shall not receive to much good by this. That ye please and like us all to well: as telling harm in this, That you dislike and dislike one anot-or. These many years together, there hath been great heart burning and much malice bete-tween you and the same must needs be grievous and hurtful unto your selves: but now it is to be leaved: & art this day forward, that rancor will be more prejudicial to us & the common, N well, than unto you. Upon what motives and cause are we thus feareful, much we could say, but that peradventure your irreconcileable anger is such, as hath wasted and postfixed wholly your spirits and minds already. These quarrels, jars, and grudges of years, we all in general would request you heartily to end this day, and in this very temple wherein we are assembled: and since the people of Rome by their voices have conjoined you one in office: suffer your selves by us to be linked & reconciled in perfect atonement. With one mind and accord, with one heart & counsel chuse the Senaor, review the Cavalry and Nightwatch of Rome: number the citizens atheir goods: purge and cleanse the City: & finally determine the solemnity of the centawith a sacrifice. And whereas in all your prayers well-mean, ye shall inter this ordinary form of words, That this thing, or that, may fall well in the end well and happily, to my self & unto my colleagues. See that you with the same truly; sincerely and from the very heart, that whatsoever ye shall pray unto the gods for, we may believe and all the world see, that ye desire the same to be effected indeed. T. Tasis & Remulius in this very City reign'd together with great utility & concord, in the midst whereof even in the very market place, they had encounters and joined battle together as mortal enemies with their stanch allies. But here it eminently have on no end, but wars also. And many a time most venemous and spiritful fees become fair and all,

The Oration of Metellus to the Centoars.
A the yeas, and otherwhiles near neighbors and fellow citizens. The Albans after their subversion and and utter ruin of their city, were brought over to inhabit Rome. The Latins & Sabins both, were endenized Romans. An old saying it is, and not to old as true, and for the truth become a common proverb, that enemies ought to be tunstatory and soon die, whereas friendship should continue so long as ever. At these words there aconfused burs among them there assembled, token of their content and approbation: and anon were heard the distinct voices of them all in general, craving and requesting of the Centurials the same; which making one cry, and brake off the speech of Metellus. Then Paulus among other matters complained that M. Furius had twice put him besides the Consulship, when other wise he was sure of. And Furius on the other side found himself grieved, that he evermore by Metellus had been provoked and that he had waged law by litigation against him to his disonor and disgrace. Yet both of them made fair and threw, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would remain and be overruled by so many honorable personages of the City. So, at the instant request of all them that were present, they shook hands and thereby allured one another to forgive and forget all matters past, and truly to make an end of malice; and be perfect friends again: whereupon they were much commended by the whole assembly, and conducted by them into the Capitol. Where the Senate approved and highly praised, as well the careful industry of the principal citizens, in effecting this so weighty a matter, as also the good nature and flexibility of the two Centurials. Who afterwards when they required to have a certain sum of money assigned unto them for to employ in the publick enemies and other works of the City, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one whole year.

B The same yeas L. Posthumius and Tit. Sempronius the Pro-Pretors in Spain agreed to together that Albans should make an expedition against the Vacci through Lusitania, and to return from thence into Ceilerris. But Gracchus went as far as the utmost quarter of Ceilerris, for that in those parts there was the greater war. And still he forced the city Munda, which he surprised instand in the night at unawares. Then, after he had received hostages, and put a garrison there, he went forward assaulting forts, and burning the villages, until he came to another City of exceeding strength, which the Cilurrians called Certosa: where, as he was about to approach the walls with his engines of battery, there came unto him other out of the City, who like good plain men of the old world, made a speech unto him, nothing dissembling but that they would war and be revenged, if their strength and forces were sufficient. For they required leave to pass to the Cilurrian camp, there to receive aid and succour: but if they could not speed, then they would conclude, that by themselves what to do. Good leave they had of Gracchus; and some few days after, they brought with them ten Orators more. About noone-tide it was of the day, and the first thing that they craved at the Prurtor his hand was this, That he would make them to drink before they parted. When they had once quaffed and corned round, they called again for more: whereas, all that were present and llood about them, laughed heartily, to see them to rude and uncivil, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldest man of the company began in this wise: We are sent (saith he) unto you from our nation, to know what afflited means hath induced you to levy war against us? To this demand Gracchus answered, That he comprehended the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant army; which (if they were to deferrous) he would do them the favour to see, that they might be able to make more certain report to their countrymen upon their own knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and knight marshalls, to put in arms and emaranell all the bands and companies, as well foot as horse; and then armed as they were to charge one another in manner of a battle. These Embassadors after they had once seen this sight, were sent away: who went directly to the Cilurrians their neighbors, and frightened them for sending any accourse to the City besieged. The townsman within having in vain the fire-lights in the night time aloft upon their turrets (which was the signal agreed upon between them) and seeing themselves delude of the only hope they had of aid, yielded by compulsion. So they were enjoined to make payment of four and twenty hundred thousand Settresses; and to deliver forty of their noblest gentlemen and best men of arms; not by way of hostages (for commanded they were to serve in the wars); and yet in truth, they stood for a paw of assurance for their fealty. From thence anon he marched to the City Alca, where the Cilurrians lay encamped and from whom of late the Embassadors appeared came: whom, for certain days he provoked to fight, making small skirmishes, by wearing out against their corps de guar the light-black armed vancouriers, to the end that scuffling together every day more then other he might train them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his design had taken eff & he commanded the captains of the auxiliary footiers, that after some their skirmish, they should make semblant as if they were overcharged with numbers, and to at once turn their backs, and file as fast as they could to their own camp; himself in the mean while put his men in a vallay array within the rampier at every gate. Long it was not, but he might see his own bands and companies returning back on let purpose, and running away, and after them the barbarous enemies following as hard as they could in chase. Now had be his army embarrasled for the purpose, and ready to receive them: and therefore he made no longer stay then only to suffer his friends and allies to enter at liberty into the camp, but he set up a loud cry, and at one instant fill'd forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to endure this unexpected violent charges and to they that were come to assail the camp of others, could not to much as de-

The fortieth Book of T. Livius.

The Roman city, whose battlements have been preserved, was on the site of the modern city of Rome. The city was surrounded by walls, which were first built by the Roman founder Romulus. The walls were strengthened over time, and the city grew to become one of the most important in the ancient world.

The city was not only a political center, but also a cultural and religious one. The temple of Jupiter was one of the most important buildings in Rome, and the city was also home to many other temples and shrines.

The city was also a center of commerce and trade, with many markets and shops. The city was a hub of information, with libraries and schools where people could learn and share knowledge.

The people of Rome were known for their bravery and courage, and the city was often at the center of important events in history. The city was a place of both peace and war, with many battles fought on its streets and in its fields.

The city of Rome was a place of wonder and mystery, with its history and culture still remembered and celebrated to this day. It is a testament to the power of the human spirit and the importance of memory and tradition.
A places in the tenure and occupation of private persons, they took order to be reduced to the use of the people in common, and to be let open for all comers. They changed the order of giving voices, and caused to enroll the tribes according to sundry quarters and divisions, having regard withall of the degrees of men of their trades, mysteries and occupancies. Alto the one of the Centors, M. Emilius lived unto the Senat, that allowance should be made unto him of money for the games and plates at the dedication of the Temple of Queen June and Diana, which in the Ligurian war he had vowed eight years before. He assigned there into him twenty thousandoubles. So he dedicated both those Temples in the circit or show-place of Flamininus, and gave also he station plates three days together after the dedication of the Temple of June, and two days after the other of Diana, and every one of those dates within the cirque Flaminian.

B The same Centor dedicated in Mars held a Chappell to the sea-gods, vowed by L. Emilius Regillus, eleven years before, in a naval battle at sea against the Captains of R. Antiochus. Over the gates which Chappell there was fixed a tablet with this title. For the appo^sing and composing of a great war between two kings, the field is a sacrifice... for to make peace. This conflict, when L. Emilius Regillus the Praetor, the son of M., Under the charge command, and government, shipped fortune, and conduct of him between Lycia, Samos, and Chios, the fleet of King Antiochus the eighth dates before the Cross of February was conquered, dispersed, burnt, burned, and put to flight, and there upon the same day two and forty Gallia were taken, with all the numbers and fortresses within them. After which King Antiochus and his Reina... in consideration heretofore made a Temple to the Sea-gods, whilst unto him in achieving the said other. Another table, likewise, with the same vame inscription, was set up and fastened over the gates of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. Within two dates after that the Centors had chosen a new Senat, Q. Fabius the Com, made an expedition against the Ligurians: and for that he paved his army over wilds and mountains, where no roads led them, through straight and plies of forrests, he fought a pitchy, barcell with the enemies, and not only won the field, but also in one and the fell-lame day forced their camp. Whereupon three thousand and two hundred of the enemies, and all that quarter of Liguria yielded unto him. Then the Comil placed there the that had bestirrered, in the plains and champain country, and planted garrisons upon the mountains. Letters herel, with great speed came to Rome: whereupon there were ordained preclusions for three dates. During which time of preclusion the Praetor's celebrated sacrifices, and killed forty greater bearts. But the other Comil

D A. Marmor did no expios worth remembrance in Liguria. Three thousand Transalpine Frenchmen passed over the Alps into Italy, in peaceable manner marshing without any hostility or harm doing, and requited of the Comil and the Senat a territory to inhabit, where they might remain quietly under the seignory of the Romans, but the Senat commanded them to avoid out of Italy; and gave the Comil Q. Fabius in charge to make search and enquiry into this matter, and to proceed against them who had been the captains and counsellors to pervert them to pass over the Alps. This very year died Philip King of the Macedonians, worn away to nothing, partly, for age and party, with grief of heart after the death of his son Demetrius. It is reported he kept his winter in Demetrias, tormented with anguish of mind for the loss and mists of his son, disquieted with remorse and repentance for his cruelty against him, which hung and prick'd his guilty conscience.

Besides, he saw his other son (whom now was the undoubted heir apparent of the Crown, as well in his own opinion as in the concit of others) how all men turned their eyes and courted to him. He considered withall, how his old age was decipled and forfeit whilst some expected his death, others did not so much as look for it, which was the greatest grief and trouble of all other. And together with him there was Antigonus the son of Echestratus, bearing the name of his uncle Antigonus by the fathers side, who had been guardian to Philip. This Antigonus the elder had been a man of princely port and regal majesty, renowned also for a brave conflict and noble battale against Celenoe and the Lacedamonian. And him the Greeks for distinction sake from other King, of that nation, named Tetr. His nephew or brothers son (I lay) Antigonus, of all the honourable friends that Philip had, was the only man that continued still and firm unto him without all corruption. But this his loyal fidelity and truth caused Percon to be no friend of his, but ther the most mortal enemy that he had in the world. This said Antigonus foreasting in his spirit in what dangerous terms he should stand, when the inheritance of the kingdom were devolved upon Percos waiting his first time and opportunity, when he perceived that the Kings mind was troubled, and that now and then he fetched deep sighs for sorrow that his son was dead: one while would give ear only to the Kings words, other while also would find some talk and minister occasion to speak of the act to rashly and undutifully committed. Oftentimes he followed and sided unto him in his moans and complaints, and would be thought to lament with him (or company. And as Truth withal sways to give many signs and tokens of her self coming to light) he would enforce and help forward every small thing that he could, to the end that all might the sooner be discovered and break forth. The chief ministers and instruments of this villainous act were Apelles and Philostratus, who were the Embassadors sent to Rome, and had brought those pernicious letters, under the name of Ptiminus, which wrought the death of Demetrius. For commonly it was given out through all the Kings Court, that those were falsified letters, forged by his Secretary and sealed with a connivent signet. But the thing being rather deeply suspected, than apparently detected, it chanced that Antigonus upon a time met with Apelles, and laying hold upon him, arraigned arrested his body, and brought him into the Kings house; and when he had left him in the safe custody of certain persons, he went himself directly to Philip.

"It should seem to me, if it please your grace (quoth he) by many words which I have observed, that you would expend a great deal to know the whole truth as touching your two sons, and be resolved whether of them twain it was that laid wait to take away the life of the other. Now the only man of all other that can undo the knot and clear this doubt, is in your hands forth coming, and that is Xychus. Herewith he advised the King to call before him the said party since that (as it fell out) he was already brought into the Court. Sent for he was and presented before the King; and being asked the question he denied every thing at the first; but with such inconstancy, as it appeared evidently, that upon some little fear of torture offered unto him, he would be ready to bewray all: for at the very light of the tormentor and the scourges, he relented. Then he did cloi, and shewed in order the whole proceeding and manner of this wicked practice and villany, how it was wrought as well as by the embassadors as also by his own self their minifter. Immediately there were some of purpose went to apprehend the said embassadors, And Philocles who was present in the way, they surprised and took of a sudden as for Apelles who had been sent to pursue one Cresena being advertised how that Xychus had bewrayed & told all, fled from over into Italy. As concerning Philocles, there is no certainty known. Some report, that at the beginning he denied the matter stoutly; but after that Xychus was brought to his face and confronted him, he fled no longer in it. Others say again that being put to torture he endured the pains, and continued still in the denial. Philip sorrow and grief was by this means renewed and redoubled, repeating himself more unhappy in his sons, and his misery the greater, in that one of them was now dead and gone. Perseus being certified that all was discovered, took him himself for a greater and mightier person, than to fear and think it needful for him to flee upon it. And therefore he sought only to keep far enough out of the way, purposing to stand upon his guard all the while that his father lived, and avoid the flaming fire (as it were) of his burning choler. Philip seeing that he could not possibly come by his person to execute justice, thought upon that which only remained to be done, and studied how Perseus besides impunity, should not be recompens'd and rewarded also for that his wickedness. He called therefore Antigonus before him unto whom he was bounden and beholden already, for bringing to light the unnatural murder committed upon Demetrius his son; and of whom he conceived this opinion, in regard of the fresh and late glory of his uncle Antigonus, that the Macedonians should have no cause to be ashamed or repent, if they had had him for: to be their king. K

And in this while he brake with him: "Since my unhappy fortune is such (quoth he) O Antigonus, that I ought (contrary to all other fathers) to with my self childless, I have a mind and purpose to make over unto you that kingdom, which I received at the hands of your uncle, which he preferred and kept yea, and augmented for my behoof during the time of my nonage: where also whilst I was under his guidance, he bare himself not only valiant but also true and faithful unto me. No man have I but you, whom I can esteem worthy to wear the Crown; and if I knew of none all at, yet I rather that both it and the Realm perished and were extinct for ever than Perseus should enjoy it as the guardian of his ungracions & deceitful fact. I shall imagine you to bring Demetrius is riven from death to life, I shall think that I have the fruition of him again if I leave you in this place, you, I say, the only man of all others that wept for the death of the poor innocent young man, and lamented for my unhappy error and unfortunat trefpafs. After this speech with Antigonus, he never ceased to entertain and grace him in the face of the world with all kind of honour that he could devise. For seeing that Perseus was in Thrace, Philip went in progress to every City of Macedonia, and recommended Antigonus to all the Princes and and States thereof. And without all doubt, if God had given him longer life but a little, he would have entailed him in full possession of the kingdom. Well, to return again unto Demetrius, where he wintnered (as before is said) he departed from thence, and sojourned a long time in Thessalonica. From thence after he was come to Amphipolis, he was surpris'd with a grievous malady, Howbeit, certain it was and very apparent that he was more sick in mind than body; and that ever and anon the remembrance and objext, the apparition and ghost of his son, whom he cau'd (innocent as he was) to be put to death, followed and haunted him so continually with care and grief, that he was out of all sleep, and could not lay his eyes together; yea, it drove him into raging, cursing, and execration of Perseus his other son; and so he ended his days. But although Philip died somewhat with the sooner for Antigonus, yet he would have gone very near to have slept into his throne, if either the Kings death had immediately been divulged abroad, or that Antigonus had then been about the Court that he might have had intelligence thereof. For Calligines the Kings Physician, who had the care of him, laid not until the breath was fully out of the Kings body: but so soon as he perceived that his state was desperate, upon the first deadly signs that he observed, sent messengers post to Perseus, who were set of purpose in places convenient, according as it was compell'd between them twain: but he concealed the Kings death from all them that were not of the household, until he was come. By which means Perseus surpris'd them all before they looked for him, or knew abroad that the King was departed, and thus he took the Crown upon him by policy, which he had purchas'd with mischief.

The death of Philip fell out very well to give some delay and respit, and to gather more forces for the waging of war: for the nation of the Barbari having been a long time solicited thereto, departed out of their own country, and with a great power as well of foot as horse, came on this side
A s Independent. After, Now there were arrived before to advertise the King hereof, "Antiquus and Cato. This Cato was a nobleman among the Barbarians, And Antiquus was full against his willjoyed in embassage & sent with Cato to raise the Barbarians, Howbeit, not fit from Amphipolis they met with news (but very uncertain) of the King's death: which occasioned trouble the whole course of their designs. For thus it was commotabled, that Philip should give the Barbarian late passage through Thrace and find them victuals: to the effecting and performing whereof, he had entertained the peers and principal State of theiquarters with present and assured them upon his fidelity, that the Barbarians should pass through their country peaceably without any harm-doing. Now his intent and full purpose was to extinguish utterly the nation of the Dardanians and to plant the Barbarians in their country. Hereby he aimed at a two-fold commoditv:

B the one was this: that the Dardanians (a people most malicious ever to the Macedonians, and who alwais in time of the troubles and adversarys of the King, took their vantage to annoy them) might be rooted out of existence, that is to say, the barbarians leaving their wives and children in Dardania might be sent to waste and spoil Italy, Now were they to pass to the Adriatick sea and Italy, by the way of the Scorditians (for other way there was none to lead an army) and soon would they, thought they flage pittance unto the Barbarians: for they differed not at all, either in language, or manners & talhonics: and more than that, they were like enough to join with them in the expedition, seeing they went to the conquest and pillage of a most rich and wealthy nation. These designs were accommodated and fitted to what events sooner should happen. For in case the Barbarians should happen to be defeated by the Romans and put all to the sword: yet this would be a comfort again: that the Barbarians were consumed from the face of the earth, that he should meet with a booty of that which the Barbarians left behind them: and finally, have the possession free and entire to himself of all Dardania. But in case their fortune were to have the upper hand, then whereas the Romans were averted from him, and amnited upon the war with the Barbarians, he should be able to recover whatsoever he had lost in Greece. These had been the designs projected by K. Philip. So they entered peaceably, and marched without hostility, under the word and promise of Cato & Antiquus. But shortly after that news came of the death of Philip: neither were the Thracians to tradable and ease to be dealt with in commerce and traffick: nor the Barbarians could be content with that which they bought with their money, or be kept in order as they marched, but that they would break their ranks & turn out of the direction hereupon. Henceupon they began to do wrong & injury on both sides one unto another: whereas, increasing daily more & more to outrages, kindled the fire of an open war. In the end, the Thracians not able to endure the violence of multitudes of their enemies, leaving their villages in the plains beneath, retired to an exceeding high mountain, called Donus. To which place, when the Barbarians would have gone: behold notwithstanding, they approached to the tops and ridge of the hills, they were surprized with a storm much like to that wherewith the Gauls (as it is reported) perished at what time as they were a-polling and pilling the Temple at Delphi. For they were not only drenched with showers of rain pouring upon them, pelting afterwards with thick storms of hailstones, thronged with great cracks of thunder and lashed with gleams of lightning that dazzled their eye-fight, but also the lightning flashed upon them on every side that it seemed they were charged and shot directly against their bodies: so as not only the common soldiers, but also the principal leaders and captains themselves were smitten down therewith and overthrown. Whereupon when they were shattered & would have fled down the hill, from the exceeding steep rocks they tumbled down they knew not now with their heads foremost, And albeit the Thracians pursued them thus scared and affrighted, yet they had nothing in their mouth, but That the gods forced them to run away, and that the sky fell upon them. Being thus dispirited with this tempestuous storm, and returned as it were out of a shipwreck into the camp from whence they set forth & most of them but half armed; they began to debate in council what to do. Hereupon arose some dissention among them: whereas part were of opinion to return back into their own country, and part advised to follow the way ofill and pierce forward into Dardania. About 30000 persons went through under the conduct of Clodius: the rest of the multitude returned the same way they came into the parts beyond. "Dimidius, Perus was being chass'd of the kingdom, commanded Antiquus to be put to death: and whiles he was setting the States in order, explaining himself in his own deceit he sent embassadors to Rome, as well to renew the amity that his father had with the Romans, as also to request that he might be elected with the name of King by the Senate of Rome. And these were the affairs in Macedon that year.

F Edon. the other Col. triumphed over the Ligurians: and known it was for certain, that this triumph was granted unto him more for favor than for any great exploit of his that might deserve such honor. He carried in shew a mighty deal of the enemies arms about little or no money at all. Howbeit he dealt among his soldiers thirty Ases specie to every Centurion the same twice as much; and to each Gentleman setting on horseback, the same threefold. There was nothing in this triumph more memorable and worthy the noting than this, that as it fell out, he triumphed now the very same day that he had the year before upon his Prerogative. After this triumph, he published the general assembly for the election of Magistrates: wherefore were created Coll. M. Aemilius Brutus, and M. Marullus Censor. This done, when there had been three of the Pratores elected, a sudden tempest brake up and dissolved the assembly. The moreover which was after this: four days full before the Ides of March the other three were chosen, namely, M. Valerius Publicus, C. Junius Brutus, and M. Licinius Crassus. **

A on every side. Toward I*bria there was one standing frontier garrison, consisting of a cohort of sclavonia. Placentia's levied on a sudden, opposed and lodged between the sea and the camp. And to the end the same might serve for a guard to defend them that watered at the river, M. Eburum (a Colonel of the two legions) was commanded to adjoin two legions of foeldiers out of the second legion, C, and A (Colonels likewise) had led the third legion, by the way that goth to Aquitania, which should guard the forragers and Jewellers, from which quarter about a mile distant was the camp of the French. And a certain petty King there was among them, one Cornelius, having the conduct of three thousand armed foeldiers or foemen far more. So soon as the Romans were approached, the lake Timauve with their camp, the Iturians set them down neatly in a close place behind a little hill; and from thence followed the Roman army as it marched.

B by crofs and crooked ways, eloping and lying for all advantages that might be presented; for intelligence they had of all that was done either at sea or by land. And when they parted upon a time the corps de guard before the camp legible and weak, and that there was a great number of unarmed Merchants between the camp and the sea, without any defence at all either from land or water, they ran on upon the unprecedented guards, to wit, the Placentine cohorts, and also the legions of the second legion. Now their enemie at the beginning was covered and hidden by occasion of a morning mist, which at the first warmth of the sun brake and scattered away, and then began somewhat to appear through it: but the light was not yet clear and come to the full; by reason whereof everything (as commonly in such a case) seemed far bigger than it was. And this at that time mightily deceived the Romans, causing the army of the enemies to seem the greater by many degrees. At which sight, the foeldiers of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the camp with a great tumult and alarm; and there confabulated more fear than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, nor give a ready answer to those that asked them the question. Over and besides, a great noise they heard from the camp gates, as where there was no sufficient guard to sustain the first assault. Besides, their running thus is a strong together in the dark, while one tumbled upon another, made such a confusion, that they knew not whether the enemy was within the rampart or no. No other cry was heard but this: To sea, To sea. For by occasion that one foeldier at adventure began to let up that note, all the camp presently rang again therewith, from one end to the other. Whereupon at first, (as if they had been commanded so to do) to the sea they ran, some few armed but the most part without any armament or weapons: afterwards more, and consequently at last in manner all, sea, and the Consul himself, seeing that he laboured in vain to reclaim them, back fled, and could prevail neither by command nor authority nor yet by prisers in the end: only M. Licinius Stroeo (a Tribune or Colonell of the third legion, abandoned of his own legition) remained behind with three enigns and no more, the Iturians finding him alone (for no man else was left in arms to make reliance) entered joyntly into the camp andupon him &c he was embattling his foeldiers and encouraging them in the quarter about the Praetor his lodging surprized, and with numbers over-charged him. The skirmish and fight was more cruel than proportion of so few defenders: and not ended before that the Tribune himself and those about him, were slain every man. The Generall his pavilion and all about it, was overthrown: which

C as the enemy had ransacked and filled of all that was there, they went as far as the treasurers lodging, the market place, and to the gate Quinuncis: where they found abundance of all things set out ready for their hands, and within the treasurers pavilion the tables spread and covered with good cases and meat upon them. Then their chief Lord & Leader (the petty King himself) made no more ado but late him down, fell to his victuals and made good cheer: and anon all therewith following his example, did as likewise, and never once thought of arms, or of enemies; and like to those who were not wont to fire to well and feed liberally, they greedily overcharged their bellies with wine and viands: but the Romans all the while flowed in farther terms. They trembled, they went hastily to their business both on land and sea. Down went the shipmen and fitters with their tilts and booths: and look what provision of victuals or other things

D were let forth to sale upon the strand and shore, they hurried and hurried a shipboard: the foeldiers all sighted ran amain to the sea-side, for to be embarked. The mariners leaving left their velvets should be overcharged, some put back the pret's and withfood them for coming in, others shoved off from the wharfs, and lashed into the deep. Hereupon began a free and broil, and from that they fell together by the ears, foeldiers and mariners, one with another: some went away withknocks and wounds, and others left their lives behind them; until at length, by the Consul's command the fleet was retir'd far from the land. Which done he began to form the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of so great a multitude) twelve hundred found with armes about them, and very few horsemen that had brought their horrors with them. All the rest were a confounded and disorder'd company, resembling the raifal fort of camps.

E followers as victuallers, launders, fun tons, and lackies: who had been a ready bootie to have preyed upon in case the enemies could have thought upon any fears of armes. Then at last came a messenger to recall the third legion and to surprize the guard of the Gales; and with that from all parts they began to return again toward their own camp for to recover it, and wipe away and hot out the flamefull plain and discomfit which they had received. The Colonels of the third legion commanded the foeldiers to throw down upon the ground their forrage and jollwell, they charged the Centurions to let the elder and unwieldy foeldiers two and too upon the horses and labouring beasts which they had discharged of their load; and willed the horsemen to take up his hind them every one a young lusty footman; shewing what an honour it would be to the third legion; for to regain by their valour the camp, which had been lost by the cowardice and fear of the in the second: and easily (lay they) may it be won again, if the Barbarians, while they are encumbered with the pillage, might be surprised at unawares, and be taken themselves, like as they overlook others before. This exhortation was received with great alacrity and contentment of the foudiars. Aloth were the enigns born and advanced apace, neither flaid the post-enigns one whit for the foudiars, Howbeit the Coi, and thate companies which were brought from the sea, came first to the rampier, L. Atius a principal Centurion of the second legion not only encour- aged the foudiars but made remodelance unto them. That if the Itarians these victories, had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it, they would at the first have purfied the enemies to the sea, so soon as they had turned them out of their tents: and afterwards have let a good corps de guard, at leastwise before the rampier and the avenues thereof: but like enough it is faith he that with guizing wine they were dead asleep like beasts. And hereith he commanded, A. Bacchanus his own enign-bearer, a man of approved valour and singular prowess to advance his banner forward. Mary, that I shall (quoth he) full soon, if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly. With that he forced his whole strength and sending flung the enign over the trench into the camp. He was the first himself that entered at the camp-gate. On another part likewise T. and C. both Atius, and Colonels of the third legion, were come with their Cavaliers: thence presently followed those also who them who had horrid two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage, and after them the Col. K with his whole army. But of the Itarians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to run away; the rest were dead asleep indeed and never awoke again. So the Romans recovered all their goods, save only the wine and vessels which was devoured and continued. The Roman foudiars who were crazy and sick, and had been left in the camp, after they perceived their own fellows within the rampier. found their hands again caught up weapons, and made a great slaughter and execution. But above all others C. Popillius, surna- med Sabellus a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome, bare himself most bravely that day. who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) flew the greatest number of the enemies by far. Eight thousand Itarians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive: for the choler and despititious indignation of the foudiars was such, as they had no mind at all of prizes and booties. Howbeit, the K of the Itarians, drunk as he was, had so good fortune as to be taken from the very boord where he fat, and hastily mounted on horseback by his men and so fled away and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven foudiars: and of them, more in the day than in the recovery of their camp. Now itchanced so that C. and L. both named Gaius, new Colonels and inhabitants of Aquileia, as they came with vessels, had like to have fumbled ignorantly upon the camp, when it was taken & possefliev by the Itarians. They being retired back in great haste to Aquileia, leaving their carriage behind them, let all on a fright & uproar not only at Aquileia but also at Rome within few dais after: for this was the rumour ran. That not only the camp was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was lost, and the army utterly defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all fudden tumults and alarms, writes went forth for mutters and levies of foudiars extraordinarily, not in the City only, but also throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman Citizens were enrolled, and the Latin allies were commended to set out toke of foot with three hundred, M. Junius the Coi, had commandment to pass over into Cisal, and serye of the Cities and States of that Province, as many as were able to make and furnish. It was ordained with that T. Claudius the Praetor should make proclamation, that the soldiers of the fourth legion, and of the Latin allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse, should meet together at Pife, and that in the absence of the Coi, he should defend that Province: also that M. Titinius the Praetor should appoint the Rendezvous at Ariminum: that the first legion and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse, should there assemble. Then Nero took his journey, clad in his rich coat of arms toward Pife his Province. And Titinius having to Ariminum Came Caius a Colonel, to take the conduct of the legion there, took mutters at Rome, M. Juvius the Coi, passed out of Liguria into Gaul and arrived at Aquileia, having led foudiars as he went of all the Cities of Gaul and the Colonies, to be in readiness out of hand. There he certified that the army was safe and found: whereupon he dispatched his letters to Rome to declare them that they should not trouble themselves any more in this false alarm, and himself after he had discharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them, went to his companion in government. Great was the joy at Rome, coming thus as it did unlooked for. The mutters were laid aside, the foudiars discharged who were enrolled and had taken their military oath and the army visited with the plague at Ariminum was dismissed and sent home. The Itarians albeit they were enamped with a great strength of armed men, not far from the Coi, his camp after they heard one that the Consul was come with a new army, disbanded and flit many man away on all rides to their several Cities, and the Consuls retired with their legions to Aqui- leia, there to winter. When these troubles of Itria were thus at length appeased, there went forth an act of the Senat, that the Coi, should agree among themselves, whether of them twain was to return to Rome

A for to hold the assembly for election of Magistrates, At what time as A. Laevinus Nerum, and C. Papirius Tardus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Orations to the people, weighed bitterly against Manlius in his absence, and promulgated a Law to this effect, That after the Ides of March (for the Confl, had their Governments already prorogued for one whole year) he should continue no longer in place to the end that so soon as he was out of his office, he might presently be called to his answrer judicially. Quintus Albinus, one of their Colleagues, with that this bill by them proposed and after much debate and contention prevailed so much that it passed not.

About the same time Tit. Sempronius Gracchus and L. Pofthmonius Albinus, being returned out of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Praetor M. Titinius in the Temple of Bellona, there to discourse of the acts by them achieved, to demand their deferred honours, to the end that praise and thanksgiving also should be rendered to the immortal gods. Moreover, at the very same time Intelligence was given by letters from T. Sempronius to the Praetor, which his son brought and shewed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia: Namely, that the Littans, joying into them the strength of the Latins, had invaded the province standing in peaceable terms neither was he able to make head against them with so feeble an army as he had & the fame waited and continued much with the patience. The same news related the Embassadors likewise of the Sardiniants, making humble suit to the Senat to relieve and succour their Cities at leafl, for that their villages and country towns were already pal part. This embassage, with all other matters concerning S. diniants put over to the new Magistrates; as pitiful an embassage also was prefixed unto them from the Lyrians who complained grievously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had been annexed and made subjects by L. Cornelius Scipio: Indeed (say they) we lived sometime under the ignomy of K. Antiochus, but that terribilitate of ours under the K. compared to this present state and condition wherein we now are seemd unto us an excellent liberty: for not only are we now laughed and kept under publicke authority in general, by taxes, levies and impotations, but every one in particular endureth meer bondage and slavery. Our flocks are abased, yet, and our wives and children suffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and breasts they work upon and discharge their humour of cruelty: in our good name (an indignity unsupportable) we are detained depraved, and deamed: yet openly in the face of the world, they cause not to commit outrages against us, even to usurp and extend their authority over us, and to try matters with us extremity: to the end that we Lycians might be put of all doubt, that there is no difference between us and slaves bought and sold for fiver in open market. The Senat moved with these remonstrances by the Lyrians: addressed their letters to the Rhodians to this effect, that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians: or that any other born free, should be enthralled by any person: but their will was, that the Lycians should in such terms live under the government and protection of the Rhodians, that both States the one as well as the other might range and frame themselves like good subjects under the Dominion and Empire of Rome.

After this followed two triumphs over Spain one immediately upon another: first, Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians: and the morrow after, L. Pofthmonius over the Lyrians and other Spaniards of these parts. Tit. Gracchus carried in thew 45000 pound weight of silver and Albinus twenty thousand, both of them divided among their soldiers twenty five Denarius apiece to each Conqueror the same double, and trebble to every horsemann. Thus did they also by aliases as well as by Romans.

It is reported of the day that M. Junius the Confls came out of Spain to Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden: and when the two Tribunes of the Commons, Papirius and Lucius, had in the presence of the Senat bidden and warned them with interrogatories, as touching the affairs past in Spain, they brought him forth also before the body of the people. To which questions after, the Confls had answered, how he had not been above 11 days in the Provinces and as for the things that happened in his absence, he knew no other wisdom than they did, only by the common brute and report: then they went upon urging him till, and asking how it came to pass that M. Manlius rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, why he passed out of Gaul (which was his allotted Province) into Spain? and to know, when it was that either the Senat decreed, or the people of Rome granted by their voices to entreprize that war. But haply it may be said (quod he) that albeit the war was undertaken only upon his own head alone: yet no doubt entred it was right worthy with policy and valour, Nay, I wis, but far contrariwise and hard it is to say, whether it were begun more deadly, than managed incon siderably. Two entire conscript guards were on a sudden at Ariminum surprized by the 115000 soldiers of the Roman camp was forced & taken, with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein: the citi felled without arms and the Confls himself was the foremost man that ran away to the sea, and fled unto the ships: and surely he should render an account of all these matters, when he is a private person again since the shame should not do it being Confl. This form past the general assembly for the Magistrates election was holden: wherein were created Confls, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tit. Sempronius Gracchus. The next day following, were the Praetors chosen: to wit, P. Attius Florus the second time, C. Quintus Placentinus, C. Naevius C. Maximus Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Fabius Luscinus. The civil jurisdiction of the City fell to Fabius, the Fora to Quintus. The government of Sicily was allotted to Numistrius of Sardina to Mamunius. Howbeit, this Province by reason of the great war therein became the charge of the Confl. And by lot it fell to Gracchus: but but Isernia to Claudius his Colleague, Gaull was divided into two Provinces; whereof Scipio by lot H obtained one, and Livius the other.

Upon the Ides of March upon which day Sempronius and Claudius entered their Consulship, it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Isernia, and the enemies to both those Provinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Embassadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magistrates, and L. Minucius Tolumnius, who had been Lieutenant to the Consul Manlius in Isernia, entered into the Senat-house. By then the Senat was informed how dangerous the wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the senators by the embassadors of the Lateine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had impurrord the Centors and Conuls of the former year: the sum of their complaint was this: That their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thither to dwell; which it might be suffered, within few reviews and ceilings it would come to pass, that their Cities should be depopulated and desert, their villages and fields deserted, and able to set out no soldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnites and Pelignians complained, that four thousand households were gone from them, and retired to Fregellæ: and yet neither the one nation or the other, were yet at a less proportion of soldiers in all their levies. Two cautious means and devices there were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleasure. The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Lateine nation, as many as let issue of their race behind them in their house, That they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, some did injure to their allies, others wronged the people of Rome; for, both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children, as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen or other whom they liked; with condition to manumit and make them free, that they might be Tribes or enfranchised Citizens. And they also that wanted issue to leave behind them, were held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of Law and respect of issue they crept in and had the benefit of the Burghers and freedom of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practises, the embassadors craved a remedy for the time to come; as also that they would peremptorily command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an express inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vassall and villain, and so alienate him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein he lived: and that who soever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not be counted for a Citizen. These petitions were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Isernia and Sardinia which were in arms, to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemens of the Lateine allies: and ten quinqueremes or galleasses, with five banks of oars, in case the Generall would war them out of the affeall. The like number as well of the Infantry as Cavallry, was alligned for Isernia. The Conuls also were enjoyned to send to M. Titinius in Spain, one legion with three hundred horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250 horsemans.

Before that the Conuls cast lots for their Provinces, certain prodigies were reported. Namely, that in the territory of Crassifonium, there fell from heaven a stone in the lake of Mart. That in the territory of Isernia therw was an infant born like a very stump, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen four-footed. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were finnited with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Putecul two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. While these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf also in the day time at Rome, which having entred at the gate Collina, after much courting and bunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chase, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquilina gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Coff, killed greater beasts for sacrifices: and for one whole day, a solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the shrines and altars of the gods. These sacrifices done and passed, accordingly as it appertained, the Coff cast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius, beliell Isernia, to Sempronius, Sardinia.

After this, C. Claudius published a Law by virtue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of allies and proclaimed that these allies, and namely of the Lateine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had been enrolled among the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Marcus Claudius, and Titus Quinctius, or any time afterwards, should make return every man into his own City, before the fifth day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mummius the Pretor had in commision to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To this Law and Edict abovefald of the Conul, an act also of the Senat was adjourned. That the Dictator, Conul, Interregent, Censor, and Lord chief Justice in the Common Pleas for the time being, should endeavour out and take order, that whoever were manumitted and made free, should take an oath, That he who manumitted or enfranchised him, did not with an intent, for to exchange the City wherein he was: and look who would not thus swear, him they thought not worthy to be manumitted. But his charge and jurisdiccion was afterwards committed to C. Claudius the Conul.

Whiles these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Conuls the year before, having wintered in Apulia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army into the frontiers of Isernia. Where, as they made war and spoil and, near as they went, the Iberians A Illyrians entered into a com motion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to see their goods thus pillaged and ransacked, than for any allure of hope they had of their influence to make head against two armies. Having therefore raised a concourse of their able youth from all their Cities and States, they assembled in haste a sudden and summari army, which at the last gave battle and fought more in heat of courage than with perseverance of resolution. In conflict there were slain of them to the number of four thousand: the rest abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they sent embassadors first into the Roman camp to crave peace and then the hostages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of these news by the letters of the Pro-Consul, C. Claudius the Consul, fearing lest this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province, and the conduct of the army, without a leth prayers and vow made, without his Lieutors clad in their coats of arms, departed suddenly in great haste (all of the head) by night towards his Province, and made no manly orther, but only his College. His voyage thither was not to rash and inconsiderate, but his carriage there was more foolish and undirect: for being thither come, he assembled a general audience; where after he had very unreasonably reproached Minullus for his running away out of the camp, (to the great discontentment of the fouldiers, who were the first that fled:) and with approbation terms: taken up M. Junius also for taking part in this dishonour with his companion; in the end they commanded both to avoid out of the Province. Whereupon the fouldiers made answer again and said, That they would then obey the Consul's commandment. when (according to the ancient custom of their fore-fathers) he had made his solemn vows within the Capitol, C and then taken his leave and departed out of the City, accompanied with his lieutors in their rich coats of arms, warlike. Hereat he was so far enraged with anger, that he called upon the treasurers deputy belonging to Minullus for chains and gies and menaced to end Junius and Minullus both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewise made as little reckoning of the Consul's commandment: and the more animated he was to disobey the Consul, by reason that he was backed by the whole round about him: who as they supported the cause of their Captains and Leaders so they hated the Consul at the heart. In conclusion, the Consul being loadend and wearied with the contumelious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the tumults and tumults of the multitude in general (for they stuck not over and besides to mock him and make a laughing stock of him) he went his waies again to Aquentia in the same ship wherein he came, D From thence he wrote unto his College by an Edict, to charge those new fouldiers who were enrolled for infra nato meet at Aquentia to the end that no business should keep him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly, his companion in office was well content and did all those things require full willingly: and a short day was assigned for the assembling of the fouldiers at the Rem. But Claudius was at Rome well near as soon as his letters; where, at his first coming he made an Oration in the public audience of the people, as touching the demanor of Minullus and Junius: and having laid no longer than three days at Rome, he set out with his Lieutors formally in their coat-armour, when he had made his vows solemnly in the Capitol and did depart into his Province again with as much, as fortitude and hate (if not more) as he came from thence.
E Some few days before, Junius and Minullus began to afront all by forcible means the town Neatmum into which the principal persons of the Illyrians, and Aquanti their King, were retired. Claudius with his other legions, pressed himself before the town; and after he had discharged the old armies and their commanders, laid siege unto it, and intended to force it with mantlets and engines of batter. The confines of the river which ran along beside the walls, and not only embattled the İllyrians but yielded water unto the besieged, he diverted into another new channel, and belowed many days work thereabout. This mightily affrighted the barbarous people, to see how they were cut off from water. Howbeit, they never thought of peace for all this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children; and when they had so done (because they would F present to the view of their enemies, their hostile, as fearfull spectacle) they massacred them upon the walls openly in their sight, and then threw them headlong down. Whilest the silly womans and poor mothers (midst their pious and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered, the Roman fouldiers mounted over their walls and entred into the City. Their King when he once perceived (by the fearfull outcries of those who fled) that the town was lost: for fear he should be taken alive flabb'd himself with his dagger to the heart. All the rest were either taken prisoners or killed. After this two other towns, Marida and Fertovia, were won by assault and rased. The pillage was greater than an man would have looked for to so poor a nation: which was beflowed every which upon the fouldiers. Five thousand and two, and thirty persons were fold out right in portfer under the guidland. The Captains of this war were little shorn with G rods and then beheaded. Thus infra by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was appeased: and all the Cities and States thereof from every quarter, came in with their hostages, made subjection, and did fealty and homage to the Romans.

The Illyrians war was no sooner ended but the Ligurian began to complot for to take arms and enter into rebellion. T. Claudius the Pro-Cos., who the former year had been Praetor was governor and commander at that time of Pifhe with a garrision of one region. The Senat being adverised thereof by his letters, thought good to lend the very same letters to C. Claudius (for the other Conful was already passed over into Sardinia: and withall, a decree was granted out to this effect. That confiding he had performed his commiffion in Ifria, fo as there remained no more for him to do there, he thought it good to transport his army into Liguria: Moreover, upon the Conful his letters, wherein he wrote what exploits he had achieved in Ifria, there was ordained a solemn procession for two days together. Simlably, the other Conful Tib. Sempronius, managing his affairs as happily in Sardinia: he entered with an army into the country of the Sardianian Ilions. Great aids were come from the Balarams to relieve and succour those Ilions: with both these nations he fought a battle in pitched field. The enemies were discomfited and put to flight, turned out of their camp, and 10,000 armed men slain. The Morrow after, the Confl, commanded all their armor and weapons to be gathered together and hid on an heap; and this he burned as a sacrifice to the honor of Vulcan. Which done, he retir'd with his victorious armies into the adjacent Cities, there to pass the winter.

C. Claudius likewise, upon receipt of the letters of T. Claudius, and the commiffion directed from the Senat, marched with his legions out of Ifria into Liguria: where the enemies were come down into the plains, and lay encamp'd near the river Scultenna. In which place there was a battle fought: 15000 of them were put to the sword, and not to few as 700 taken prisoners, either in the conflict, or within the Camp for that also was forced and won: besides, 51 enigns they loft. The Ligurians, as many as escaped the execution, fled on all sides to the mountains for refuge; and notwithstanding that the Conful spoiled and waited their champaign country, there was not one man made they of arms. Thus Claudius having in one year vanquished and subdued two nations, and in one Confulship (a rare felicity in any other man) reduced other two Provinces into quietness and peace, returned to Rome.

Certain prodigies and monstrous sights were that year reported, to wit, in the territory of Cynthus, a certain bull, called Sanguinolus, with her bull pierced into a faced stone. In Campania a Beef-spake; at Syraca a bull that fired out of the fields from the herd, lef the brazen cow there in the City, and did his deffe. In the territory of Cynthus, there was a supplication and procession holden one day long in the very place of the foresaid prodigious sign. In Campania, the beef forow sharefold, was put out to be kept and fed at the charges of the City. Laft of all, the prodigy of Syraca, was expiated by a purgatory sacrifice, by direction from the footfathers to what gods, supplications & sacrifice should be made. That year died M. Claudius Marcellus the Bishop, who had been Cof and Censor. In his stead M. Marcellus his son was consecrated Bishop. Likewise, in the same year, there was a Colony of 2000 Citizens of Rome planted at Luca. The Triumvir or the Commissiurers who had the conduct and placing of them, were P. E. Livius, L. Egilius, and Cn. Securinus. one and fifty acres of land and an half was set out for them apiece, to occupy the territory lately conquered from the Ligurians, and which had been sometime the possession of the Tufcans, before it was holden by the Ligurians.

Then came the Conful C. Claudius to the City of Rome, where after he had discourse before the Senat, as touching the prosperous execution of his affairs, as well in Ifria as Liguria: and thereupon demanded a triumph, he foon obtained that honour: and during his Majestie triumphed at once over those two nations. In which solemnity of his triumph, he carried in fiew 307000 Deniers and 81702 Victories. He gave to every common [Roman] soldier fifteen Denars as a peace, a double proportion to the Centurions, and thrice as much to every horfman. But upon the allies he bestowed lefts by the one moity than to natural Citizens: and therefore as they followed his chariot, they were silent and faid never a word: a man that had feen them would have faid they were malecontent.

During the time of this triumph, the Ligurians perceiving that not only the Conful his army was brought home to Rome, but the legions alfo at Pife discharged by T. Claudius: thinking now all fear pant and o'erflown, secretly levied a power; and having passed over the crofs frontiers, by travelling the ways through the mountains, defended into the downs, and wafted the demains of Moderna, and by sudden attack surprifed the very Colony. The news hereof was no sooner arrived at Rome, but the Senat commanded C. Claudius the Conful to hold the high Court for the flemen election, with all convenient speed: that fo soon as new annuall Magistrates were created, he might return into his Province, and perseff recover this Colony out of their hands. So according to the advice and ordainice of the Senat the faid assembly was holden: wherein were elected Conulf Cn. Cornelius Seipio Hippatus, and Q. Petilius Spartius. Then were the Praetors afterwards chosen, to wit, M. Popllus Lentus, P. Licinius Cragus, M. Cornelius Seipio, L. Popllus M. fo, M. Atturinus, and L. Aquilius Gallus, The Conful C. Claudius had his Patent fealed again for one year longer, to continue in command of the army, and government of the Province Gallus. And for his left the Ilirians likewise should follow the example of the Ligurians: he had commiffion to lend thene allies of the Latin nation, whom he had brought out of his Province for to gloriifiz his triumph.

Upon that very day, on which the Confuls, Cnus Cornelius and Quintus Petilius entered their Majestie, and sacrificed each of them an ox as the manner was, in the honour of Jupiter: In that feast which Q. Petilius caufed to be flain, the liver was found headless. When he had reported this accident unto the Senat, he was enjoyed to sacrifice another beef, for to appeale the wrath of the gods. Moved then it was in the Senat house as concerning the Provinces, and a decree passed that both Confuls fhou'd be sent to Pife, and againft the Ligurians: but order was given, that that whether of them had the charge of Pise allotted unto him, he should (when the time came) repair to Rome against the election of yearly Magistrates. Moreover, there was another branch of this decree, that either of them should enroll two new legions, and three hundred horsemen and levy of the Latine allies ten thousand foot, and six hundred horse. And T. Claudius continued still in full command, until such time as the Consul was arrived in his Provin(e. While these matters were thus debated and passed in the Council House. Co. Cornelius was called forth by a buliff or other. And within a while after he was gone out of the Temple, he returned thither again, with an heavy and disannounced countenance, and declared into the L. of the Senat that the officer of that one which he also had killed for sacrilege, a beast of six years old and well liking, was consumed and come to nothing; and when he hardly besought the Minifter attending upon the Sacrifice, who told him hereof, that himself caufed the water to be poured forth of the pot whereunto the trips and inwards were put, and that the water being poured away, after a wonderful and mysterious manner, not to be spoken. The LL. were much terrified and amazed at this prodigious object and the more perplexed were they, for that the other Consul likewise related unto them, how in regard that in his sacrifice the artifice.wanted an end; he had killed three oxen more, one after another, and yet could not procure the favour and grace of the gods. Hereupon the Senat commanded him still to sacrifice their greatest beasts, until such time as he had, and the gods were pleased again. Now it is said, that all the other gods were well enough contented, and their ire mitigated and appeased, only the goddesS Sabins Petulins could not be reconciled unto for all these evil might do. Then the Coifi, and Praetors committed the disposition of their Provinces to the abovement of the lots, Petulius to Cornelius, and Liguria to Petulins. As for the Praetors, L. Papirius Mago was Lord Chief Justice by lot appointed, within the City of all Citizens pleas, and M. Albinus had the jurisdiction over Strangers: M. Cornelius Scipio M Lucenius had the charge to govern the lower Spains, and L. Aquilinus Salus, Sicily, The two Praetors behind, required earnestly that they might not be sent into their Provinces, and namely, M. Petulins into Sardinia: alleging, that Crassus was able to quiet that ill mind, and the rather, for that T. Fulvius the Praetor was by the Senat enjoined to him for assistance: neither was it good to interrupt courts begun the continuity whereof is the most effectual means to expiate any great impoflant affairs. For what with delivering up the sword by the old L. Deputy, and receiving it by the new successor (whom it were more meet first to be trained up in knowledge of the State, than to be put to the managing of State-matters) oftentimes the good opportunities of achieving brave enterprises pass by and are lost. This exuice of Petulins was held for good, and so approved. Then comes P. Licinius Crassus, and he for his part made allegations why he might not go into his Province: namely, by occasion of the solemn sacrifice, that he was to give his attendance upon. Now the higher part of Spain was allotted unto him. But commanded was he either to go into his Province, or else to take oath in a frequent and full assembly of the people, that the solemn sacrifice (as he pretended) was the thing that hindered him, and nothing else. This order being set down and thus passed in the behalf of P. Licinius: then they put me up M. Cornelius, and required them to take an oath of him likewise, that he might not go into the nearer Province of Spain. So both these Praetors were sworn according to one and the same form of oath. Whereupon M. Titurius and T. Fonte were commanded to remain in quality and place of Pro Consuls within Spain and retain all the same authority and power of command: and order was given, that for to supply their forces, there should be lent unto them three thousand Citizens of Rome with two hundred horse, and also fifteen thousand Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen.

The solemnity of the Latine holydays began the * third day before the Nones of May, wherein, because of the sacrificing of one beast the Magnificat of Lurumiis in his prayer left out these words [Popoli Romani Quiritinos] and prayed not for the good estate of the people of Rome: and the Quirites it bred a Temple. The matter was moved in the Senat, and the Senat referred it over to the College of the Bishops and Prelates of the Church, and they pronounced this award, That forasmuch as those Latine feasts were not solemnized as they ought, they should begin again anew: and that the Citizens of Lurumis, by whose defect they were thus to be renewed, should at the charges of all the beasts for sacrifice. Moreover, to breed more terror and popularity in men's minds, it was ordained that Cornelius consequet the Consul as he returned from that solemnity out of the Alban mountain fell down in a fit of Apoplexy: which turned into an Hemoptysis or dead pale all the one side of his body, and so he was conveyed to the bath and hot waters at Tarentum, where by occasion that his disease grew upon him still, he departed this life: from whence he was brought to Rome, and there carried forth in all magnificence of funerals and obsequies: and right honourably interred. He had been Bishop also as well as Consul. Q. Petulins the other Consul being commanded to hold an assembly for the introduction of Collegue unto him, (to form as possibly he might be warranted by the auspices and approbation of the sacred birds): and withal, to proclaim and publish the Latine feasts and holydays aforesaid: summoned the election against the * third day before the Nones of Sextills: and the Latine solemnity, the third day likewise before the Ides of the same month.

Whiles mens minds were much poiffessed already with religion, and set upon their devotions, word was brought moreover of certain feastfull prodigies: to wit, that at Tresulins there was been a burning flame in the sky: that at Gabes, the Temple of Apollo, and many private mans houses:
houes: likewise at Gravice the town wall and one of the gates were smitten with thunderbolts. For the procuratio whereof, the LL. of the Senat ordained that the Bishops should give order according to their discretion.

While the Conuls were thus laid, first both, by their own scrupulous holiness, then one of them by the death of the other; and afterwards by occasion of the new election and the renewing of the Latine festivall solemnity: C. Claudius in the mean time approach'd with his army to Modena, which the Ligurians the year before had won. He had not continued the siege full three days, but he forced the Colony: and having thus recovered it from the enemies, he retor-red it again to the former inhabitants. Eight thousand Ligurians died there within the walls upon the sword; and immediately he dispatched his letters to Rome, wherein he not only declared the simple news, but glorified him and made his boast, That through his fortitude and fortune, both the Romans had no enemy that durst shew his head on this side the Alps; and that he had conquered so much land as might serve for to be divided by the poll among many thousands. Tib. Sempronius likewise at the same time, fought many fortunate battles in Sardinia, and utterly tamed and subdued the Ilyanders: 1500 enemies he there slew: all the States of that nation which had revolted, were reduced to obedience under the people of Rome: the old tributaries had an imposition and exaction laid upon them of a double tribute, which they thereby paid: the rest were put to a contribution of corn. After he had set the Province in quietness, and received out of the whole Island two hundred and thirty hostages, he sent certain Lieutenants as messengers to make report at Rome of all his proceedings: who also in his behalf should make suit unto the Senat, That in regard of the happy successes in those exploits under the charge, conduct, and fortune of Tib. Sempronius, first, due honour, praise, and thanksgiving might be rended to the immortal gods: and then that himself might be allowed at his departure out of the Province to bring away his army with him. The Senat gave audience to the messengers above said within the Temple of Apollo: and upon their relation ordained a general procession for two days: commanding the Colf. to sacrifice 40 head of greater beasts: and withall, enjoyed Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Con-ful to continue that year with his army in that Province. Then the election which had been published against the third day before the Nones of Sexi. lis for the substitution of one of the Colfs, was the same day accomplished. And Q. Petilus the Colf. created for his Colleague, M. Valerius Lavinus, for to enter immediately into his Magistracy. This Laurens had been a long time devises to be employed in some Province or other: and pity it fell out for his longs desire that letters came importing how the Ligurians rebelled and were gone out again in arms. So after he once heard the contents of their letters, he made no longer stay, but upon the very Nones of Sexi.

lis all goodly to be seen in his warriors coat of arms, he commanded the third legion (by occasion of this alarm) to go into France, to C. Claudus the Pro-Conful: also the Dumnovis or two wardens for the ports and navy to go to sea, and with a fleet to make sail for Pisa, &c. from hence to coast about all Liguria and thus by hov'ring upon the seas, to terrifie the enemies that way alfo. Q. Petilus likewise the Colf. had appointed a day for his army to meet in the same place. Moreover, C. Claudius the Pro-Conful advertised of the Ligurians revolt, over and besides those forces which he had about him at Parma, levied in hate a strength of more soldiers; and so with his compleat army approached the borders of the Ligurians. The enemies upon the arrival of C. Claudius by whose conduct they well remembered how late they had been discomfited and put to flight near the river Scultena, minding to seek for defence rather by the strength of advantageous places than force of arms, against that power of his which to their coast they had before tried, jezed the two hils, Lutus and Badlsa, about which they raised a mure also for their better safety, But such as legged behind and quite the champaign plains and lower grounds with the last, were surprised and cut short, to the number of sixteen hundred. The rest kept within the mountains: who albeit they were in fear and danger of their own parts, yet forgot not their inbred cru-ely; but ran upon the booties and prizes which they had taken at Modena, their poor prisoners whom they held captive they pitiously mangled, and killed most villanously: as for the beasts in the Temples everywhere, they rather hacked, hewed, and cut in pieces butcher-like, than sacrificed in decent, leemly, and religious manner. Thus being satisfied with the blood and massacre of living creatures, they took all their breathless things they had, and reared and stuck them upon the walls; and namely, implements of all sorts, made rather for use and necessitie than ornament and flew. Q. Petilus the Colf, for fear lest the war would be ended in his absence, dispatched his letters to M. Claudius, to hawe away with his army into France, for he would attend his coming upon the plains called Maeri. Upon the receipt of which letters, Claudius dislodged out of Liguria, and delivered unto the Conful his army at the said plains called M. Meri. Few days after came Cn. Valerius the other Conful thereto also. There they divided their forces, and before they departed one from the other, they both together made a survey and review of their severall armies. This done, they cast lots into what quarters they should either of them go for, that they held it not good policy to charge the enemy both of them joyntly in one part. Now certain it is, that Valerius received his lot according to the auspices; in that he was within the precincts of the Temple or prospect by the Augurs affign'd. But Petilus here in made default (as the Augurs pronounced afterwards); and namely, the error was herein, because he being himself without the compass aforesaid, had put the lot into the casket, which was carried afterwards within the circuit-of the said Temple. This done, they went into divers quarters: Petilus encamped affront that A bank and rising of the hill between Babylon and Lusus, which by a continual ridge unites and joyneth the one mountain to the other. There, as he was exhorting his soldiers in open and audible manner, he let fall (by report) an ominous word, interpreting his own death never thinking of the ambiguity and duplicitous construction thereof, saying, that he would that very day "capere Lusum." In two or three places at once he began to mount up the hills. That regiment wherein he was himself advanced forward courageously: but the other was repulsed and beaten back by the enemies: whereupon the Consul rode full gallop to help that side which went down: and in very truth, he became men who did from running away; but whilsts without good regard of his own person he kept before the enmies in the forefront, he chanced to be shot with a dart, and so fell down and died in the place. The enemies were not aware of the Generals death: but some few of his own men who Baw him tall, made haste (as knowing well that in it confined now the main victory) to cover his body. So the reit of the multitude, as well cavalry as infantry, captains and as, were dishevelled and the enemies were masters of the mountains. Of Ligurians there were slain 3000: of the Roman army not above two and fifty. Now besides this evident issue and event which fell out upon heavy and deadly a preface by the *omen aforetold, the pulletier also was heard to say, that all was not well in the audices of the birds: neither was the Consul himself ignorant thereof. This Omen of his (which I commonly interpret [Oke] fortunum vasta judicium: When a man causeth forth a word as a preface, and Ikipeth more truly than he is aware. For want of a proper reason to expel the Luxe [Ux] all ten of it likewise birother, French, Italian, and English, hath been to let his things, and it is themselves like [Preßage] Which in mine opinion is not appropriative to the thing, but common, as comprising other tokens of like kind; whether it be auguria or omen; omen towards of lightening and the right: or rather implying [Apparitio, i.e., the fate by which both signs, yes, and extenuated to the fate, among the men. Whereas as the other word [Foe] apparetio, and in its analogue equivalent to [Oera] I knew much this error; it is thought either foreign and new (Gergu, in English) that was not made commonly in times past, and at this day current in the North parts, where the people happily are more observant of such prefaces. Apennine were the Brinians. Against them that had pillaged and ravished Piside and Tamba Q. Minu-tius made war within the compass of the River Ardea: and when he had brought them in subjection, he took from them their arms. For which exploits cherished in France and Liguria, under the conduct and happy fortune of the two Conuls, the Senate ordained that there should be pub-

E licated public procession for three days and commanded to sacrifice forty greater beasts. And thus verily

T the tumultuous wars of the French and the Ligurians, which arose in the beginning of the year, were in short time and without any great mazly disturbed and appeased.

But now in lieu thereof great care was taken for the Macedonian war by occasion that Persis sold the teads of debate and quarrel between the Dardanians and the Balkanians. Besides, the Roman Embassadors who were sent into Macedonia, to see in what terms things there stood, were now returned to Rome, and had brought word That in Dardan they were up in arms. With them there came also from King Persis certain orators to make excite in his behalf, and to cheer him in the action, namely, that the Balkanians neither were by him sent for not entered into any execution by his motive. The Senate would neither acquit the King as unrightely, nor yet directly accuse him as culpable in that point. Only they required that he should be advertised and admoni-donied, to be very well advised and careful to keep that league and accord inviolable, which he would seem to enter with the Romans.

The Dardanians seeing that the Balkanians were so far off departing from their country (as they well hoped they would) that they endangered and endangered them still every day more than other, as bearing themselves bold upon the incursions of the Thracians near neighbours, and the Scordisci, thought it their belt course in policy, to adventure upon some hardy enterprise, although it were rash and imperceptible: whereupon they assembled all in arms, and from every quarter of their country hewed and advanced before the next Town, to the camp of the Balkanians. Winter time it was, a season of the year which they made choice of, that the Thracians and the Scordisci might be retired home into their own countries: when they were advertised of, and that there remained none but the Balkanians alone, they divided their forces in two parts: with the one, to march directly forward and openly to make head against them afaroff; with the other, to fetch a compass through by-was and blind forrests, and to charge upon their backs. But before they could wheel about the enemy's camp, the battall was begun: wherein the Dardanians had the overthow, and were driven to put themselves within their City which was about twelve miles distant from the camp of the Balkanians. The conquerors followed the train of victory, and incontinently invested the Town, making full account, that the next day either the enemies would yield, or else they should be able to win the place by mere force. In the mean time, the other regiment above-aided of the Dardanians, which call about, knowing nothing at all of their fellows defect, began to afflict the camp of the Baetians, left without a sufficient guard for defence.

As the manner of the Kings was, he fare in a stately throne of ivory, to hear pleas and decide controversies of the smallest and most trifling matters. So transported was he and carried away with an humor of levity and spirit of inconfinancy, so distracted & wandering in all the course of his life, that he was never neither and well contented in any condition or state whatsoever: in such fort, as neither he knew his own will, nor any man else with what to make of him. He would not seem to speak unto his friends, and hardly was seen to laugh familiarly among those of his nearest acquaintance. He made a fool of himself, and mocked others likewise; such was his inordinate and irregular munificence. To men of honor standing highly upon their worth and reputation, his manner was to beat low childish trives, as sugar-plums to eat or to play with, toyes and gawgawes instead of great and precious presents: others again that looked for nothing,those he enriched. And therefore some deemed, that he knew not what he did: others gave it out that he did all in plain mockage: and there were again that let not say, how he was one of his right wits, and clean besides himself. Yet in two things, which were both great and laudable, he carried with him a Princely and Royal mind indeed: to wit, in adorning Cities with statelie gifts, and honouring the Gods with divine worship. He promised the Megalopolitans in Arcadia to raise a wall about their City: and in truth the better part of the money to defray the charges thereof, he sent unto them. He went in hand to build a magnificent Theatre of marble at Tegea: at Cynus, he gave freely to the Prytaieum (a fair hall by it itself in the heart of the City, where, at the common charges, certain had their diet of free-coal) by way of honourable reward, a cupboard of golden plate sufficient for the furniture and service of one table. As for the Rhodians, I cannot say, what one special gift singular above the rest, he bestowed upon them: so liberally minded was he to-ward and his hand ever open to give them of all sorts whatsoever they needed or required. Now, this magnificence in honoring the Gods, what it was (if there were nothing else) the Temple of Jupiter Olympicus begun by him in Athens (so answerable every way to the Majesty of that great God, that the like to it is not to be found again in the whole world) may testify sufficiently. Moreover, he beautified Delos with godly sea-enigmes, and with a great number of statues and images. Likewise he promised to edify at Antiochus, a large Temple in the honor of Jupiter Capitolinus, not only arched above-head with a golden embowed roof, but feated all over the wall sides with plates of gold; besides many other things in divers places, which by reason that he reigned but a very short time, he could not finish and perform. In magnificence also of plays, publick shews, and pageants of every sort, he over-went all the Kings his progenitors before him, as well in regard of Grecian actors and gameliers, whereof he had many about him, as of the rest who were acquainted with the fashions of his own country. He represented the fight of sword-players at the sharp with unrebated swords, after the cuturge of the Romans; with greater terror and fear at first than pleasure and delight of men, who were not used to behold such fights: but afterwards by often exhibiting the same in such manner, as sometime they drew blood one of another, yeas, and otherwheres gave over to, but fought to the uttermost, even to death, he made it a familiar exercise & a pleasant spectacle to the eye; and thereby set an edge upon the courage of many yong gillants, and emboldned them to embrace chivalry and follow feats of arms. So as in process of time, he that was wont at the beginning to send as far as Rome for these entertainers, and to hire them for great wages and reward, now with his own * * L Cornelia Scipio (had the jurisdiction) over foreigners, To M. Attalus the Prector, the government of Sardinia by lot was fallen, but he was enjoined to pass over into Confœt with the new legion which the Comils had enrolled, confuting of 5000 foot and 300 horse. And during the time that he should be employed there in the wars, Cornelia had commissio to continue in his charge and place of command, within Sardinia. Unto Cn. Servilius Capo for low Spain & P. Furius Philius for the higher, were assigned 3000 Roman footmen and an 150 horse; but of Latin allies, 5000 of the one and 500 of the other. N As for L. Claudius, he was appointed to Sicily without any supply at all. Moreover, the Comils had commandment to enrol two legions besides, with the full number as well of foot as horse and to charge the Latin allies, with the setting out and maintenance of a 10000 footmen & 600 horse. This levy and taking of musters, the Comils went through with in more difficulties, by reason of a great mortality, which beginning the year before with a murrain of kite & oxen, turned this year into pestilential epidemic diseases of men. Look who fell sick once, lightly they died before the feventh day: and those that overslipped and escaped that crisis, lay long sick by it, and commonly of the quartan ague. The most that went of this malady were slaves, whose breaths carkasses lay ordinarily along every street unburied: and more than that, * men were not able to inter to much as the dead bodies of free persons they died to thick; in such fort, as they purified and rooted = above ground: for neither hungry dog nor greedy gripe, would once touch them. And for certain it was known and noted, that neither all that year nor in the former, during the mortality of men and beast, there was not a vulere or gripe any where to be seen, Divers Prelats and Priests of State dropt away of this plague, and namely, Cn. Servilius Capo a Bishop, the father of the Prector: Tit. Sempronius Longus, the Ioh of Thes one of the December, for sacred rites and divine service; P.

of the parish-priests, and M. Semp, Tuddaturna Bishop. These were substituted Bishops in place of the dead, to wit, C. Sulpiius Gallus in Head of Tuddaturna. * For Augurs were subordinaTed, T. Petrinius Catus Sempronianus in the room of Greekus. Q. Adus Paimitor P. Adus, Decemvirs over holy rites were elected, C. Semp, Longus and C. Scribonius, named Carus, supplied the want of the grand superintendent aforesaid. Still the petition was; whereupon the Senat ordained, That the Decemvirs should have recourse to the books of Sthlar by whole order and direction, publish supplications held for one day long: and after a devout manner, the people conceived and made a solemn vow in the common place, according to that form of words which Q. Martinus Philippus did indeed and prompt ed unto them to this effect: That if this madly and pestilential disease, were removed out of the territory of Rome they would for two days spare a solemnize a feast go in procession and pour out their prayers with all devotion. In the Veientian country a man child was born with two heads: and another at Sinus ; but with one hand, At Oxumum a maid child came into the world with teeth in the head and over the Temple of Saturns (standing in the market place of Rome) there was seen in the sky a bow till bent all the day long. If the air were clear and the weather fair: and at one time there shone out three limbs. Also in one night, there evidently appeared many flaming lights and fire drakes shooting along in the air. The men of Liburnian and Core affirmed plainly. That within their Town they saw a Serpent with a red mane and eye, and the flame marked all over with yellow spots like gold: and it was held for certain that in the territory of Capua an ox spake.

Now were the Embassadors returned out of Africa by the * Nones of Jure, those I mean who went to Carthage, after they had been with King, and spake with him. But better & more certain intelligence they had by this King than from the Carthaginians themselves as touching the affairs that had pass'd in Carthage. Howbeit much they reported upon their suffered knowledge. that Carmines did come in from King Persenum and had audience in the Senat secretly by night within the Temple of Apollo. Also both the King informed flatly, and the Carthaginians themselves but faintly denied that Embassadors likewise had been sent from Carthage into Macedon. Whereupon the Senat was of advice and resolved to dispatch their Embassadors also into Macedon. And the three were sent, to wit C. Lucius M. Valerius M. f. f. s. and Sex. D. Pat. During this time, Persenum by occasion that certain Dolopians accused him not, and of some matters in controversy and difference referred the audience and decision to the Romans, and reined the arbiterment of the King led forth an army against them, and reduced the whole nation under his obedience and jurisdiction. From thence he pass'd over the Oetcean mountains, and upon certain religious motions arising in his mind he went up to Delphi for to visit the Oracle. Being thus on a sudden seen in the very heart and midst of Greece he tur'd a terrior not only into the cities next adjoining, but also the bent of this tumultuous alarm was blown as far as to K. Eumenes. After he had staid at Delphi, not above 3 days he return'd into his own realm by the way of Phthiotos, Achaea and Thrace through which there was no journey, but he addrest either Embassadors or wrote his letters, praying them to bear no longer in mind the enemies which had been between them and his father; for almag, as they were not to suffer and deadly but that they might well enough, yea, and ought to end and die with him; as far as himself; if he saw no more or him in the word to empeach them for entertaining a faithful amity with him. But above all others he fought means to be reconciled to the Achæans, and to return into grace and favor with them. This nation alone of all Greece together with the City of Athens, were grown into those terms of delight and maitre against the Macedonians, that they debarg'd them from once letting foot within their confines. And hereupon it came that when certain slaves fled out of Athens, they retir'd into Macedon for refuge, and there remained: and because the Achæans had forbidden the Macedonians to come within their liberties they durst not likewise for their parts enter into the matches and frontiers of his Kingdom to recover their bondmen. Which when Perseus perceived he cau't all those fugitive slaves to apprehended, and he dispatch'd his letters into the Achæans, wherein he wrote, That he would right courteously tend back their slaves home again although they were run away from them unto him; adventuring and advising them to beware and look well unto it, that there were no more any such escapes and runnings away of their bond servants hereafter. When these letters were read by Menarchus there Pretor, who long before came to favor and to wind himself into grace with the King most of them that were present judged the letters to have been written right graciously and with great government and moderation, but principally those persons, who beyond their hope were to recover and receive their slaves whom they had lost. But Callicrates one of them who were fully perswaded, that the safety of their whole estate depend'd upon the loyal obserwance and inviolable maintenance of the accord contract'd with the Romans, spake thus or to this effect following: * It may seem to come hereof, that matters of Athens that we are in question at this present of a small matter and of mean importance: but I for my part am of opinion, that we are not now in hand to treat but have already debated, and after a fort conclud'd, one of the greatest affairs and of most consequence that we know. For we who have in terred the KK. of Macedon and the Macedonians to come within our borders, and have de creed that this edict may stand firm and irrevocable, and that for this intent especially, Because we would admit neither Embassadors nor messengers from the KK. for fear of enterprize.
The one and fortieith Book of T.Livius.

Of them, the hearts of some among us might be solicited and tempted to novelty and alteration in us; yea, and more than that (God send us good sack) approve and applaud his Oration. And whereas the very wild beasts refuse (for the most part) the meat which is laid for a bait to deceive and kist them, yea, and have the wit to shun and avoid the same wise, blind beetles that we are, suffer our selves to be caught and fed with the vain appearance and colorable flower of a little kindness, and for hope to recover some poor slaves (a matter of small worth & reckoning) suffer our own freedom to be undermined, and in danger of subversion. For who hath not, that the overtaking is made, and the way laid open for entrance into confederacy with the Romans, wherein tendeth out weal and welfare?

Unless some man on adventure will make a question, whether the Romans most levy wars again. I Perfens! & no doubt there now after Philip is dead which in his life time was expected and by his death only interrupted? Two sons, ye know full well, K. Philip had, Demetrius and Perfens. For nobleness of parentage by the mothers side, or virtue, or wit, for the love and affection of the Macedonians, Demetrius far surpasse his brother. But for that the father interred ever & meant, that whether of his two sons hated the Romans, so the Romans should have the crown left him for recompence he caused Demetrius to be murdered, for no other crime in the world that could be laid to his charge, save only that he was entred into amity with the Romans: but Perfens he made the king, whom he knew that the people of Rome did, more worthy to suffer punishment then to inherit a Kingdom. And this Perfens, what other thing hath he done else after his fathers decease but made preparation for war; First & foremost, he procured the Baffianians to K. the terror of all the world for to invade. Darannum he if they had settled there, Grecia should have had more trouble some neighbors of them than Asia hath of the Galatians. And although he was dispointed of this hope yet he gave not over to design and plot for war; nay, if we will speak the truth, he hath already begun the war. Delphi hath he subdued by force & arms. & could not abide to hear that the determination of certain provinces which were debataba and matters should be referred to the award of the people of Rome. I thence having passed over the mountain O, that all upon a sudden he might shew himself in the very centre o, Grecia, he ascended up to Delphi. And to what end, think ye hath he taken this divertiour voyage and unaccustomd expedition? After this he made his progress all over Telfs; And what if he appointed and hurt none of them all, whom he hated in his heart? I fear me much the more this manner of dealing and that it is a bait to catch them wischal. Then forfooth, he kinded his letters unto us, with a goodly show of a present, and will eth us to think ete how to prevent from henceforth, that we never had need again of the like bounty of his. What is that, but to amend and repeal that edict of ours wherein the Macedonians are debarred from setting foot with in in P. lorneseus; and to bring about, that we may have againe the Kings Embassadors to come unto us, that we may entertain mutual hospitality between their Princes and ours? And anon after, see the Macedonian armies, yea, and the King also in person to crow from Delphi,(for a small arm of the Sea sixth between Delphi) and afterwards, that we and combine with the Macedonians, when they shall take arms against the Romans? As for me, this is mine advice; to make no new ordinance, but to let all alone in their order, as they now stand until such time as we are come to some certain termiss whether we have cause to be afraid, or fear only our own shadows: If the league shall continue firm and sure between the Romans & the Macedonians then may we have enter course of friendship, of commerce and traffick with them. But for this present to think & consider hereof in my simple judgment, is a nice and tick point & besides, out of faction untimely, and some what with the sonest. When he had thus said, Arco brother to Xenarchus the Pretor discoursed in this manner following: "Callicrates (argued he) hath caul'd me and all us besides, who are of contrary opinion to him, to find the more difficulty in speaking our minds to the cause in question. For whiles in maintenance of the association which we have with the Romans, he faith that it is disturb'd and troubled, (albeit there be no man about either to disturb or trouble it) he hath wrought cunningly and contrived, that whosoever cauler to gainfay him may be thought to oppose and set himself adgainst the Romans. In the first place, as if he had been a man, not conversing here among us but one comefrom the Senate of Kome or some inward secretary and of the privy counsel to the KK, he knoweth fortooth and uttereth all that in great secrecy hath been done. Nay, he foretellith like a wise man what would have enu'd, in case Philip had lived longer; & namelie, how it came about that Perfens thus inherited the crown; what the Macedonian designs are, and what the Romans intend to do. But who we know neither for what cause nor in what manner Demetrius came by his death nor yet what Philip meant to have done if he had lived still, must accomoda- dat & frame our comunication to those occurrences which have oftyn paied in the view of the world. We take knowledge, that Perfens, after he was invested in his throne and crowned King report ed to the Roman Embassadors; and we know ill why he was intimated by the people of Rome with the style of (King Perfens). We hear besides that Roman Embassadors came to the King, and were by him well received and graciously entertained. If I have any judgment, thele be all signs of peace and not of war, neither can the Romans be offens'd, as we followed them when they bare arms so we follow them now likewise as the authors of peace. And verily I see no reason why we alone of all other Greeks, shold make to mortal and inexpressible war against the the realm of Macedonia, What is it because we are so near unto the Macedonians, and by that vicinity exposed to all dangers from thence? or that we are the weakest of all the reft, and like to the Doliopites, whom Persians of late hath subdued? Nay! 1 wis, it is far otherwise and clean contrary. Sure enough we are for any harm they can do us; in regard either of our own forces (which the Gods of their goodnes have vouchsafed us) or of the distance of place (far remote). But yet care we be as much subject as the Thessalians and AEtolians. Say we are no more credit and authority among the Romans (albeit we have been always their associates and friends) than the AEtolians be, who were their open enemies but the other day: Then, what right, what priviledg and commerce, the AEtolians, the Thessalians, the Epipots, and in one word, all Greece besides, have and use with the Macedonians, we allo may have and hold the fame. How is it then, that we alone like curfed and damned creatures, should thus prattle to abandon the common law of men, and (as it were) renounce all human society, Be it that Philippus (when time was) did somewhat, and gave us hit canfe, armed as he was, and ever warring upon us, to pass this decree and cidet against him, what hath Persians deferred? Persians (I say) the new King, a harmless Prince that never did us injury: Nay, who is willing and lecketh by courtesies and good turns to cancel and rate out all former quarrels and enmities of his father? why are we the only enemies that he hath in the world? And yet, I might in full well & truly say that from the former Kings of Macedonia we have received so great favors and benefits, that in regard thereof, we should put up and forges the wrongs of Philippus alone (if haply he have done us any) at least a wife now after he is dead. and his head laid, Indeed, at what time as the Roman fleet rid in the harbor of Cecora and the Conful lay encamped with his army before Elatins, we far in counsel three days together, debaing and devising, Whether we should band with the Romans or fate with Pob pi And albeit the preent fear of the Romans before our cies, might have made us in our opinions to endine somewhat and lean toward them: yet there was something in it doublets, that it was so long ere we could refove and to fay, it was the ancient acquaintance and amity that we had with the Macedonians, and the great benefits which in old time we had received from their Kings, Why then me thinks, those left fame rewards should be of some force and efficacy to move us, if not to be their special and best friends, yet at leat wife not to be their principal and greatest eneemies. Let us not, Colatera, make semblance and they of that, which we are not in band with, and is no point of this preent question. There is no motive made of a new society: there is no person about to draw any capitulations of a new alliance, wherein we should rashly enwrap and entangle our selves, and be tied to any inconvenience, Only let there be a mutual commerce between us, and an alternative intercourse of yielding and demanding, to and fro, as appeartainethlet us not by interdicting and forbidding them to enter and traffick within our coun-dry, debar our selves likewise from all negotiation and dealing with them in their Kingdoms: that by this means our felves may have no place of retreat and refuge to flie unto, And what prejudice is this to the Roman condecracy? Whorefore make we thus of a small thing and evident, to great a mater and fuplicious? Wherefore raife we such troubles of nothing? Whorefore seek we to draw others into jeolony and hatred with the Romans, and all this to find means of contriving & flattering them? If there will be war, Persians (ye may more) maketh no doubt but that we altogether will follow the Romans yet to long as the peace holdeth, forfeate and suspend we in some fort our malice and hatred for the while; if ended for ever it may not be. When the fiue men who had conreived to the Kings letters before, gave their accord now also to this propose, the chief and principal perfon among them took great indignation and disdain that Persians should seem to demand and obtain that by a few lines in writing, which he deemed was not worth the sending an embayage. Whereupon the time was deferred and no decree raffe at this Seffion, Afterwards were Embaffadors addreffed unto them from the King, at what time as a Diet was hold-hen in M galipolis: but the fide which was for the Romans and feared to give them occlpation of dispersing and oiference, did they could to debar them of access and entrance into the Councel. And much about this time, by reafon of these firs the AEtolians grew enraged among themselves, and by dicharging their mutual fury in killing one another, had like to have brought the flate to a final ruin and deloration. But being weary the cief, they in the end as well of the one fide as the other lent their Embaffadors to Rome and also laboured at home to have the quarre, taken up, and to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was crofed by a new mifehief that came between which also rubbed the former galls and treat the old iores. For whereas certain Hypsians, exiled perrons, and being of the faction of Proxenus, were promised liberty to return home again into their country, with fale contefte all the fubtained by the emptiness one of the chief principal men of the City: so it was, that fourorfe of them, men of mark and quality (who made upon them as they returnd. Empelenus himself went out with the multitude) after they had been friendly received with courteous greetings, falfitations, and fhaking of hands, had no soon entered within the gate of the City, but they were maffacrect notwithstanding they pleaded the faithful promife of protection and called the Gods to witness, but all in vain. But this occafion the civil war between them waxed much hotter than before and turned in the end to a light fire: Now there arrived C. Flavius, L. Claudius Pulcher, G. Memmius, M. Popilius and L. Cautius, as fent from the Senate of Rome. Before these commissionnes, the Embaffadors from both fides appeared at Delphi and debated the matter with great earnefnes and vehemency, where Proxenus seemed to have leavened his hand as well in right of the caufe, as through his eloquent tongue.

Proc. (1 st.) who, within few days after, drank a cup of poison of his wives tempering, whereof he died: & his condemned, therefore, departed into exile. The like madness haunted the Candiots & did lade them with intolerable affliction. But upon the coming of Q. M. mutus the Lieutenant General, who was sent accompanied with a fleet of ten sail, to appease their debates, they fell to some terms of peace and attestation. There had been at the also before six months but afterwards the war flamed out much more terrible, the Lyr. gen. likewise at the same time, were infected & plagued with war by the Rhodians: But my meaning is not that either it is any part of my purpose to delineate the wars of foreign nations, nor to discourse of the circumstances how to proceed for enough I have to do, & more than I can; discharge to write the acts only of the people of Rome.

The Celtiberians in Spain, who being tamed by force of arms, had submitted to C. Gracchus remained quiet all the while: M. Taurus the Pretor continued there in government. But immediately on the arrival of A. Claudius they revolted and began to flow themselves in open action of rebellion by giving a sudden assault upon the Roman camp. It was about the break of day, when the sentinel upon the rampart and corpus de guard about the gates might discover enemies coming a great way and so they gave the alarm. A. Claudius having put out the signal of battle, in few words exhorted his soldiers to fight and play the men for the truth at the gates: the Celtiberians made head and opposed their forces as they used to forth. At first the skirmish was equal on both parts: for that reason of the frights of the pikestaff, all the Romans could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed still space, they were all at length gotten without the trench: so as they were able now to display their battalions & to confound their enemies from one point of their battalio to the other where with before they were unknown; and then they made to fortify a fully upon them, that the Celtiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the second hour of the day, they were discomfited and 15,000 of them either died in the place or yielded their bodies prisoners: 3,5 military enemies they lost and were turned out of the camp the same day; and here is an end of that: For as many as escaped the conflict get them home to their own towns & quietly afterwards bare the yoke of subjection.

That year were elected centurions, Q. Fulvius Flaccus & A. Postumius Albinius: who made a review of Senators and chse new. For President of the Senate they elected M. Emilius Lepidus the Archbishop. Nine they put out of the Senate-house: The principal persons noted and disgraced were there, M. Cor. M. A. i onix, who two years before had been Pretor in Spain, L. Cor. Scipio: Pretor for the time being, and L. I. b. J ustice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L. Fulvius, who was whole brother to the Centor himself: & as V. Ansia reporteth equal in degree of calling and his fellow every way, The Consuls also after they had made their vows within the Capitol went forth to their Provinces. The one of them, (to wit, M. Emilius) had in charge given him by the Senate to appease the sedition of the Padoans in Venice, who as their Embassadors made report, by factious siding and part-taking, were all on a side with civil war.

The Embassadors who were gone into Bithynia for to pacify the like troubles, brought word back, that it was not possible to bridge and restrain the furious rage of that nation. But the coming of the Consul made all whole among the Padoans and cured the malady: who having nothing else to do in the province returned to Rome.

Those Centors were the first that caused the streets of Rome to be paved with hard flint and M pebble stone within the City and the high ways and cauayes without to be raised with gravel: & the ines thereof to be well banked and kept in repair; also bridges to be made in divers places: a scaffold besides for the Ediles and Pretors to behold the games & plays. Moreover the barriers in the race, from whence the horses begin to run and the Oxales to mark and count the number of courses; * * Over and besides the goes beyond; * * the iron gates and cages; * * * and at the feasts in the mount Albane for the Consuls. They took order besides all this for the paving with flint of the cliff or cleft from the Capitol and from the gallery or porch before the temple of Sken lux looking toward the Capitol, unto the place called Senculenum; and the court Heslia over it, Also the merchants Hall or burse without the gate Terrensipor they paved with stone, and fenced it about with strong flanks and posts of wood. The gallery also Emilius they caused to be repaired: and made an ascent by stairs from the Tibre to the burse or merchants Hall aforesaid. Without the same place also, they paved with pebble stone the gallery or working place into the Acuto; * of the Temple of Venus. The same Centors bargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Ostyam: and having made sale of some publick edifices there, they employed the money raised thereof in making of shops & flats round about both the market places. The one of them that is to say, M. Fulvius, (for B. Plataeis said plainly, that unless it were by virtue either of an act of the Senate, or grant of the people of Rome,) he would put forth no works to be made with dispensence of their money) agreed upon a price for the building of a Temple to Jupiter at Placentia; & for the making a conduit for water to be conveyed to Pollentia and at Pannonia for a way to be paved and Simonis. * * * In the colonies he caused also a fink or vault be made to carry away all filthiness into the river: also the market place to be enclosed with publick-galleries and stop stands three stately halls called Tesi, with quarenfoors or four through-faces, and as many fountains; For these works one of the Consuls disbursed the money, and bargained with the Publicans and underakers, who in regard the inhabitants of those colonies above named gave him great thanks. These Centors were likewise severe and precise in exercising their office for the redressing and reforming of mens manners: for many Gentlemen had their horses of service taken from them, which were allowed them by the City.

After that App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senate ordained, that he should enter the City with the pomp of an Oration, and now approached the time for the election of new Consuls. Much ado there was and hard hold at this assembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Poppaeus Albinus and M. Popilius Laenas, were elected Consuls:

A little before the years end, there was a solemn procession holden one whole day for the happy abatement of the affairs in Spain, under the conduct and good fortune of Appius Claudius the Proconsul; and twenty head of great beasts were killed in sacrifice. And the morrow after they went in another procession with supplications, at the Temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera; for that there was reported from the Sabines country, a mighty earthquake, which over-turned many houses.

But that App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senate ordained, that he should enter the City with the pomp of an Oration, and now approached the time for the election of new Consuls. Much ado there was and hard hold at this assembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Poppaeus Albinus and M. Popilius Laenas, were elected Consuls:

B which done, the Pretors also were created, to wit, Ca. Fabius Beneo, M. Marcius, C. Cicero, M. Fur. Cossipes, A. Attillius Serranus, & C. Cluvius Saxonais, theie three last rehearsed, the second time, this business and solemnity finished. Ap. Claudius Cesai enting with Ovait pomp into the City for his victory of the Celtiberians, brought into the common treasury 10000 pounds weight of silver, and 5000 of gold, Ca. Cornelius was consecrated the Flamin of Jupiter.

The same year there was set up a painted Table in the Temple of the goddess Diana, with this inscription. Under the conduct and happy government of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Consul, the legions and army of the people of Rome, subdued Sardinia, in which Province, there were slain and taken prisoners 80000 enemies, which Gracchus (after he had managed the affairs of State most fortunately, delivered many captives out of bondage, and recovered the tributes and cornhomets to the Common-weal.) brought home with him his army safe and sound, charged with an exceeding rich booty, and returned the City of Rome, in a second triumph. In memorial of which exploit, he caused this table to be set up as a present in the honour of Jupiter.

Now this table contained the portraitures of the Island Sardinia, and the picture also and exemplification of sundry battles. Moreover, in this year were represented to the people certain pastimes and shews of wondrous players; whereof some were small and of no account; but one above the rest, exhibited by T. Flaminus, surpass'd, and this he did in honour of his father deceased; with a date of fables among the people, a great public feast besides, and Theatrical players for four days together.

But the principal matter in this festival solemnity was this, That in three days space there fought at utterance with unbated swords, three hundred and fourteen champions.

between citizens and loritaires. Unto Co. Fatini Butto fell the higher Spain, to M. Martinus the lower, M. Firmi Cypser was to govern Sicily, and C. Cicerini Sardinia. Before that these Magistrates took their journey, the Senate was of advice that L. Pothamius the Consul should go into Compan for to limit out the City-lords, apart from the grooms of private persons: for that was well and known, that particular men having out their bounds and encroaching by little and little upon the Commons, in process of time had a great part of it in their own possession. This Col, was angry and offended with the Franchises, for that upon a time when he went thither amongst them (in quality then of a private person) to offer sacrifice in the temple of Fortune, they hid him no honor neither in public nor private. Whence, upon his departure now from Rome, he addressed his letters before him to Transfers, that the chief Magistrate should come and meet him upon the way, provide him lodging at their Cities charges, and at his departure from thence to see that these were an impudent thing and beats of want ready for him. Now before this man Consult the Temples of Rome had never been hagrateable to their allies, nor put them to cost for anything whatsoever: and therefore allowed they were from the City their munies, let out they were with tents and pavilions, and all other necessity and provision for the wars, to the end that they should not lay upon the allies any such burden. Private lodging they had in friends houses, which they entertained courteously & liberally with reciprocal hospitality. For at Rome likewise their houses were open to receive their hosts of theirs, with whom they were wont before to have kind usage, and who had bid them welcome, in like manner Embassadors (if they were sent by chance to any place of a suddain) imposed upon the towns & cities through which they were to pass, some impudent horse only to farther expense were no allies present to any Roman Magistrates. This revenge of the Conslit for a discourtesy offered, (due & just though it were, yet not to have been exerted, during his magistracy) and the silence of the Princes (proceeding either of too much modesty or over-great fear) gave occasion to the magistrates ever since to take it for a privilege and custom to do the imitable, yearly to charge their allies with more grievous impositions every day than other in the same kind, as it the precedent example had been approved.

In the beginning of this year, the Embassadors that had been sent into Eceinia and Macedonia, made report, that they might not come to the speech of K. Perren, for that some said he was absent others that he was sick, and the one as false, as the other was untrue: howbeit, they might evidently perceive and see, that preparation was made for wars, and that he would delay no longer. But enter into arms, in like sort they related, that in Eceinia the civil dissension and sedition grew daily more and more, neither could the captains of these factions differ be represented and held in awe by their countenance and authority.

As the City of Rome was amused upon the continual expence of the Macedonian war, before any enterprise thereof begun, thought good it was and necessary, that order shoulfd be taken for the collection of prodigisms and the pacification of the Gods by way of humble prayers, such as were represented and delivered unto them out of the fatal books of Sibyl, Forst Lacteum were set, as the common voice went, certain烧ews and reembanies of a mighty great navy. Item, At Priene there grew black wood out of the earth. Also in the Velentine territory, near a Town called Kinum, it rained stones. Moreover, all the country Pomptum was overfull with tokens of Lousis and within the Land of Gallia, there were seen certain flies to leap from under the fearfulness of earth, that were turned with the plow as it took fitch and made purchase, For these tigers and fearful flights, the foresaid books were looked into and perused, and out of them the Senators declared and pronounced both unto what Gods sacrifice should be offered, and what beasts were to be slain thereupon, moreover, that the one supplication should be holden, as a propitiatory for these prodigious tokens, as also the other, which before had been vowed for the health of the people, should now be performed, and holyseips kept therefore. So the sacrifices were accomplished according to the order and form set down in writing by the Decemvirs.

The very same year was the Church of firme Icone uncovered, upon this occasion: Q. Feltoni Floricos the Consul was building ofconste to Fortuna equipher, which he had vowed during the wars against the Cельtiberos, when he was Lord Prefet in Spain. His desire and earnest endeavor was to strain himself, that there might not be in Rome a temple of more state and magnificence than this. And leapfing that it would be a great beautie and comfitant unto it, in case the roof were rocked with tiles of marble, he went into the Bruntis country, & there he was so bold with the Church above fayd of firo Lactiun, as to unite the one half thereof, making full account, that so much would serve for to cover that temple which he was a building. Boats and Barges he had readie for to receive and carry away the laid tiles or plates, without being imputed nor controlled for this acte by the allies, whom he held in awe and directed by his Consular authority. Now after the Consul was returned to Rome, those marble plates were decoated out of the forested vessels and crucified to the temple, and albeit no wordes were made item whence they came, were not considered it could not be. And thereupon arose much much muttering in the Senate, and from all parts thereof they called him upon the Consul, to have the matter put to question and debated of. The Consul was sent for, who was no sooner entered into the Senate but both all in general & also every one in particular had a fing at him, and much more fiercely approached him to his face in these terms That he could not be content to stuff and violate the most holy and stately Church in these parts, which neither Tyrrhen nor Annibel ever offered violence unto: unless he uncovered it all also in foul
A foul sort, and in manner laid it ruinat, the lantern thereof was taken away and gone the roof of bare and naked exposed and open to rain and soul weather, and thereby a subject to rots that he being chosen Centurio for to reform the manners of others; to whom it appertained by his office to see that the Temples were close and cover; to call upon them, that all public places be kept windright and water-right and in sufficient repair that he (lay) of all others should range over the Cities of allies & confederate states pulling down their Temples as he goeth & uncovering the roofs of the edified edifices and in demolishing the Churches of the immortal Gods; commit that, which if he did but prachlie upon the private holies of allies, might seem an unworthy & a great indignity; and finally, by rearing one Temple with the ruin of another, oblige the people of Rome with the very guilt of his own crime; as it (1 wis) the immortal Gods were not the fame in all places, but that we must honor and adorn some of them with the spoil of others. Now as it was apparent (before the matter was put to the centre of the Senate) which way the LL, inclined in opinion: So immediately upon the proposing thereof, they all opined and gave one temenose, That order should be taken with the publicans of the City works, for the carrying back again of the same chatties to the former Temple, and that certain propitiatory sacrifices should be offered for the pacification of Ianu. As for all ceremonies required toward the divine service aforesaid, they were with all complements performed accordingly: but the farmers who had undertaken at a price to recarry to reary thoselites, brought word that they had landed them in the chamber and there left them, because they might not meet with any workman who could deifie with all the skill and cunning he had; how to betower them as they were laid and touched before.

B If those Pretors who were gone into their Provinces, M. Fabius as he was in his journey toward his high Spain died at Maffiles by the way, & the defeat upon intelligence given thereunto by the Maffilian Embassadors, the Senate ordained that P. Furius and Co. Scipio, whom to succeed others were to be lest should call losses between themselves, whether of them should continue still in the place of the former Temple, and that certain propitiatory sacrifices should be offered for the pacification of Ianu.

The same year, by order of that good part of the Ligurians, and Gauls territory won by conquest lay void and was not as yet in the tenure and occupation of any man there piaffed in the Act of the Senat, that it should be divided by the poll. So, A. Auleius the Libic inmate of the City of Rome, by a decree granted out of the Senat, created ten Deem vicators or commissioners for that purpose, to wit, M. C. Lepidas, C. Affinius, T. Eutates Parrus, C. Cornelius, C. Cornelius, C. Scipio, Q. and L. both named Apuleius, M. Cæcius, C. S. Hostius, and C. Manculus. To every Roman citizen they let out ten acres spects: and to the Latin allies three.

About the same time that those affairs piaffed at Rome there arrived thither Embassadors out of Etruria about their own civil discord and editions. Likewise there came others from Hiff in reporting what was a doing in Mocacina. For Perwent (calling now in his mind how to compiles that war which during his fathers levi he deviled and thought upon) gerrared out to draw and win into him not only all the nations but the cities of Greece, by sending his embassies among them, & promising liberally more than he performed. Howbeit the hearts of the most part were inclined to him and favored his designs, yet, and much more affectionat than to K. Eumenes not withstanding his defections, and of the most of the principal personages were obliged unto Eusebus, and in fee they were with him, in regard of many countries and glorious faults received at his hands, & that he carried himself in his own realm that the cities with whom he were obiect unto him, were not willing to change their condition with any of the free states whatsoever. Whereupon contrarily the were bent, that Perpent after his fathers decease, killed his wife with his own hands and likewise trebetly murdered Appius, whose minitry and service in former time he had used in taking away the life of his brother Demestor for which cause he lived in exile: he made another his philop made search after him for to have him punished accordingly: and (lay) he was murdered after he had sent upon his fathers death, and procured him to come unto him, with great promises to recompen them highly for the execution of the forfald fact, Yet as infamous as he was with these furnila-meal murders, and for no good part and worthy otherwise commendable he was commonly better regarded of the States of the country than King Eumenes a Prince of kind and good to his kinsfolk joit just and righteous to his subjects in bounteous and perpetue to all men; whether it were that they, pitied sorely and with the fame and mercy of the Eudionis King's defiled the rising of this new Kingdom, or that they were deferr'd of no cities and relations or allay that they wished and had a defete that he should make head against the Romans.

Now were not the Etrurians only together by the ears among themselves by reason they were dived to deep in debt but the Theasilians also and this problem madely as it were by catching and infection was spread as far as Perrebuebit, But after that the Senat was advertised that the Theasilians had taken arms, they sent App. Claudius Embassador to see and appease these troublesome who having rebuked and chosified the Captains of both sides, eased and thinned off a great part of the debt which grew burdensome and grievous by excessive nuyry, and that with content of the most of the creditors who had thus overcharged their debters he parted the piment of the due debt and principal by even portions for certain years. The trouble in the Carse of Perrebuebit likewise was reduced into good parts of quietness by the self-same Appius, and after the same order. And at the very same instant Murellius visited the Etrurians, and took knowlledge at D. tibi of their troubles and apprehensions which proceeded from very hostile hearts and minds, enemy-like, were purffed with with civil war. And when he saw that they contended and strove much to surpass one another in hath courtes and audacious: he would by his decree neither charge nor discharge the one party more than the other: but he required them indifferent on both sides to ablaze from war, to make an end of discord and dissension, and bury all that was past in perpetual oblivion. Whereupon they were reconciled: and this their attonement was ratified with the assurance of pledges interchangeably given: and accorded it was, they should meet at Corinthus, there to betake their hostages. From Delphi and that general dies of Aetolia, Macedonist crossed the Seas into Pegophymenin, where he had appointed and published a solemn assembly and council of the Achaeans. Wherein he highly praised and commended the whole nation, for observing to fidelity their old decree, whereby they disbanded and excluded the Macedonian Kings out of their confines he declared evidently and preferred to the view of all the world, what malice and hatred the Romans bare to Persia, and that it might break out the sooner into open wars. King Lumnines came to Rome, and brought with him a note or abstract of all the preparations for the war, which with diligent search and inquiry in particulars, he had gathered.

Much about the same time the five Embassadors sent unto K. Persia for to see into the affairs of Macedonia, were commanded to take a voyage as far as Alexandria to renew the old amity with King Ptolemaeus. The names of them were these, C. Valerius, C. Luscius, Cercio, Q. Licinius Sales, M. Cornelius Mamvrdus, and M. Caelius Dentor. And even then or not much after, there came Embassadors from King Antiochus: and the chief and principal person among them, one Apollonius was admitted to come into the Senate, where he exalted the King his master for many good and just reasons in that he had not sent his tribute made payment so soon as he ought by the day appointed: but now (he said) that he had brought it all, to the end that the King should be to them beholden for nothing but the relief of time only. And besides, that they were come with a present of certain place of gold weighing 300 pounds, That the King his petition was, That the society and friendship which had been contracted between his father and them, might be renewed also with him: promising that if the people of Rome would impose any thing upon him to be done, which were to be laid upon a good and faithful ally, he would not fail in his devise to perform all offices whatsoever. For why the Senate had so well delivered of him, at what time as he journeyed in Rome, and such country, he found among the flour of the Roman yong Gentleman, that of all degrees and sorts of men he was reputed and used more like a King indeed, than an hostage for the time. These Embassadors received a gracious answer: and withal, A. Attilius L the Praetor of the City was enjoined to renew the treaty with Antiochus, which had been concluded with his father. As for the tribute the treasurers of the City received it: and the Cenfors took all the golden vessels aforesaid, who had the charge to believe the same in what Temples they thought good, Unto the chief Embassador was sent a present in money, amounting to the sum of one 1000000 drachms: who also was allowed an house to lodge in at his pleasure of free-cost: and all his charges were defrayed by the City, during the time that he made abode in Italy. The Embassadors who had been in Syria, gave this report of him, That he was a man in great favour and highly honoured with the King: and besides, singularly well affected to the people of Rome. Now concerning the affairs of the provinces for that year, thus much as followeth.

C. Cicerin the Praetor fought in ranged battle with the enemies in Corfin, wherein 7000 of the Thessalians were slain: and 1700 and better taken prisoners. In that conflict the Praetor had vowed to build the Chappel of Juno Moneta. After this was peace granted to the Corinthians at their own suit and seeking but they were compelled to pay to hundred thousand weight of wax, Cicerin having thus subdued Corfin, passed from thence over into Sardinia. A field also was fought in Liguria, within the territory of the Statelles, near the Town Corfinus: for thus assembled a great army of the Ligurians. At first upon the arrival of M. Popilius the Consul they kept close within the walls: but afterwards seeing the Romans at the point to give assault and to lay battery to the walls, they issued forth of the gates and embattalied themselves. The Consul for his part forsook not to come to hand-fight, the only thing he fought for in threatening to give battle. The conflict continued above 3 hours, and the hope of victory hung in equal balance: N which when the Cof. perceived, namely how the Ligurian ensigns removed not and gave no ground: he commanded his Cavaly to mount on horsteback, and to charge with all their force and violence upon their enemies in three several places: many of the horstmenn pierced quite through the midst of the battall, and paused so far, that they charged the enemies upon the back as they fought. Whereupon the Ligurians were much terrified and began to flee from all parts: very few retired back into the City, by reason that the horstmenn made head against them that way most: besides, many of the Ligurians were left dead in the place: such was their resolute pertinacity in fight: killed also they were everywhere as they fled. Ten thousand (by report) fell upon the edge of the sword, above seven hundred taken prisoners in one place or other, and 82 military ensigns were carried away. And yet was not this victory without effusion of Roman blood: for there died of them not so few as three thousand soldiers, by reason that the form of both sides fought so manfully in the forefront, and while they would not give ground one to the other, were slain down and slain without mercy. After this battall, the Ligurians rallied themselves into one place, out of all parts where they were scattered in the rout: and finding that more of their men were left than left behind (for in all they were not above ten thousand) they yielded simply without any composition: howbeit in good hope they were, that the Consul Conful would not deal worse by them nor in a more rigorous manner than other Generals before him. But he disarmed them all, took their Town, sold their bodies & all that they had, and sent letters to the Senat of these exploits of his. Which when A. Arrius, the Pretor had read in the Senat, (for the other Conful Pofulumus was absent, by occasion that he was employed in the survey and visiting of the Lands in Campania) they thought it a very hard and cruel conte. For the Statelists, who only of all the Liguans had not borne arms against the Romans, who were then affailed first, when as they began not of their own accord to make war, who also put themselves into the protection of the Romans, should be thus rigorously treated. Thus, throughly membed and confounded in most cruel manner; that so many thousands of frank condition, innocent persons, and imploring the mercy of the Romans, should be thus hold out right. {A most dangerous example, B that never hereafter any one will venture to admit himself again:} and finally, that they should be dilated and carried away into all parts, to live in slavery under them, who having sometimes proclivcly enemies of the Romans, now enjoy peace and repose. In regard whereof, there passed an act or act of the Senat that M. Popillius the Conul should pay back the price unto the buyers, and restore to the Liguans their former liberty, to take order also that their goods (as much as possibly might be recovered) should be remit unto them: also that amours should be made in that nation with all speed possible, and that the Conul so soon as he had restituted the Liguans (upon their submission) in their former estate, should depart out of the Province: and as much as the honour of victory consisted not in exercising cruelty upon the poor and afflicted, but in vanquishing the obstinate. But the Conul, as he bare himself proud and true against the Liguans, so)

C threw as great forwardness and disobedience to the Senat. And having sent away the legions to winter in Pyra, he returned to Rome, carrying a fell and angry storm against the LL. and as spiteful and malicious a mind to the Pretor: where immediately he assembled the Senat in the Temple of Belona, and rated up the Pretor in broad and gross terms. For that he, whole part he had been to have moved the Senat for thanksgiving to the immortal Gods, in regard of the happy achievement of the wars, in deed thereof passed an act of the Senat against him and in favor of the enemies. for to put him by his victory and to give it away from him to the Liguans: and finally, being no better than a Pretor, would have had the Conul yielded in manner up into their hands. Whereupon he said that he would be bold as let a snuf on his head: and withal, he required the LL. of the Senat to command and ordain, That the act devised against him might be D revered; and to give order, that the proceedings which in his ableness they ought to have decreed (upon his letters sent of his good success) might now be holden; in consideration first of the honour due to the immortal Gods, and then respectively in some measure for his own defeat. But after he was checked by some of the Senators to his face, and that in no milder terms than he had been rebuked in his absence, he went his wiles into his Province again, and obtained neither the one nor the other.

The other Conul Pofulumus having spent the whole summer in surveying the Lands only, and never so much as seen his own Province, returned to Rome against the general assembly for election, and created Conuls C. Popillius L. a. a. Consequently were Pretors elected, to wit, C. Luctius Caius, M. Lucius Pansa, S. Lucretius, Sp. Claudius, Cn. Sicius, and C. Memmius, the second E time. In that year was holden a review of the City and the number taken of citizens, (when as Q. Fulvius Flaccus and L. Pofulumus Albins were Centors:) wherein were found and enrolled of Roman citizens 269015. The number was somewhat the less by reason that L. Pofulumus the Conul had proclaimed in a public audience, That no person of those Latin allies, who were to return into their own Cities (by virtue of an edict made when C. Curiones was Conul) should be enrolled into the subsidy book at Rome, but every man in his several City. This Centorship was administered with concord and unity, yea and to the good and profit of the common weal. What Senators forever deplored from their place and dignity, and so many Gentlemen of Rome as took their Hores from them, they made them all no better than contributions to pay all sort and lot, yea, and displaced them out of their tribes. And look whomsoever the one of them noted F with disgrace and ignominy, he was not relieved nor allowed again by the other. This Fulvius dedicated the Temple of Fortuna Equestris, now six years after he had vowed the same in a fatal which he fought with the Celtiberians, at what time as he was Pro-conul in Spain, likewise he exhibited the flage-plates for four days together, and one day in the cirque or thief-place. Corn. Licinius (a Decemvir for the holy rites and sacrifices) that year died; in whole room was substituted A. Pofulumus Albins. There were such mighty blasts and clouds as it were of locusts, brought suddenly at once by a wind from the Sea into Apulia, that with their swarms they overspread all the fields far and near. For the riddance of which no one vermine consuming the fruits of the earth, Cn. Sicius, Pretor elect, was sent with his full commission of command into Apulia, who assembled a mighty number of people for to gather them up, and employed much G time thereabout.

In the beginning of the year ensuing, wherein C. Popillius and P. Aelius were Conuls, the remnant of the deoctes which arose the year before, was set on foot again. The LL. of the Senat would have had the matter proposed & debated again as touching the Liguans, and the ordinance of the Senat in that behalf renewed. But, as Aelius the one Conul put up a blithere, to Popillius the other was an earnest inter, & befought both his colleague & also the Senat in the behalf of his brother; may, he proceeded so far, that he gave the house to understand, in case they went about any such decree degree prejudicial unto him, he would cross and revoke the fame by which countenance of his he disinherited his colleague but the LL were offended much more and stormed against both the Comilus, yes, and persisted still in their enterprise. And therefore when it was debated in coun cil as concerning the Provinces, albeit the Cott, made means to be sent into Macedon (because the war of Perseus was no near at hand) yet Leguria was allotted to both of them; for the LL, professed and said, That they would not pass a decree for the government of Macedon, unless the cale of Pepillus were p. enforced, and an act thereof entered. Afterwards, when they demanded a warrant to enrol new armies, or at least-wise to levy a supply for making up the old, both the one motion and the other was denied. The Pretors also, who required to have a supplement with them into Spain, had a day and name, M. Junius into the hishe province, and P. Lucettus into the father.
As for C. Lucinius Crassius, to him there fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City over citizens, and I to Cn. Semius, that other over forrasiers, C. Memmius was allotted to Sicily, and Cn. Claudia to Sardinia. The Comilus for these causes being highly offended and angry with the Senate, called the Latinefeasts and holydays to be published against the very first day that possibly they might, with an any affairs touching the State, but only that which directly pertained to their government.

Valerius Antias writeth, that in these Comilus's year, Attalus the brother of K. Eumenes came in embassage to Rome, to inform criminous matter against Perseus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for war. But the Annals of many other writers (more worthy of credit) than he deliver unto us, that K. Eumenes preferred himself in proper person: where he was received with such honor, as the people of Rome thought not only meet & agreeable for his defects, K but alfo fit and favorable to their own favours and benefits, which they had in ample manner conored and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senate, where he shewed the cause of his coming to Rome what it was, namely, "(besides a foreign enemy, that he had to fee those gods and men by whole grace favour he enjoyed to good estate, as better he durst not with) because he gladly would advertise the Senate by word of mouth, to prevent and withdraw the designs of Perseus, And beginning his plea with the platforms and enterpries of Philip he recounted withial how it coll his son Demetrius his life, for that he foid against the war with the Romans: moreover, how he had caufed the whole nation of the Baffarimans to quit their own country, where they were born and bred, to the end that by their aid he might pass over into Italy: but whereas (as he) these matters he projected and cast in his head his time was come, and strefted he was by death: but he left his Kingdom to him, whom he knew to be the most spiritful enemy that the Romans had. And therefore Perseus having received this war (as a man would) by way of inheritance left him by his father even toget-ther with the crown and scepter, from the very fift day of his reign, both sought else but entertain, foster, and promote the fame by all the means and devices that possibly he can. Mighty and purftant he is besides in number of yong, lucky, and able men for service, who during the time of long peace have sprung up and multiplied exceedingly. In wealth and riches a great potentate he is, and besides in his flourishing years and the best time of his age, which as it is accompanied with the very strength and vigor of his body, so his spirit and mind is inspired and hardened with skillfull experience and long practive of martial feats. For from his very infancy mused hath he been in the field and camp, conversing ordinarily within the royal tent and pavilion of his fathould, acquainted with the wars, not only waged against neighbour nations, but also against the Romans; and that which more is, emploied by him father in many and sundry expeditions and executions of service. But since that he smiled, and the Kingdom, and swayed the regal scepter in his own hand, he hath exploited & accomplished many things with marvellous felicity and success, which his father Philip before him could never compass and effect, notwithstanding he tried and did claim all means as well open for easier secret fraud, To augment this greatness of his, he hath purchased already that authority and reputation in the world, which others hardly in continuance of long time, and by many favors and ample benefits attain unto: and namely, throughout the States of Greece and Africa, all men revere his majesty. For what good turns, for what pleasures done, for what bounty of his they should thus do and honour him to much, neither fee I, nor can I try for certainty whether it happen by a special gift and fortune that what he hath of his own or that (which I am my self afraid to speak) it be the deep malice and hatred which he hath conceived again the Romans, which is the cause that he is of that countenance and of graces among them, Nay, with the very Kings and Princes of other nations he is highly esteemed and of palling authority. The daughter of Seleucus he hath taken to wife, without any fault of his own but being eminently wood and required thereunto. And to Philip he hath given his own filler in marriage, after much seeking and impatient trity. These two weddings were solemnized with the exceeding joy and incomparable presence of infinite embassagers: and who should be present to celebrate the Amities and complements, yes and give those promises in marriage, but the nobleft and most renowned States that were? The Balthian nation had been much solicited by Philip yet could never be induced to draw or pen any covenants of accord and amity with him: but now there is to be seen a league engrossed, yes, and engraved in three several conspicuous places, the one in Thes, a second at Sideryms, within a most holy face, and renowned Temple, and the third at Delphi. What should I speak of the general Council of the Achæans? wherein, had not the design been dasthed by some there in place, who intimated and alledged

a. alluded hard the soignory and empire of the Romans, it would have gone very hard, but that he should have set forth even within Achaia. But contrariwise I assure you may due and deferred honors (unto whom it is hard to say, whether they be more bounden and obliged for private pleasures or publick benefits) are either forstent through retcheless dilute and negligence, or else annulled and abolished of willfull malice and hostile hatred. As for the Eotarians, who knew not, that in his civil broils, and seditions they fought to Perseus for to relieve and secure, or, not to the Romans? Being thus upheld with societies and amities, he hath provided such furniture of his own, and made that preparation for war at home, as he needs none from abroad. Of himself he is thirty thousand strong in foot & 5000 in horse. For ten years he is flored with corn forstore, &c. for that kind of purveyance he may spare his own territories, and also forbear his enemies. As for money in ready coin, he hath such abundance, that over and above the forces

b. of natural Macedonians, he wasteth 10000 mercenary foulidiers, and hath where with to make pay for as many years besides the yearly cumbones & profits that arise out of their Kings mines. Now for armour, he hath gathered together into his arsenals and armories, sufficient to furnish three such armies. What should I speak of the youth and serviceable men of war? Set the case that Macedon failed him and were not able to find enough; all Thracia is subject unto him, from whence he may serve his turn as out of his ever running mountain and living spring. The rest of his speeche he knitt up with an exhortation in this manner. I relate not these things (say he) my L. of Rome, as blown abroad and vented by headlese heartes and doublefull rumors; neither have I been ready to beleev them, as a man deiduous that such cunomous imputationsshould be verified upon my enemy, but as undoubted and certain reports upon my own knowledge, as if I had been sent by you of special purpose to be spicke and declared that and no more, which I have seen with mine eyes and not other wise. Neither would I have left mine own realm wherein (by your means and goodnesse) in glorious and magnificent State it was warm enough, for to fail, over to large a sea as I have done and to carry vain tales and untruths to you, thereby to crack my credit with you for ever hereafter. But I tell you these eyes of mine have seen the most renowned and noblest Cities of Asia and Greece discovering more and more from day to day, what they intend and what their meaning is: who if they let alone and permitted to run on as they begin, would be engaged to far, as they might not possibly return again & save themselves by any repentence. Behold I have Perseus (say he) how he containeth not within the realm of Macedon, but one while leizeth upon this by force of arms, another while ganneth and geteth by that favour and good will, which with violence he could never have conquered. I perceived and considered weall how unequal the match and condition is, whereas he upon prepareth war, and you again perform to him security of peace. Although in my conceit, and to say as I could see into it, he made no more any preparation thereof, but was already upon action and execution. For he chaled Abyrapolis, a confederate prince, and friend of yours. to his, of his kingdom. And Arteaus the Illyrian, another of your associates and allies, he killed outright, because he found that he had written some letters unto you. As for Eversa & Callisthenes, both Thebans, & two principal States of that City, for no other reason, but because in a Parliament of the Boeotians, they had spoken their mind against him too frankly, and avowed that they would relate unto you what things had passed, he caused to be murdered. The Bizantines he scourged against the order taken in the accord: upon Daelonia he levied war: Thessaly and Doris both he invaded and overran with his army, to the end, that in some intelliing and civil war, by the help of most parts he might allitate and plague the better. He fluffled all together, and made a very confusion of the State in Thessaly and Perrheia, upon the hope and cancelling all bonds and crossing out all debt books; that thus by a power and multitude of bankrupts, such as were over-deeply engaged, and whom he had obliged and bound to himself, he might deprede and apprehite the great men and principal personages. Having wrought these practices uncontrolled, whereas you still looking on and suffering all, be leaving you to let him do with Greece what he list, making full account, that no man will put him on arms and make head against him, before he passed over into Italy. Now that this may be to you, say, how this can stand with credit, see you to that and be advised. For my self, I assure you, I thought it mere shame and very villany, that Perseus your enemy should enter into Italy to make war upon you, before that your friend and ally, came to give your warning for to take heed and stand upon your guard. Now since I have in this manner performed my devoir, done that office which I was bound upon necessity, and in some measure acquit my self and discharged my bounden duty and obligation of fidelity, whatsoever remaineth behind for me, do but to be your headsmen to all the gods, & goddesses, &c. vouchsafe you that grace, that you may provide for your own Commonwealth, and also for your friends and allies, who depend wholly upon you? In this last speech he came nearer unto the LE of the Senator. But for the present no man might know any thing, but only that the K. had been in the Senate, so long were they at, & kept the council-houle cloe shut with leere &c. But after the war was brought to an end, then came an houre, both what the K. spake, and what answer was returned to him again.

Some few days after, the Senator let to give audience unto the Embassy of the King Perseus; but having their minds and ears both, poisossed with ore of fire by King Ennomos, all the defence that the Embassadors made, and all the earnest they used, was rejected. Besides, the threatenings used by Harparate (the principal person of the embassy) moved their minds and exasperated their tempers. For he said, that indeed the K. desire & endeavours was to be credited and beleived in,
Apology and defence, that he neither had said nor done any thing tending to hostility; as mary, H.
In case he perceived and saw that they came upon him thus and would needs pick quarrels and give occasion of war, he would stand upon his guard, and defend himself with a resolution and va-liant courage. For the hazard of the field was common, and the issue of war uncertain. Now, all the Cities of Greece and Asia both, would rather then their lives have known what the Em-bassadors of Persia, and what Emmeras had done in the Senate; for in regard of his coming, most of the states (supposing very that he would flir coasts and make some work had lent their Embassadors to Rome, pretending colourably other matters in falsehood, but indeed to listen after news: and among the rest, was the Embassage of the Rhodians, and the chief thereof was one Satyrus, who made no question nor doubts, but that Emmeras had done their errand, and put their City and Persia together in all their criminal matters laid to his charge. And therefore he made all the means that possibly he could by the mediation of patrons, friends, and acquaintance, to de-bate this matter with King Emmeras before the body of the Senate; when which he found, his tongue walked at large, and over both his ears, and in a short time round with the King, in broad invective and insinuating terms; namely, that he had solicited and stirred up the nation of the Lycians against the Rhodians, and was an heavier friend unto Aghanen Antiokhos had been. Which speech of his as it was plentiful enough and pleasing to the States of Asia (for they likewise by this time inclined to attack and favor Persia) it was not univcrsally altogether and odious to the Senate, and not unpleasant to themselves and their City. But contrariwise, this banding and conspiracy against Emmeras, was him the more grace and favor among the Romans; so as they did all they honour they could, gave him more rich and costly presents, and endowed him with a curul chair of estate, and a luffe of earls, both of ivory.

After these embassages had their dispatch and were dismissed, Harpalus returned into Macedonia in all speed and bulk possible, relating unto the King, bow he had left the Romans not preparing as yet for war; but to cast out with him and to highly offended, that he appeared evidently would not be his case they began. And Persia again for his part besides that he looked for go other, was well enough pleased therewith, presuming upon the favor and strength of his forces, but above all he mulcted Emmeras more: with whom a whole he laid the first foundation of the war: for he informed one Evander a Cadet and captain under him of certain auxiliary foot-soldiers, and three Macedonians besides (whole service and ministry he had used in the like fears) to murder the King. He gave them letters addressed to one Praxean hoste of his, a jolly dame in L. Delphu, and with greater credit and wealth among them. For affair he was, that Emmeras minded them might of the King, as had been some communication, enterd into the narrow path aforesaid, with that, the knives that lay in wait behind, rose up and rolled down two huge stones, whereof the one smote the King upon the head, the other stroke his shoulder. And very all the rest of his friends and followers, seeing him fall with the blow, fled some way, some one another; only Pamordus behind all, fearlessly protect and guard the King. The murderous villains might have fetched a flor's worthabouts about the wall, and soon run to the King to make fare work; and dis-patch him quiter, for they supposing they had done the deed already, fled to the pitch of the mount Parunis, and made such haste, that when one of the company hindered and stayed their running, because he dragged behind and could not keep pace and follow them hard at heels through the steep and blind ways, they made no more ado but killed him out-right, for fear lest if he was taken, he should betray and delate the whole plot. The body of the King lay along on the ground and first his friends came running about him then his guard and household servants. When they saw him up, they found them altered with the vilest and altogether fentele in a trance however, by some heart remaining, and the beating of his heart, they perceived there was some life but little or none they had that he could escape at a live. Some there were of his guards and officers about him that made point after these murderers by their tracks: and when they had held on their chases as far as unto the crest of Paranis, weeping themselves to no purpose, they gave over and returned as were as they went. The Macedonians as they had begun an a.-

A person to come unto him, that the tumor ran into Asia, how he was dead. And Attis [his brother (by your leave)] gave good car thereto, & believed the news sooner then was believing brotherly love and unity. For he entred into such talk both with his brothers wife, and also with the captain of the cattle, as if he had been the undoubted heir and allured inheritor of the crown. All this Eumenes knew full well afterwards; who albeit he purposed to distmible the nation, and to put it up at last with silence; at their first encounter and meeting together, he could not hold, but reproved and reproached his brother, for being so forward and over-hasty to court and wooe his wife. The fruit also was known to Rome, and a report there was of the death of K. Eumenes.

About the same time C. Valerius was returned out of Greece, who had been sent thither as Embas-adiator to look into the state of the country; to mark also and observe the plots and proceedings of Persia. He reported all thingsutable and agreeable to the intelligence given by King Eumenes, and withall, brought with him from Delphi same Prose, in whole house those villainous traitors were lodged and barbouried: also one L. Ramnius Brandus, who informed moreover and gave evidence as followeth. This Ramnius was one of the principal citizens of Brundisium, and used to hog and entertain in his house, not only of the Roman captains when they came to town, but also the Embassadors of foreign nations, such as were of greatest mark, and principally those that were sent from any Kings. By these means, acquainted he grew with Persia, albeit he never had seen one another's face. And being invited by the King his letters, wherein he was promised great hope of some nearer and inward friendship upon others; and consequently of great presents thence, he made a journey unto him. Within a short time he was wound into very familiar acquaintance with the King, and drawn into private conference and discourse of sects,

C farther, I saw, then himself was willing of it. For the King dealt with him, and committed him with infant praisers and large beholds of rich rewards, that forasmuch as the Roman captains and Embassadors used to take his house for their Inne, he would cause as many of them as he writ for, to be poisoned. Now forth that he knew it was a right difficult and dangerous matter to come by such a potion and compass this project, especially if many were party to him: and besides, the event uncertain, either in the effect of the drug it fell to be strong, quick and forcible enough to do the fea; or in the secret working thereof, lest it should be found and spied. He would therefore put into his hands such a potion, as neither in the giving, nor after it was given, might be known by any sign whatsoever. Ramnius fearing lest if he refused & denied, he should be brought to make away and make experiment of the potion promised to him, did accept of it, and departed, but return to Brundisium he would not before he had spoken with C. Valerius the Embassador, who then sojourned (as he heard say) about Chalced. First unto him he revealed this plot, and by his commandment came along with him to Rome: where being brought into the Senat, after audience given, he told abroad in every point all that had passed. This new matter, over and besides those which Eumenes had reported, was the cause that Pericles was the sooner taken for an enemy, and so declared; the rather because they saw him not only about to make open war of a princely and royall mind, but also to practice and execute pri- vate all kind of iniquity, by way of covert brigandsage, thewic health, and secret poison. The managing of this war was put off and referred to the new Coni's howbeit for the present ordained it was, that Co. Cincius the Pretor who had the jurisdiction between citizens and strangers, should levy and enroll soldiers who being conducted to Brundisium should with all convenient speed commit to fe, and fall over to Apollonia in Epirus, for to take upon the maritime Cities; to the end that the Coni unto whom the Province of Macedon should be allotted, might arrive there with his vessels in safety, and let his forces on land with ease.

Eumenes, after he had been kept a long while at Agrig, during the time of his hard and dan- gerous cure, so soon as ever he might go safely abroad, went to Persiana; where, over and besides the old hatred fixt in his breast, being pricked also with this fresh bleeding villany practised by Persia, he prepared war with all his power to the utter ext. and further repaired unto him Embassadors from Rome, to tell their joy for his elevation and escape out of to near and great a danger.

F When the Macedonian war was delayed and put off for one year, and the rest of the Pretors gone already into their provinces, M. Junius and Sp. Lucretius (unto whom befell the government of Spain) after that they had importuned and we ried the Senat, in lying so long for one thing, obtained at the length a commission for a supply of soldiers to make up the army; by virtue whereof they enrolled 3000 foot, and 500 horse for the legions; and levied 5000 foot and three hundred horse for the army of the allies. These forces were transported into Spain with the new Pretors.

The same year, after that a great part of the Campain territory, which privat persons here and there held in occupation without regard of lawful title & tenure, was (upon diligent survey made by Pobulumis the Comital) recovered again for the public use of the City of Rome; M. Lucre- tius the Tribune of the Com. preferred a law, that the Centors should let out to farm the Campain, lands to tenants for yearly tent. A thing that had not been done for many years after the winning of Capua, namely, that particular men should be so greedy as to encroach thus beyond their bounds upon the common walk.

The Macedonian war being now concluded, but not as yet published and proclaimed, whilest the Senat was in doubtful expectation what K.K. would friend them, & who would side with Perseus.
there came to Rome Embassadors from Armenia, bringing with them the Kings son, a very H child. The speech they made was to this purpose, that the King their master had sent his son to Rome, that he might have his education at the end that being there brought up, might from his infanttude be acquainted with their fashions, and converse with the people of Rome. His suit and request to them was, that they would vouchsafe unto him not only the ordinary entertainment and protection that private persons afford to their guests, but also to take the charge of publick tuition, and as it were the guardianship of him. This embassage of the King was well taken of the Senate & pleased them highly. Whereupon they ordained, that C. Licinius the Pretor should set out a manipation house with all the furniture, wherein the young prince and his train might keep their refiance.
The Thracian Embassadors like wise preferred themselves before the Senate, to debate their own contrroversies in their bearing, and withall defined their friendship and amity. They obtained their lent, and besides there was sent unto them by way of present, the sum of 2000 L. besides a peace.
Glad were the LL. of the Senate that these States were received into their society, by reason Thracia lyeth hard on the back side of Macedon: but to the end that they might have perfect intelligence and notice how all things went in Asia and the Ilands, they lent thither C. Claudius Nero, and M. Decimus in embassage: whom they conmanded also to visit Crete and Rhodes; and withall, both to renew the amity, and also spie and observe whether the hearts of those allies had been follicted and tempted by Carthage.

As the City was thus in doubfull suspense and expectation of the event of this new war, beheld in a tempest that rove in the night, a certain column or pillar, garnished and set out with the beak-heads of war ships (which had been created in the Capitol during the first punich war by M. Aemilius the Consul, who had for his companion in government Serg. Falcinus) washy a clap of thunder and lightning rent and cloven from the very base to the chapier. This was taken for a prodigious token, and report thereof was made to the Senate. The LL. gave order, that the Aruspices should be conferred with about it, and their advice taken: likewise they commanded the Decemviris to look into their books of Aibyla. The Decemvirs for their part declared, that the City should be purged and hallowed, publick supplications and prayers made to the gods, and greater battles killed for sacrifice, as well at Rome in the Capitol, as in Campan nea the promon-itory of Mnesus. Also that with all convenient speed, there should be plazes solemnly exhibited for ten days together, in the houses of most gracious Jupiter. All this was done with diligence accordingly: but the Aruspices forecasted, made answer out of their learning, that this prodigious L. pretended good and signified the advancement of their own territories: together with the decluning of their enemies: for that those beak heads which the storm overthrew, had been the spoils of ships won from the enemies. There hapned other occurrences besides to enforce the terousul religion & devotion of men: for reported it was, how at Saturnia within the town it rained blood during three days together. Item, at Calata an a sacrifice was held with three feet; and a bull together with five kine were Strucken stark dead with one thunderbolt and flash of lightning: last of all, at Ox-ium there was a thaw of very earth and nothing else. In regard of these wonders also, sacrifices were celebrated, supplications made, and one day kept holyday and all stop-windows shut.

Yet were not the Conuls departed into their provinces, because they neither would obey and condescend unto the Senate in proposing the matter as touching Pepil[ius at the council table]; and the LL. were as resolut for their parts to let no decrees paile, before that were done. The fright and heart-burning they bare against M. Pepil[ius], grew the more by occasion of his own letters, wherein he wrote and gave them to understand, that being Proconsul, he had on a second time sought with the Statellats in Liguria, and put ten thousand of them in the war, by reason of which hard courses and extravagancies of war, the other nations like wise of the Ligurians were entited into arms, At which news not only Pepil[ius was blamed behind his back of making war against all law and equity upon them that had yelded, and thereby provoking those who were before quiet, to go out, and put themselves in action of rebellion: but the Conuls also were check't to their faces in the Senate, because they let not forward to their charge and government. M. Martius Sermo and Quintus Marcius Scipio, two Tribunes of the Commons being the LL. of the Senate thus drawing all in a line, took heart unto them, and both menaced the Conuls to fine them, unless they made more haste unto their province; and also recited in the Senate a law which they had drawn and framed, and were upon the point to promulge, as touching the foraid Ligurians who had submitted. The tenor whereof ran in this form. That what person soever of Statellae had yelded himself and was not restored to liberty and freedom before the calends of Sextillii next ensuing, the Senate upon their oath should ordain some special commission to make in quisition by whose fault they were, and, ifoe one be in villanage and punish the party accordingly. Then by authority and appro-

A question in the Senate, Who, they would have it upon their inquiry according to the form of the said law, And the LL. ordained himself to be the inquisitor. Then at length and not for the Conuls put themselves in their way toward their province, and received the charge of the army from M. Poppilius. This Poppilius durst not yet return to Rome, for fear he should be called in question and put to his answer before that Pretor and supreme judge, who had required the advice of the Senat as touching that enquêt framed and drawn of purpose against him: knowing full well how the Senat was not well affected to him, and the people much more frivolously bent and set against him. But the Tribunes of the Commons thought they would prevent and meet with this fishling of his and abasing himself, by intimidation of another act and law, provided in that behalf, namely, that if he entered not into the City of Rome before the * Iles of November inclosed.

Duly following, it should be lawful for C. Licinius to proceed in judgment, and give sentence against him in his absence. This cord towed and haled him to Rome with a witness: and when he was returned and entred into the Senat, they were upon his top, and gave him such a welcome thither, as satisfied their displeasure and hard conceit of him. After he had been well baited and flenken among them, an act of Senat was entred in this wise, that to many of the Ligurians as had not been enemies, after the time that Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius were Conuls, those the Pretors, C. Licinius and Cn. Scribonius, should restore and establish in their former state of freedom, and that the Conuls C. Poppilius should let them out lands to occupy and possesse beyond the Po. By virtue of this arrest, many 200 were set free and enfranchised, who being transported over the river Po, had land assigned unto them accordingly. Now M. Poppilius upon the law Maria (promulged by the two Marii: Tribunes of the Com.) answered for himself judicially twice before C. Licinius. At the third time, the Pretor overcome with a respective grace and favore to the Cot. abuent; and the carnell prayers of the whole name and honie of the Poppili, adjourned the defendant to make appearance into the court upon the * Iles of March on which day the new magistrats were to enter into their offices: and this he did, because himself by that time should be a private person again & therefore not to sit upon the bench as judge to hear pleas and to determine. Thus the aforesaid act as touching the Ligurians, finely shifted and cunningly avoided, came to just nothing.

At that time the Carthaginian Embassadors were at Rome, with Guliffe, the son of Mafanius; between whom hard hold and much debating was in the Senat. The Carthaginians complained, that over and besides the lands (about which there had been sent commissions from D. Rome, before time, to view the place and to enquire into the cause) Mafanius within the last two years and by force and arms possesed himsself of more then three hundred and ten towns and cities within the Carthaginian dominion and territory, and an exa matter was it for him to do, who made reckoning of nothing, nor had regard of any person, whereas the Carthaginians were too tyed and obliged by their capitulations to the good-seeing, that they held their peace for, inhibited they were to bear arms without their own countrey. And albeit they knew assuredly, that they should war within their own confines, if they disserie the Numidians of those piece, yet feared they that one express article as touching the associators of the people of Rome. Howbeit, the Carthaginian could no longer endure this pride, cruelty, and avarice. Sent therefore they were unto the Senat as humble orators that it might please them to grant one of those three requestts: to win, that either they might debate with indifferent audience before them (being allies to both alike) as touching the right of the one and the other: or that they would permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by just and lawful arms, against unjust and ungodly force: or else finally (it partial favour swayed more with them then the truth of the cause) to let down at once what their pleasure was should be given away out of their own, to Mafanius. For they yet, would have some gage of their hand, and know what they gave; whereas be himself had no stay, nor would ever see to make an end; the unstable was his lust and appetite. But in case they might obain none of themle ves points, and that there could be found any fault or trepialts of theirs, commiteven since the peace granted unto them by Siprius then, that they rather then any other would chuse them. For rather they had to live in feruitude under the fegony of Romans with latery, then enjoy such a liberty as should be expost to the injuries of Mafanius. And better it were for them to perish and die once for all, then to live and languish under the yoke of a mortal ennem and bloody butcher. At which words the tears trickled down their cheeks, and down they fell at their feet. Lying thus prostrate upon the ground, as they moved pity and compassion to themselves, so they proceeded delightfull and clement against the King. Then thought good it was to demand of Guliffe, what he had to answer as touching those matters? Or else (if he had no rather himself) to declare before, for what cause and upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Guliffe made answer, that neither it was exis for him to deal in those points, whereof he had no committion from his father: nor for his father to give him any such charge, considering that the Carthaginians, flenwed not unto him of what business they would treat; nor yet made him so much as privy of their coming to Rome. This only was known, that there was a close council holden for certain nights, by the principal States of Carthage within the Temple of Æneas, from whence Embassadors were dispatchd to Rome with hidden messages. And this was the cause that his father had sent him to Rome, to deceav the Senat not to give credit to the flenderous accusations that should be preferred against him by those that were common enemies as well to them as him; who hated him for no other cause but... for that he had continued to constant in his fealty and allegiance to the people of Rome. Tho Sc. K not of having heard what they could say of both sides, Latin consuls as touching the demands of rethe Carthaginians: and at length commanded this answer to be returned, how their advice and pleasure was, that Gulsia should presently depart and go into Numidia, and give his father to understand from them, that with all speed he send his Embassadors to the Senat, as concerning the complaints which the Carthaginians had made of him: also to give intimation and knowledge unto the Carthaginians, that they repair like wise thither to debate their controversies & differences between them. And if it lay in their power to effect ought for the honor of Masanias, they would be as willing to do it hereafter, as they had been ready heretofore. Mary, to minister justice for favour and affection, that they would not do it in any wise. Willing they were, that every man should know and hold his own, and keep him within compasse; neither mix'd they to set out new limits, but to observe the old bounds. Indeed they had granted to the Carthaginians, after they were conquered, both towns to inhabit, and territories to possesse; not to this end; but in time of peace they should pluck that away by wrong and outrage, which during the wars they could not take from them by martial law and force of arms. Thus was the young prince, together with the Carthaginians, dismission. Princes were given both to the one and the other, according to the order, and other courtesies of hospitallity were friendly observed.

Much about the same time Cn. Servilus Capio, App. Claudius Centro, and T. Aemilius Lepsius, Embassadors sent into Macedonia, for to demand amends and restitution, and withall to declare and renounce the Kings amity, returned to Rome. Who having related in order what they had seen and heard, enlamed the Senat more against Perfcns, who were strays of themselves enkindled enough. They made report, That through all the cities of Macedonia they law prepation for war in all forcible manner; that when they came to the court, for many days they could find no means of access to the speech of the King; and in the end, after they were departed from thence homeward, as being past all hope of parley with him: then and not afore, they were called back again out of their way, and so brought unto their presence; that the sum of their embassage and speech unto him was this, namely, to put him in mind of the league first contracted with Philip. And afterwards renounced with himself, since the death of his father; wherein by express words he was inhibited to bear arms without his own frontiers, and likewise desired to levy war upon any confederate allies of the people of Rome: after this, that they had recounted and laid abroad from point to point those specialties, which they themselves had lately heard King Eumenes to declare and discourse, which were all apparent truths, upon his own afflicted knowledge. Moreover, that the King held a secret council for many dayes together, with the Embassadors of the Cities of Asia: in regard of which injuries, that the Senat thought it real and equity that he should make satisfaction, yea, and restore back both to them and also to their friends, whatsoever he held contrary to right, contained in the accord. That the King hereupon at the first fell into a fit of choler and indignation, and gave them hard terms, reproaching at every other word the Romans for their covetousnes and insolency. And as to their Embassadors that came unto him one after another, he said they were but spies, to listen and see what he did or said; & no marvel, for they thought it meet that he should conform and frame himself in all his words and deeds, according to their beck and commandment. At the last, when he had in this wise discharged his choler with high words & broad speeches for a long time, that he commanded them to repair again unto him the next morrow, for that he would give them their answer in writing; and then he delivered unto them a script to this effect as followeth. First, as touching the accord & covenant concluded with my father, that is nothing to me at all. If I offended, it was not for any liking or approbation thereof, but because lying new come to the crown, and lately possest of the Kingdom, I was to bear and endure all things whatsoever. But in case they will enter into a new league with me, requital is that contracts and agreement pass first of the conditions. And if they could be content that a covenant were drawn with equal and indifferent capitulations, yet I will flee upon it and be well advised what to do for the best, as I doubt not but they likewise will have a good regard to the profit of the Commonwealth. And here with, that he haddily flung away from them, and we all began to avoid out of the palace. Whereupon we proceeded according to our commissione to abandon and draw his amity and society. At which word of ours, he (as it were, in great wrath and fury, and with a loud and shrill voice, warned us upon our own peril and hazard, to be gone out of the marches of his realm within three dayes: finally, in this matter we departed and put our selves in our journey, and found neither friendly welcome at our first coming, nor any courteous entertainment while we were there, nor yet a kind fare well at our departure. When they had once done, the Theffalians and Etolians Embassadors had audience.

The Senat, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captains and commanders the commonwealth was to employ, thought good to write unto the Coit, that the one or other of them (who first might) should repair to Rome for the creation of new magistrates. And no great matter to speak of, as concerning the lettre, was that year done by the Coit. But more expedient it was thought for the commonwealths, to suppress and appease the Ligurians, whose blood was up and chafed again against them, considering that the Macedonian war was in daily expectation.

Moreover, the Embassadors of IJta gave occasion, that Gemini also King of Illyricum was had in jealouie; who at one time both complained of him, that now twice he had waited to their
A their country: and also made report, how the Macedonian and Illyrian Kings were all one, and so great together, that with once content and common counsel they prepared to war upon the Romans: finally that the Illyrians were now at Rome in shew and semblance of embassage, but indeed and very truth, no better then spies, adrested on purpose by the morose and advice of Perennis to hearken and learn whereabout they went at Rome. The Illyrians were sent for into the Senate house, and when they had said, that they were employed in embassage from King Gentius, to answer unto those accusations which it might be the Illyrians framed against him: it was again demanded of them, how it hapned that they went not directly nor showed themselves in their fort to the magistrates, that according to the manner and custom, they might have had their lodging provided and presents given them, with the ordinary allowance of the City, meet for them during their abode, that their knowledge might have been taken as well of their coming, as also of their businesse and errand? But being taken tripping and failing in their answer, they were commanded to void out of the Council chamber. For thought it was not meet, to give them their dispatch as Embassadors, since they made no means to present themselves into the Senate: but rather they were of advice, to dispatch Embassadors of their own to the King, to signify unto him, of which his associates had complained unto the Senate, how he had burnt their villages within their territories: yes, and to tell you it plainly, that it was not well done of him, that he could not forbear but do wrong to his own allies. In this embassage were sent, A. Terentius Varro, C. Petronius, and C. Cicero.

Likewise these Embassadors whose commission was visit the associat Kings, returned out of Asia, and reported that in the said Afa they had communication with Enemmus in Syria with Abutus, and in Aria with Polonatus: who all of them had been follow'd by underly embassadors of Perennis, howbeit they perfir'd firm and fall in their professed falsity, and promised to perform whatsoever the people of Rome would command them. Also that they went to the confederates, whom they found true and foil, and enough, excepting the Rhodians only, whom they perceived to be altering, and wavering, as altogether infected & poisoned with the counsel of Perennis.

Now were the Rhodian Embassadors come to answer these things which they knew were commonly bruited abroad touching their City: howbeit the Senate was not of mind to give them audience, before the new Consuls entered into their office. But they were all of advice to delay no longer the preparation for war. C. Licinius the Pretor had in charge, out of the old African provinces which were laid by the docks and harbours, to repairs any as might serve at sea; to dig also and prepare a fleet of 50 sail. But if he could not come to make up that full number, then to write unto his colleague C. Memmius in Sicily, for to repair, call and trim those ships which were in Sicily, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Brundisium. The said Pretor C. Licinius was commanded to enroll of Roman citizens and those, libertins, such as bondmen born, had been enchanced for mariners and slavers, as many as might serve 25 ships: and Cn. Licinius had commission to levy as many of Latine allies for the like number of ships: into the Pretor was enjoined to charge the Latine allies with 600 foot, and 400 horse. A. Antonius Serranus, who had been Pretor the year before, was chosen to receive these forces at Brundisium, and to conduct them over into Macedonia: and Cn. Scribonius the Pretor was appointed to have the army in readiness for so to be transported. As for C. Licinius the Pretor, he by authority from the Senate, wrote to C. Popilius the Consul that he should command the second legion, which had been longest employed in Liguria, and consisted of the most experienced soldiers, together with four thousand footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be ready at Brundisium upon the 1st Ides of February. With this fleet of ships and forces of soldiers; Cn. Scribonius was ordered to keep Macedonia, until one were appointed to succeed him: and for this purpose his charge of command was continued for a year longer. All these directions of the Senate were put in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eighty and forty Quinqueremes were sent off out of their docks: and L. Peraeus Licinius was ordained to conduct them to Brundisium: the other 13 were sent out of Sicily. Three Embassadors were dispatched into Apulia and Cataniiya to wit, Sex. Digidinius, T. Iunctinius and L. Consilius, for to buy corn to serve the fleet and the army.

Now when all things were provided and in readines, C. Scribonius the Pretor departed from the City in his warlike coat of arms, and arrived at Brundisium. About the end of the year, C. Popilius the Consul returned to Rome, somewhat later then the Senate had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and withall speed to create new magistrates, considering that to great a war approached to near. And therefore when the Consul concluded in the temple of Belus as touching his exploits in Liguria, the LL of the Senat were nothing well pleased to hear him: but in steadther, they muttered every where, and asked him oftentimes, Why he had not restored to liberty those Ligurians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his father? The election of the Consuls was helden upon the twelfth day before the Calends of March according to the act that went out: wherein were created Conulius, Pub. Licinius Graecus, and Cn. Consilius Longinus. The morrow following, the Pretors were elected, to wit, Cnus Salpianus Gaibal, L. Farma Phoelus, L. Camillus Divis, C. Luctintius Gallus, C. Cnanius Rufinus, and L. Villius Annalis. To these Pretors the provinces were alligned in this manner: that two of them should sit as LL chief justices in Rome for civil jurisdiction: three other to have the government of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia: for as the first only should remain not allotted to any places, for to be employed wherefore the Senat would think good and fit: that the Consuls elect were commanded by the Senate, upon the solemn day when they were to enter into their magifrasy, after they had sacrificed greater beasts, as it appertained, to pray in this form, that the gods would vouchsafe the war which the people of Rome intended now to enter well and come to happy issue. The same day the Senate decreed, that C. Poppus the Consul should set out plate for ten days together in the honor of Jun. Opt. Max. and the offerings should be made at all the shrines and altars, it to be commonwealth continued for ten years in the same good estate as now it stood. And as the Senate ordained, the Consul vowed into the Capitol, that the said plights should be exhibited, offerings were presented of as great value as it pleased them to set down. This vow was pronounced by the Consul in the presence of no fewer than 90 Senators, and according to that form of words which Lepidus, the high-priest or sovereign Bishop indited. That year died certain Prelates of State, to wit, L. Aemilius Pappus, one of the Decemvirs or superintendents over the holy rites, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Bishop, who the year before had been Censor. This man had a stillt. I forrived that news came upon him of his two sons, who then served in the wars of Hylcius, how the one was departed out of this life, and the other lay rich of a grieveous and dangerous malady. The sorrow for the one, and the fear for the other, hapning to fall at one time, brake his heart and oppressed his spirits; insomuch as the next morning, when his servants entered betimes into his bed-chamber, they found him hanged by a cord, and strangled. It was thought abroad, that he had never been his own man, since he was Censor, and commonly it was spoken, Spino Lucumia in wrathful displeasure against him for spoiling his temple, beset him of his right wits. In the room of Aemilius, M. Valerius Maffius was substituted Decemvirs; and in stead of Fulvius there was elected Archbishop, Cneus Domitius K Archardus, who to lay the truth was very young to be made a priest.

In the year wherein P. Licinius and C. Cassius were Censors, not only the City of Rome, and the whole land of Italy, but all the Princes and States of Europe & Asia, were mulled respectively upon the war between the Macedonians and Romans. Enemies (King of Asia) not only carried an old enmity with his against Philip, but also was prized forward with new delights and anges upon a tenth occasion, in that by the wicked practice of Persius, he had like to have been sacrificed at Delphi. Praetor, King of Bithynia, was resolved not to enter into arms, but attend the iseue of the war. For he thought it not reason and leemly for him to take arms in the defence of the Romans against his wives; and this account, made, that it Persius hrapp to have the ary, he might soon obtain pardon at his hands by the mediation of his sister, Aristaed King L of the Cappadocians, and besides that he had promised aid to the Romans in his own name, ever since that he had linked in affinity to Emmenius, drew the same way which he went, and joined with him in all his counsels both of war and peace. As for Antiochus (King of Syria) his teeth watered, verily at the Kingdom of Egypt, as he, who, when he did well the childhood of the young King in his nonsense, as the weakness and negligence of his guardians: and considering there was some controversy about the title of Calaernia, he suspected that he should have good occasion to levy war, to manage all and exploit the same without emperchment, while the Romans were busy in the Macedonian war; howbeit as well by his own Embassadors sent unto the Senat, as also unto their addressed unto him, he promised itoly to be for them. Ptolome-uis (The young King of Egypt, being no tender age, was at the disposition of others; his tutors and protectors, as they prepared to wage war against Antiochus for the recovery of Calaernia, so they promised the Romans would not to their devoir in the Macedonian war. M. Papirius (King of the Numidians) was altogether for the Romans; he furnished them with coin, and intende to his son M. Papirius with aids both of men and elephants in that service. Howbeit he the dis-popped of his designs, as might serve his turn which way ever the world went: for the victory to the Romans, he ordered that his affairs should remain still in the same state; and better he was not to look for, because the Romans would not suffer any violence to be offered unto the Curtarians; but in case the Romans went down and had the overthrow (who then protected the Curtarians) then he made full reckoning of Antiochus to be his own. Gentius (King of Hypsi-cum) had his demesne himself, that he was inspected of the Romans; yet he was not fully resolved which side to take unto, and it seemed he would joy to one or the other, more upon a fit as it took him in the head, than with any discretion or advice, C. Sergius Thracian, King of the dryfians, took part evidently with the Macedonians. In these terms (I lay) flood the KK. as touching this present war. As for the free Cities and States besides, the common people every where (As always lightly it is seen) inclined to the worse part, and ran with the KK. & the Macedonians: but the principal persons and men of quality, a man might perceive affected diversly. Some grew with the Romans all upon the head, insomuch as they greatly empeared their authority in excessive favour to them: few of them were induced by the just and upright government of the Romans, but the most part were carried away with the strong concourse, that the more they employed themselves for them, the greater men they should be at home in their own Cities. Another part there were of the Kings flattering favorites, who being deeply drenched in debt, and despair of bettering their fortune (at the present rate held till) abandoned and gave themselves over to entertain all changes and innovations. And some there were besides, possed with a vain honor of their own, because Persius seemed to have more favour of the common people. A third fort there were (and those of the belt and wifet of all other) who if it had lain in their hands to determine
they would have to be greater lord, wished to have been under the Romans rather than the King. Mary, if they might have had their liberty to be children simply of their fortune, by their good will they might not have had the one part, advanced by the deposition and subversion of the other, but that the forces and pipline of them both remaining entire and unsoiled, peace thereby might be entertained and so between them both, the state of the cities should continue in the bell, when as the one part might ever protect the weaker side from the injuries of the mightier. And those that had been thus, held them quiet and fair not a word but being fast themselves, beheld the behaviour and deportments of those that were the partakers and lovers of either side.

The Consuls that day wherein they entered their government, when they sacrificed (according to the ordinance of the Senate) with greater bequests in all the temples and chapels, wherein (for a molt part of the year) the sacred beds and couches for the gods were prepared; and thereby had prescribed by good tokens, that their prayers were acceptable to the immortal gods, made report unto the Senate, That their sacrifices were as they ought to be, as also their prayers, which they conceived as touching the war. The Bowell-prayers likewise by their learning declared, that if they went about any new enterprise, they should make speed; for why? All did prognosticate victory, triumph, and enlargement of their feigny. Whereupon the LL. of the Senate commanded the Consuls to propose to the people the first day of the general assembly of the Centuries in this manner: in the name of God, and to the welfare and happiness of the Commonwealth, whereas Puteius, the son of Philip K. of Macedon, (against the second and covenant concluded with his father first, and after his death renewed with him) hath levied war upon the allies of the people of Rome, welded their territories, feized their Cities, compelled to enter into arms against the people of Rome, and to C. that end hath provided armours, soldiers, and a fleet: unless be make satisfaction, preferable to you that war be enterprised and waged against him. This bill passed by all the suffrages of the people. There was then an act of the Senate like wise entered, that the Consuls should either agree together, or else call lots for the provinces of Italy and Macedon; and look where the lot fell to Macedon, he should perforce with fire and sword K. Perus; and all that sect and faction which took his part, unless he made satisfaction, preferable to you that war be enterprised and waged against him. This bill passed by all the suffrages of the people.

Also for the one of the Consuls in the army of the allies, the number was augmented, as besides those six hundred horsemen which Cn. Sestius had conducted already, he should of those allies transport over into Macedon, sixteen thousand footmen and eighty hundred horse. As for Italy, twelve thousand footmen of allies and six hundred horse were thought sufficient. Moreover this prerogative had the province of Macedon, that for Centurions and soldiers the Consul might enroll of the elder sort whom he thought good as many as were not above fifty years of age. In choosing of Tribunes military and colonels, the old manner was this year changed, in regard of the Macedonian war, to wit, that the Consuls (by advice and authority of the Senate) should move into the people, that the said Tribunes might not that year be elected by voices of the people, but that their elections should be referred to the judgment and determination of the Consuls and Pretors. The charge of command was thus divided among the Pretors as followeth, that Pretor whose lot fell to go whither it pleased the Senate to send, was assigned to take his journey to the fleet at Brundisium, and there to survey and revive the seas-lavours, and look how many he thought not meet for service, them to discharge; & to make up the number with chosen Libertines; and in any wise to order it so, that two thirds parts consisted of Roman natural citizens, and the other third of allies. Item, That provision of victuals for the navy and the army, should be brought out of Sicily and Sardinia. And the Pretors of those two provinces had in charge to exact a double tenth of the Sicilians and Sardinians, and this grain to be conveyed into, to Macedon for the army. Now Sicily fell to C. Caecilius Rubulus, Sardinia to L. Furius Philus, and Spain to C. Caecilius. C. Sulpicius Galba was L. chief justice for the citizens of Rome, and L. Iunius Annalis for the frangars; but C. Lucretius Callius his lot was to go where the Senate would employ him. Between the two Consuls there was some little wrangling, rather then any great debate about their province. Caesius for his part said, that he was by the right to war in Macedon without any calling of lots for the matter, for much as his colleague might not enter into lot with him, and save his oath. For he being Pretor, had sworn solemnly in a frequent assembly of the people (because he would shiff off and not go into his province) that he had occasion to celebrate sacrifices in a certain place and upon certain days, which could not be performed, as they ought, if he were at sea. And the same as I take it cannot be well done while his absence now, that he is Consul no more then whilsts he was Pretor. Howbeit, if the Senate be of opinion and judg, that more consideration is to be had to satisfie Caesius Licinius his will now in the Consulship, then regard of the oath be took before in the Pretorship, yet will I not withstanding accommodate my self to the pleasure of the Senate. The LL. were consulted with here about, who judging that it were a proud part to deny him the government of a province, unto whom the people of Rome had granted the dignity of a Consulship, commanded the Consuls to call lots. Then Macedon fell to P., Licinius, and Italy to C. Caesius. Then they put to lot, and so the conduct, and employment of the legions: whereby the first and third were to be transported into Macedonia, the second and fourth to remain in Italy. In the meantime a choice of soldiers, the Conful went more neatly and straitly to work by far, and customably they used at other times. As for Lucius, he enrolled the elder fortis, as well for soldiers as centurions; and my there were who voluntarily entered their names, because they saw how those flourished well and grew rich, who had served either in the former Macedonian war, against Antiochus in Asia. Now when as the martial Colonels called forth the centurions by name one after another, and the principal chief, there happened to be three and twenty centurions of them, who before time had been Prunipalates, had led in the chief and belt place, and when they were cited, they called unto the Trib of the Conul, for to be relieved by their lawfull allowance. But two of that fellowship and society of Tribunes, namely, M. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Fulvius Maccenas, referred them to the Conuls, alluding, that by right, the knowledge of these matters pertaining to those who had plenary commission to take matters, and to manage the war-affairs. But all the rest of the Tribunes avowed that they would refuse it in their own hands, and determine of that for which they were called unto as competent judges; yea, and if injurious were offered to their fellow-citizens, they would not fail but help and succour them. All this was debated in the Tribunes-court. Thither was M. Papilius, a Conul man, called to the hearing of this matter, and thither repaired the centurions and the Conul also. And when the Conul required that the case should be heard and decided in a general assembly, therefore the people was summoned to meet in publick together. In which solemn congregation M. Papilius, who had been Conul two years before, spake in behalf of the centurions to this effect. ‘These martial K.

A law, nor might plead exemption and immunity by mine age, yet being I am able to shew four foolders for one, my four sons [I say for my self alone] me thinks it were reason, O P. Lici-nius, that I were now freed and discharged. And all this I pray you take, as spoken for the behoof of my cause. Now as touching my person thus much, So long as any man who hath authority to enroll foolders, shall judge me sufficient and able to bear arms, I will not go about to excuse and thiirft it. And look what place the Colonels and Marshals shall suppose me worthy of, if, lyeth in his good will and pleasure to alligne me unto it: but to perform that no one person in the whole array form me in valor, that shall be my own indecotor; like as not only my captains, but those also who have served with me are able to tellsthe, That I ever had to carried my self and performed as much. And you likewise my fellow foolders, albeit you practic B and keep in use the privileges and benefit of appealing to the Tribunes, yet meet and reason it is, since in your youthfull days ye never did ought in any place against the authority of the Senat and the Conuls; ye now also in your declining age be at the disposition of the Senat and the Conuls; yes, and to esteem all places worshipfully, wherein you shall defend and maintain the Common weal: When that they had thus commended him, and from before the people brought him into the Senat. And there allowed by the advice and authority of the honorable house, thanked he was, and the Marshal-Colonels, in regard of his virtue, appointed him to be the principal Centurion of the Pilani in the first legion. So the rest of the Centurions recom-nending their appeal to the Tribunes, yielded obedience in the matter and ley above said.

To the end that the Magistrates and great commanders might go more timely into their governments, the Latin feasts and holydays were published to be holden upon the Calends of June: C Which solemnity being finished, C. Luctetius the Pretor took his journey to Brundisium, having sent before all necessary furniture and provision for the fleet. Besides, those armies which the Conuls levied, a commission was directed out to C. Sulpius Galla the Pretor, to enroll four legions of Roman citizens, with the ordinary full provision of infantry and cavalry, and to elect out of the body of the Senat four Colonels to command them. Also to levy Latin allies 10000 foot, and 1200 horse, and to take order that his army should be ready to go whitheroever the Sen-At the very same time thenceEmbassadors from King Persians. But suffer they were not to enter into the City; considering that both the Senat had ordained, and the people celted already to make war upon their king and the Macedonians. So admitted they were into the Temple of Bellona before the Senat, where they delivered their message in this manner: That King Persians marvelled why there were armies transported over into Macedonia? And if the Senat might be intreated to much, as to recall them home, the King would make satisfaction for the wrongs borne unto their allies, in such sort as the Senat in their discretion would appoint. Now there was in the Senat-houle at that time Sp. Carvillius, sent back for that very purpose out of Greece from E Cn. Sestinius. He made report and remonstrancethow Perrhbus was driven by arms, and certain Cities of Thessaly was with other exploitsthat King Persians had either performed, or else was in hand to enterprise, To which challenges the Embassadors were commanded to make answere. But after they were once to fall in their speech, saying they had no further commision then that they had delivered already; they were willing to retire unto the King their master. C. P. Licinius the Conul would shortly be in Macedonia with an army, unto whom the King might address his Embassadors, if he minded to do as he said and to make amends. As for lending any more to Romans, there was no need nor caule, forasmuch as they would not suffer any of them to pass through Italy, When they were dismasted with this short dispatch, C. Licinius the Conul had in charge, to F command them to go out of Italy within 11 days, and to send Sparsus Carvillius to guard them all the way to the sea-side until they were shipped. These occurrences passed in Rome before the Conuls were gone into their provinces.
Now by this time Cn. Sestinius (who ere that he left his magistracy, was sent before as far as to Brundisium to the fleet and army) having put over into Epirus 5cc00 foot and 300 horse, was encamped before Nymphaeum in the territory of the Apollonii, From thence he sent certain Colonels with 2000 foolders, to set the forts and cattles of the Dacifermes and Illyrians, by occasion that they of their own accord made means and lent for garrisons, to the end they might be better guarded selecte from the violence and invasion of the Macedonians bordering upon their

C colonies.

Some few days after, Q. Marcellus, A. Attius, P. and Ser. both Cornels and Lentils, together with L. Decimus, who all had been lent in embasse into Greece, brought them toCorcyra one thousand footmen: where they both parted between themselves their several quarters whither they would go, and also their foolders. Decimus was sent to Generus King of the Illyrians, with commandment, if he saw him any waies coming on and enclined to entertain mutiny with the Romans, to found him and give the assay, yea, and to draw him into the association of this war.
The two Luniulì were sent into Cophalina, from thence to traverse and cross over into Pelopheneus, and before winter to fetch about and compass the coast of the Welle-sea. Maruis, &c. &c. were assigned to visit Ephus, Eosia, and Thessalia. From thence they were enjoined to have an eye into Beatica and Emus and to sail into Pelopone examination where they appointed to meet with the Luniulì. But before that they departed from Corcyra, letters were brought from Persius, wherein he demanded what reason the Romans had either to transport any forces into Greece, or to fell upon the Cities? thought good it was to return him no answer by writing, but only by word of mouth, such as to say unto the messengers that brought the letters, That the Romans did it for the defence and safeguard of the isle towns. The Luniulì as they rode their circuit visiting the Cities and towns of Peloponeus, exhorting the States and commonalties thereof individually one as well as another, To aid the Romans in this present against Persius, with tellable courage and like fidelity as they had flown with them first in the war against Philip, and afterwards in that with Aulans; might here in their publick assemblies much muttering and grumbling thence. The Aulans (who from the very beginning of the Macedonian war had been altogether for the Romans, and during the war against Philip, enemies to the Macedonians), took it in disdain that they were repented in the same ranks with the Melissen and Eleans, and no better then they who had bulls arms against the people of Rome, or Aulans their enemies; and who but the other day, being enroiled into the commonality and counsell of the Aulans, complained that they were delivered into the victorious Aulans, as the recumenance and gurdian of their conquest. Martius and Aulius as they went up to Gitana a town of Ephus, ten miles from the sea, in a general Council held there of all the priests, had audience with great contentment of them all. Four hundred of their young and able lusty men they sent into the Oriental country to lie in garrison for defence of those Macedonians who by them were set at liberty. From thence they held on their progress into Aesopia; and after they had to joined there some few days (whiles a new Pretor was elected in the room of him that was deceased, and Lysias appointed the governor, a man known for certain to favour the Romans) they passed over into Thessaly. Thither repaired the Embassadors of the Aesopians and the banished pertons of Aesopia. The Aesopians were enjoyed to utter and declare before them what they had committed and done again the people of Rome, being invigiled and deceived by the promises of the two Kings Philip and Aulans during the wars against the one and the other; since occasion was now preferred unto them, for to make amends and save all that was amiss. For if upon their ill dements towards the people of Rome they had made trial and salted of their clemency, they might now by good deports prove their boundes another while. As for the Aesopians, they were reproved and upbraided for entering into association with Persius; and when they seemed to lay the whole fault upon Lysias a captain of one of the two factions, and certain Cities and States which being of a different opinion were drawn to the side; Say ye so? (quoth Maruis again) and that shall soon appear; for we all permit every commonality and City to answer apart and severally for themselves the bell they can.

Now was the Diet of the Thessalians held at Laphira, where, as the Thessalians took good occasion and found ample matter of thanksgiving the Romans, for the liberty which by their good owen they had obtained: so as the Roman legates had as copious an argument to render them thanks, for that first in the war with Philip, and afterwards with Aulans, they had been so mightily aided by the Thessalian nation. Thus by this mutual rehearsefull of pleasures and good turns, given and taken, the hearts of the multitude were enkindled with a fervent zeal to decree and ordain whatsoever it pleased the Romans to desire. After this council was dissolved, there came Embassadors from Laphira unto Maruis, upon a speciall alliance of the privat friendship and hospitality which had passed between his father King Philip, and the said Maruis [and his father.]. These Embassadors began the speech with a commemoration of the said familiar and inward acquaintance,requenting him to permit the K. for to have access unto him, and to commin together. Maruis answered, that he also had heard his father speak of the amity and mutual hospitality between him and K. Philip: in regard and remembrance of which near bond of familliar he was the more willing to take upon him the charge of that embassage and commission. As to the parly, he would not have deferred it all, if he might commodiously have wrought it: and now for this present he promised (so soon as he possibly could) to fend his couriers before to advertise the King, that they might come to the river Peneus, whereas the passage lieth from Oea molon over to Dum. And verily at that time, Persius was retired from Dium into the inland quarters of his resilion, and had gathered some pretty gale of hopes, in that Maruis had given out, how for love of him he had undertaken this embassacie, after none few desists they repaired to the place appointed, This King accompanied with a great train as well of his friends, as his courtiers and pensioners which guarded his person. The legates indeed were attended upon with no lesser a troop, by reason as well of many that followed them from Laphira, as also of divers embasages from the States which assembled at Laphira, and were desirous to carry home with them certain news of the iecial, which they should hear. Every man had an inward desire fettled in his heart to see the manner of the meeting of this noble K. & the high commissioners from the sovereign state and mightiell people of the whole world. Being come to the interview one of another,they stood still on either side of the river, which only parted them slander. For a while there passed entertainments between; whereas they made it strange on both parties, who should pass the river first, for the Macedonians stood somewhat upon the tosill majesty of a King; & the Romans were as respective

The right of the Euphrates, according to the treaty, was to be handed over to the Romans, and the line of the Tigris was to be the boundary between the two empires. In return for this, the Romans promised to leave the province of Armenia to the Parthians, and to pay a yearly tribute of 50,000 drachmas. The treaty was ratified by a solemn exchange of gifts, and the ambassadors of both parties agreed to return to their respective capitals to proclaim the conclusion of peace. The treaty was signed on the 12th of March, 49 B.C., and the Romans were satisfied with the arrangement, as it removed the threat of war and secured the safety of the empire. The Parthians were also content, as it provided for their independence and ensured their security. The treaty was a great victory for Rome, as it firmly established its position as the dominant power in the East.

The two and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

To see again hereafter, I must (forsooth) give account for the Thebans, who as it is well known, perished by shipwreck: as also for the murder of Artanus; and yet therein I am no deeper charged than thus, that the murderers of him lived in exile & were shadowed within my realm.

Now surely this hard conclusion and unreasonable condition I will not refuse to undergo, in case you also will be content to take upon you and avow all those crimes and faults, for which they stand condemned, who as banished persons have fled either to Rome or into Italy: but since both you and all other nations will disavow that, I also will be one amongst the rest. And in good faith, to speak uprightly, to what end should any man be banished from one country, if he may not find a place in another, and be permitted there to live in exile? And yet (so soon as ever I found by advertisement from you that they were within Macedonia) I for my part made diligent search until I had them, and then I commanded them to depart out of my kingdom, yea and ex- preiely forbade them for ever setting foot again within my dominions. And thus much verily concerning the criminal matters objected unto me as a defendant pleading at the bar. Now let us argue and debate the reit, enforced and laid against me in quality of a King, namely, which concern and touch the accord contracted between me and you. For if the words ran in this fort and are thus written in the foresaid covenants of accord, That I may not be (ferved to defend my felt and my realm, no, not if any enemy of mine levy war against me; then I must confess indeed, that the league I have broken, in that I stood upon my garrison and defendence by force of arms against Amphipolis, an affiliate of the people of Rome. But if it were lawfull for me to do by warrant of the accord and allowed also by the law of nations, by force to repel force; what should I do next, what could I else have done I pray you? When Amphipolis had laid waste to the frontiers of my kingdom even as far as to Amphipolis, led into captivity many persons free-born, carried away a mighty number of slaves, and driven before him many thousand head of cattell; should I have taken still and suffered him until he had come armed to Pella even unto my royal palace? But some man may haply say, You did well indeed and justly, in making head and putting him by force of arms, mary, vanquished he should not have been neither ought he to have suffered those calamities which follow men vanquished. Why if I had endured the fortune thereof, provoked as I was to war, how can he justly complain of tasting the like, being himself the cause and stil motive of all? I will not tie the same manner of defence (O Romans) to this, that by force of arms I have repelled the Dolopians: for if I have not done by them according to their demerits, yet I am sure I have dealt by the verity of the right I have over them being as they are of mine own kingdom, under my obedience, and made subjects to my father even by a decree of my own drawing. And yet were I to render a reason of my proceedings against them, I say, not unto you nor unto my allies, but even to those who like not of any cruel command so much as over bondslaves: can I be thought to have exercised more rigor against them, than equity and reason would bear? For, Euphrana, whom I deputed governor over them, they killed in such fort, that death is too good for them, and the leal punishment of all others that they have defiled. And as I marched forward in my projects from thence to visit the Cities of Larissis, Antson & Pilion; I ascended up to Dolphi there for to facrifice: to the end that I might discharge my conscience & pay those vows which I had of long time owed. Now to aggravate matter in this also against me, it is laid moreover, that I was there with my army, and intended (no doubt) for to feir Cities into my hands, and put garrisons into fortresses; for which at this present I complain of you. Call the States and Cities of Greece together to a general assembly; through which I passed. Let any one man come forth & make complaint of the least harm done by any of my followers; then will I not refuse to be reputed for one who under pretense of divine facrifice, went about another thing. We went indeed garrisons to the Eotolians and Bizen tinesyea, and with the Boctians we contracted amity. But these things, in what fort & to what purpose they were done, my embassadors have not only declared, but also excuted oftentimes before your Senate; where I found some Umpires to hear and decide my cause, although not so indifferent and favourable to me, as your fell are, O Martius, my fathers old friend and familiar. For as yet Eumnea, my accuser was not come to Rome, who by false suggestions, writing at his picture every thing to the world, to make all fulplious and odious unto you about to make you believe that Greece could not possibly be restored to freedom, & enjoy the fruit of your gracious benefit, so long as the kingdom of Macedonia flood entire and upright. Well, the world you shall see, will turn about; and anon one or other will be here, to make remonstrance and prove, That to no purpose Antiochus is removed and confined beyond the mountains of Taurus, that Eumnea is become much more grievous and unspottable to all Asia than Antiochus ever was: and that your allies cannot be at rest nor live in quiet, so long as he keepeth his royal court in Pergamus, a City as it were overlookind and commanding all the north Cities bordering thereupon. Right well I know, O Q Martius, and you, Attilius, that whatsoever either you have objected against me, or I answered for my defence & purgation, is fin as the ears and actions are of the hearers: neither what I have done, nor what mind and intention I have carried in mine actions will be so much regarded, as how you take every thing either done or intended, Mine own conscience beareth me witness, that willing I have not failed; now if for want of knowledge and foresight I have been overseen and done somewhat amiss it may be corrected and amended by this present chaffiment. This I am sure, my trepsals is not incurable, neither have I committed ought that you should deem worthy to be punished, by A "by war & force of arms. And if ye do, then surely it is for nought, that there goeth this name a broad throughout all nations of your dexterity and gravity both, if you forsake flight occasions which hardly are worth the complaint and the reasoning, you be ready to enter into arms of and levy war upon your confederat Princes. Martius for that time accorded to his speech, and moved him to address embassadors to Rome being of advice and opinion himself to try all means to the very last point, and to let slip nothing whereas some hope of good might arise. It remained only to be debated in council, how embassadors might pass in safety. And to this purpose, when it was necessary for the K.K to requite a turcise of arms, albeit Martius himself was willing and de-demanded thereof for that his drift was to nothing else by all this conference and parley yet he seemed to make a hard matter and difficulty of it, and to do a special favour and pleasure unto Perseus B granting his petition. The truth was, the Romans yet were not ready nor thoroughly appointed at this present to the war; they had neither army puissant enough, nor captains sufficient, whereas as Perseus (but that he was blinded in all his councils with a vain hope of peace) had all things prepared and in readiness, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the bell and most opportunity for himself, to the worst and unprofit of all other times for his enemies.

After this parley and the abilities of war assured faithfully on both parts, the Roman Commissaries were appointed and resolved to go into Boeotia, where there was begun already some trouble and commotion, by reason that certain States of the Boeotians were departed from the society of the common Council, even since it was reported back, how the Roman Legats made answer that it should appear and be seen, what Cities they were indeed which took a pleasur C to have any association with the King. And first the embassadors from Ithrnes after war from Thebes encountered them upon the way, who assured them that they were not present in that Dier and Council, where this association was concluded. To these embassadors no answer for this time was made but willed they were only to give their attendance and follow them to Chalcis.

At Thebes great variance there was, which arose by occasion of another (tale and debate, in their Iolmam assembly for the election of the Pretor of the Boeotians that part which had the repulse, in revenge of that injury and dilgrace, assembled the multitude and made a decree at 1 Jars, That the Boeotarches should not be received within their Cities: in which sort, as like banished men they retired to Phocis from whence (for received there they were incontinent without any stay) being called again to Thebes upon better adviement and change of mind, they made D an ordnance. That it to the number of twelve privar perions held any conventicle or publike meeting together, they should be condemned to exile. After this, Iphoces the new Pretor a noble personage and of great puissance, by virtue of a decree adjudged them in their abinance or to lose their lives. To Chalcis they were fled, and from thence to the Romans at Lavra they went: where they declared that Iphoces was the cause of their association with King Perseus. Upon that fore said difference, they grew to hot contention, yet embassadors from both parts came to the Romans, as well the banished persons and accusers of Iphoces, as also Iphoces himself. But to soon as the Roman Legats were come to Chalcis, the States and heads of other Cities (who every one by a special decree of their own had renounced association with King Perseus ) joined with the Romans: whereas they took exceeding great contentment and joy. Iphoces thought it meet and reason that the Boeotian nation should be protected to the protection of the Romans. Whereupon arose a tumultuous fray, but that he fled into the Tribunall of the Legats to favour himself, he had escaped narrowly from being killed by the said exiled perions, with the help of their supports and favorites.

Also the City of Thebes which is the capital place of State within Boeotia, was in great trouble and uprario; whiles some drew to the K.K others enclined to the Romans. Besides, there was a multitude of Corinthians and Hallians gathered together to maintain the ordinance and deeree as contacting the association with the K. But such was the resort of perillance of the principall and chiefmen, who shoowed by the late calamities of Philip and Antocrus, how great the forces, and how happy the fortune was of the Roman empire, that the same multitude deserted, and being overruled, passed a new decree, to reverse and cancel the former confederacy with the King: sent those that were the motives and periards of contrivando that amity to Ch. Lit for to satisfi and content the Roman Legats; yes & so conclude were of advice to recommend the City to the faithfull patronage of the said Commissioners, Martius & Atticus took great pleasure to hear the Thebans sing this note they perswaded with them severally apart, and gave them counsell to send embassadors to Rome for the renewing of this amity; but before all things they took order for the reforining of the banished persons: as for the authors of the confederacy contrived with the K. they by their own decree condemned. Having thus by this means infringed and made fruitar the Diet of the Boeotians ( the thing which above all they most desired ) they took their journey to Peloponnesus, together with Ser. Cornelius, whom they had sent for to Chalcis, for their takes a Commissal was holden at Argos, where they demanded nothing elle of the Achman nation but only to furnish them with 1000 soldiers. This garrison was sent to the defence of Chalcis, until the Roman army were transported into Greece. Martius and Atticus having thus discharged all the affairs that they had to do in Greece in the beginning of winter returned to Rome.

Then was there sent from thence about the same time an honourable embassade to the Isles in Asia. These Embassadors or Legats were three in number, to wit, T.Claudius, P. Pithiumus and
M. Fannius, They in their circuit and visitation exhorted all their allies to take arms against Perseus, for the Romans. And the mightier and more wealthy any City was, the more earnestly travelled H they there; because the interior States were like to, frame and fort themselves suitable to the example and authority of the greater and superior. Now of all others the Rhodians were reputed of most import and consequence every way, for that they were able not only to favor with their countenance, but also aid and maintain with their forces this war: and by the perfusion of Her- gisius they had got together a fleet of forty sail, "This Her-gisius their soverain Magistrate W (whom they call Prytanis) had by many reasons prevail'd with the Rhodians to abandon the K hope they had by entertaining these KK, (which they had found by often experience how vain I it was) and to hold themselves to the sovietry and alliance of the Romans, the surest hold of all R others at that time in the world, as well for strength of forces as truthy assurance and fidelity, T There is intended war by them (and he) against Persia; and no doubt the Romans will require F of us the same provision and furnishing of ships and sea-forces, which they have seen in their war lately against Antiochus, and before that, against King Philip: and then you will be to seek, and F forced in great haste to provide a fleet, when it were more time it should be let out and sent G forth, unless ye begin betimes to repair and rig your ships, unless I say you in hand to furnish T the same with makers and mariners; and with so much more endears our course ye thus to do, H that by your deed and effectual employment, you may refute and disprove the false imputations J where with Emmerick hath charged you, by their remonstrances induced they were inflamed as K at the arrival of the Roman Legars aforesaid, they were able to fly unto them an armado of 40 L ships ready rigged and well appointed, that they might know and see, they looked not to be M exhorted thenceunto. And this embassage was of great moment and importance also to gain the N hearts of the States in Asia. Only Dicrinius returned to Rome without any effect of his errand O and commission, nay, he ran into an ill name and obloquy, upon insinuation that he had received P certain bribes of the Princes in Thrace.

Per'sent upon the conference and communication had with him Macedon and sent his Embassadors to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with M. Masset: to other Embassadors also of his he gave his letters to carry to Byzantium and Rhodes: T the tenor of which letters was one and the same directed to them all: namely, That he had commu- c* nicated with the Roman Legars, but he had so placed and couched as well what he heard as what he spake, that it might seem he gave not one foot unto them but gained the better hand in that dispute & debating with them. These Embassadors added moreover, and said unto the Rhodians, L That they hoped assuredly there would be a peace, for that by the motion and advice of M Masset and Attalus were addressed embassial to Rome. Now if the Romans, say they, against N the covenants of accord proceeded to levy war, then the Rhodians were to endeavour with all M the credit and power they have, to unite the peace again but if with all their prayer and en- treaty they might not prevail, then they were to look about and labour this one point, That the O might and puissance of the whole world were not devolved into the hands of that one people. P And as this importation and concerned all the rest, to the Rhodians especially, who furnished Q other States in dignity and wealth, both which should be obnoxious and enthrall'd, if there R were regard and respect made of none but the Romans. The letters of the King and words of the Embassadors, were entertained with friendly audience, other effect they took none to change their settled minds: for now the authority of the better part began also to carry the greater sway, T but this answer was returned to them, & that by way of decree, That the Rhodians with'd peace W with all their heart: but if it should come to war, their King and Matter was neither to expect, X nor to exact anything at their hands, to disjoin the ancient amity which they held with the Romans, and which they had acquist by many and great deceits, as well in war as in peace. In their return C from Rhodes, they went to the Cities of Boeotia, and namely, to Thebes, Corona, and Habarim, N from whom it seemed a thing exerted forcibly against their will, that they were disfran- M banded from the King & clave to the Romans. The Thebans stood firm and immovable, although O they were somewhat discontented with the Romans, both for condemning their chief and prin- cipal Citizens, and also for rewarding the beneficed persons. But the Corinthians and Hilaritians N upon unbridled and feted lyeot of by kind in the Kings, lent Embassadors into Macedonia, re- soliciting a garrion for their defence against the exellent pride of the Thebans. To this embassage O the King thus answered. That a garrion he might not send, by reason of the truce made with the Romans; howbeit he advertised them to maintain and guard themselves against the injuries of the Thebans all that ever they could: but yet so, as they gave the Romans no cause to be their heavy friends, and so to proceed in rigour against them.

Masset and Attalus being come to Rome, made report of their embassie within the Capitol, M in such manner, as in nothing they gloried more, than in deluding and deceiving the K, by means of a sedition from arms, and a pretended hope of peace. For to well appointed was he and fur- nished with all provision for war, and they contrariwise so unprovided every way, that he might G easily have pleased himself of the whole O of places of opportunity and advantage, before that their army could pass over into Greece. But now having this repit and time of the truth, as the King would come nothing better prepared, so the Romans might begin the war, more fully furnished with all things convenient. Moreover, they related how they they by their coming disaffected the L general Council of the Boeotians, so as by no means any more hereafter they can be rejoyned to the Macedonians by consent and accord. The greater part of the Senate approved this service of theirs
A theirs as performed with singular discretion and dexterity: But the old Senators and those that held in remembrance the ancient manner and cultume of the Romans, said plainly, *that is all the course of that embassage they could lead Roman practice and dealing at all. Our ancients (by they were wont to war not by walt-laying and secret ambuscades, nor by skirmishes in the night, being nor yet by false semblant of running away and sudden turning their face again at unwares upon their unprovided enemies; neither sought they to glorifie themselves by subtile flights more than by true and valourable. Their use and manner was, to intimate and publish wars before they made any: yet, and to denounce and proclaim the same; otherwheres also to align and appoint the very place where they went to strike a battell, According to this plain and faithfull dealing, they detected and discouered unto K. Perusius, the Philosopher that would by pow

B son have taken away his life: by the same they delivered bound unto the Fallicians the villainous traitor that would have betrayed the children of their K. These are the Roman fallicians: (lay they) just to use the cunning calls and file shifts of the Carthaginians, nor the crafty policies of Cretians, who ever repented it more glorious and honourable by fraud to compass than by force to surprize the enemy. Indeed otherwheres for the present time, more good is done and greater matters are effected by guile and policy, than by valour and verse: but to lay a truth the courage of that enemy is for ever conquered, who is forced to confess, that he was vanquished not by cunning but by virtue, but in just and lawfull war by main strength and close fight at handy grips. Thus spake the ancients, who had no great liking to the new-founded device of these politicians, Howbeit, that side of the Senat which made more reckoning of profit than of honesty, carried it away and imposed so much, that not only the first embasie of Martius was approved, as well performed, but also himself was sent back again with certain Quinqueremes, with a mandate also & commissio to deal in the reft according as he should think to stand with the good of the Common-weal. They dispatched likewise An, Attius to lea Laevia in Thessaly: for fear left if the term of truce were expired, Perseus should send a garrison thither and hold in hand the capitall City of Thessaly. The said Attius had a warrant to receive 2000 footmen of C. Sicinius for to effectuate that enterprise, As so P. Lentulus latterly returned out of Achaia was allowed the conduct of 500 fouldiers of the Italian nation, to the end that at Thess he should endeavour to bring all Bithynia under the obedience of the Romans. When all things were set in this forwardnes, albeit they were at a point and fully resolved to make war, yet thought good it was to give audience unto the embassadors of Perseus in the Senat: who rehersed and related in manner the same reasons which were delivered by the King in the late conference and parley. Much ado they made and laboured hard, to acqaint the King of the imputation laid to his charge, for seeking the death of Eumenes; but with small probability or none at all: for the thing was too apparant. In the end they fell to prayer and intreaty: howbeit, no ear was given unto them, with any fuch mind and heart, as could be either instructed or inclined. Instead thereof, warned straitly they were to depart immediately forth of the liberties of Rome, and within thirty daies out of Italy.

C After this, P. Licinius the Co#: who was charged with the Province of Spains, had commandment given him to affign unto the army the foonest day that he could, for to meet in one certain place, C. Lucretius the Praetor who had the conduct of the fleet, took his leave of the City with forty

D Quinqueremes: for advised it was, that the reft of the ships which had been repaired, shou'd be staid at home for to be employed otherwise about the City, And the Praetor sent his brother Lucretius before with one Galeace or Quinquereme & commissio to receive of the allies that shipping which by covenant they were to find: and with them near the Island Cephalenia, to joyne with the reft of the armado with, from the Rhegiens one trig协 by, from the Locrians twain, from the Units 4. With which he coaled along Italy, and having doubled the utmost point of Colubria within the Ionian seas, he arrived at Dyrhachium: There he found 19 garrisons or galls of the Dyrhachians, 12 of the Locrians, and 4 belonging to K Cossians: which he took all with him along, making semblance that he suppos'd they were provided of purpolute for the service of the Romans: with this fleet by the third day he fell with the Ille Corbus: and so forward he made fail

E and arrived at Cephalenia, C. Lucretius the Praetor, having looed to lea from Naples, crossed the straights of Sicily, and on the fiftieth day cut over likewise to Cephalenia. Then the fleet frack anchor extending as well the arrival of the land-forces, as alfo that the bulks and vessels of carriage which were flattered upon the seas from the reft of their company, might overtake them.

It hapned about this time that Pub. Licinius the Co#: having conceiv'd and solemnly made his vows within the Capitol, departed in his coat of arms from the City. A solemnity at all times velely this is, done with much dignity and majesty; but especialy with exceeding great plesure and consentment of the beholders; when the Co#: is accompanied with as lately trained at his first setting forth, to encounter some great and famous enemy, renowned as well for virtue as quality and fortune; for at such a time men assemble and gather together, not only in regard of duty to acquit themselves of their devoir, but also upon a desire they have of the very thew and sight pretended unto their eyes; namely, to see their captain to whose conduct and counsell they have committed the managing and defence of the Common-weal. Moreover, they took occasion thereby to think of the hazard of war, how adventurous is the event, and how doubtfull the issue of battell in the field. They call to mind the adventurous course of good fortune and bad; and namely, how by the blind ignorance or the unadvised rashnes of leaders, many toils and overthrowes have hapned; and contrariwise by politick wisdom and hardy courage, great matters have been effected; and happy victories achieved. And what mortall man is he that knoweth of what mind and carriage good or bad, how fortunate or unlucky the Cois, whom they send forth to war: whether he be like to be seen again, in triumphal wite with his victorious army mounting up the Capitol unto those gods, of whom now he taketh his leave: or shall give occasion to the enemies in the same manner to rejoice? As for Perseus the K, (against whom this expedition and journey is taken) his Prince is, highly renowned both by the Macedonian nation (to famous for feats of arms,) and by his father Philip who among other fortunat achievements of his, was ennobled by his war against the Romans; Moreover, the very name of Perseus himself (since time that first the diadem was set upon his head) was in every man's mouth, and no talk continually but of him and the expectation of this war. With thee is such as contignations (I say) a mighty number of men of all sorts and degrees attended and accompanied the Cois, at his departure. With him were two Colonels or knight-marshals above the rest, who had been Cois, namely, C.Claudius and Q.Antius: also three brave and lusty young gallants, to wit, P.Lecanum and the two Mutilus, both named AEceides, the one to "M.Madame" and the other to L.Madame. The Cois thus accompanied, first went to Brundisium to the army, and from thence paffeled to the seas of Nympheas, and encamped in the territory of Apollonia.

Perseus some few daies before, upon the return of his embassadors from Rome, who had clean put him out of all hope of peace, held a council: wherein for a good while the matter was debated with great variety ofunday opinions. Some were of mind, that in case the Romans enjoyed them either to yield a tribute, or to enforce some of their lands; yea, if they imploied upon them some price by way of amends and satisfaction: in brief, whatsoever else they set down and ordered to do and suffer all for to redeem their peace, and not to refuse any condition were it never so hard but to take heed and provide in any wise, that Perseus put not himself nor the realm upon the dangerous hazard of so great a jeopardy. For if he held still the main point and continued in quiet possession of his kingdom, in time and space much good might happen; by means whereof he should be able not only to look himself whole and recover his losses, but also become hereafter dread and terrible even unto those of whom now he flanched in far, but the fargest part carried with them a more courageous spirit and gave advice accordingly. For they shewed, That if Perseus parted with ought and yielded never so little, he must make account withall to quit the free-hold of his whole kingdom in so after, for it is neither money nor land (say they) that the Romans want; but this they want full, That as all things else in the world, so especially great monstichies & empires are subject to many accidents and casualties: right well they know also, how they have quelled and bruised the pride and insolence of the Carthaginians, and for to yeak their necks and hold them down, have set up a mighty King to be their neighbour and to command them; yea, and that Antiochus and all his race is removed and chased beyond the mountain TAURUS. There remaineth only now the realm of Macedony, which is both feared in a near region and also (if the fortune of the people of Rome should hap to fail) fethmeth able to give heart and courage to her kings at this day, answerable to that of their noble progenitors in former times. And therefore whiles the State fanned entire and unfoiled, Perseus ought to resolve, whether he had rather by forgoing one thing after another, strip himself in the end of all his goods and lands, & so turned clean out of his kingdom, be driven to request at the Romans and either Samos or some other such petty life, where, in quality of a privit person he may live in his royal estate and live to old age in bale contempt and needy poverty: or else, to take arms in the defence and maintenance of his roayl peace and dignity, as a Prince of valour and courage; and either abide all hazards whatsoever the fortune of the field shall plange him into; or after victory achieved deliver the whole world from the dominion and imperious happier, and to the honour of M. \text{ Milan}, armed AEceides, he departed accompanied with a number of his couriers-penitentiers, and some of the guard to Citium, a town of Macedonia, Himself in person, where he had perform'd a significant sacrifice (like a K. of 100 head of beasts to the honour of \text{ Milan}, namely AEceides, he departed accompanied with a number of his couriers-penitentiers, and some of the guard to Citium. To which place were gathered already all his forces, as well Macedonians as auxiliary strangers. He pitched his camp before the town and embattled all his armed men in the plain. He was as full forty thousand strong; whereof one half well-near consist of those whom they call Phalangites, and those were commanded by one \text{ Phalanges of Bervelas}. Besides, there were two choice companies (for the flower of age and strength of body)electced out of the whole number of targetiers, called \text{ Citri}, this regiment, them-

A themselves called by the name of The legion; and the same was under the conduct of Lomites and Thrasippus both Ephefians. The left of the targets, to the number of three thousand of the near, were led by Apollonius of Edessa. The partizans, those also of Ptolemaeus and Peritomena, (places subject to the Thracian,) and the Agrians, together with some inhabitants of Thracia, intermingled among them, amounted also to the number of three thousand. Didus of Pessia had led and armed them; even the man that murdered young Demetrius. There were besides two thousand Frenchmen in arms under the leading of captain Aftelopodorus. From Heraclea, down out of the Sintian country, there were three thousand Thracians, free-men born, under a leader of their own. The like number well near of Cretans followed their Commanders, Sosias of Phalara, and Syrus of Grapoli; all Lacedemonians had the charge of five hundred horse, but a smaller company they were of divers nations. This Lacedemonian was said to have been the blood royal, a bannish person, condemned in a frequent assembly and Council of the Achaeans, for certain letters which he sent to Persus, and were intercepted. The Eotians and Boeotians, who in all made not above five hundred, were conducted by Lysias an Achaeus. Their auxiliaries or aid-foudiers of so many states and nations mixed and blended together, were first upon the number of 20,000 armed men. As for the Cavalry, he had levied out of all Macedonians 5000 horse or thereabout. Coryb King of the Odyrians, the son of Semeles, was thither come with 1000 chosen men of arms and almost as many foemen. In him the whole army arose to the number of 30,000 horse and 5000 horemen. And this was held for certain, that the like army was never raised by any King of Macedon, unless it were that again, with which Alexander the Great passed over into Asia. In twenty years now arms were come and gone, since time that peace was granted unto Philip at his own suit and request: during which space between, Macedonians being left and quietened, had brought forth a goodly fry of youths, a great part whereof were of the Thracian age to bear arms; and by the continual skirmishes which they maintained with the Thracians, their neighbours, were rather whetted than weakened and more enter'd than ever they were before, and, in one word, lived ever in practice of martial feats; whereby it came to pass, that all things were prov'd and tried in readiness for the war, which Philip left, and Persus afterwards projected to wage against the Romans.

This army fitted and advanced, little, but no matter of a full march as to a present battle, but only for this that they would not be leasen to have flood still in their arms: and thus armed as the fouldiers were, Persus called them to an audience, intending to make an Oration unto them. Being mounted up to his Tribunall, he stood there with two soldiers about him, one of every hand, whereof the elder (named Philip) he adopted to be his child, whereas indeed by nature he was his brother, but the younger (whom they called Alexander) was his own natural son. Then and there he exhorted his fouldiers to fight manfully and laid before them what wrongs and injuries the people of Rome had done both to his father and also to himself. As for my father (said he) forced he was by all kind of indignities to enter into arms and begin war again; but the very preparation thereof, was suddenly surpris'd and strikken with death. To my father's time were embassadors from them sent to treat of peace, and armed fouldiers also for to seize upon the Cities of Greece. Afterwards by a deceitful show of a parley under colours of reconciliation, peace making we were born in hand and drawn out a whole winter to the end that they might gain time to prepare for war. And now is the Cof coming with two Roman legions, having either of them some 3000 horse besides, and with a proportionable number (and that is the most) of allies as well foot as horse, and say that the KK both Eumenes and Merypius joyn with their aid-forces, yet can they not amount above the number of 7000. Now that we have heard what the strength is of the enemies regard and compare your own army, namely, how but both in number, as also in goodness and quality of fouldiers, you surpass them; being your selves from your childhood and infancy warriors trained in practice of arms and warlike wrou'the, frame, hardened in to many battel's where as they be new & raw fouldiers taken up in battle, and enrolled now the first time against this present service. As for the auxiliaries of the Romans, what are they but Lydians, Phrygians, and Numidians? but we to let against them have to aide us Thracians and Gauls the most courageous nations under heaven. For harness and weapons they have no other than such as every poor fouldier is able to provide for himself: but the Macedonians are furnished out of the King's royal armory and arsenal with such armures of proof, as my father in many years caused to be made with great care & to his no small expense. The Romans are far from their provisions and the fame exposed to all the calamities of the seas: but we besides, the revenues and fluxes out of the mines of metal, have laid by both coin and corn sufficient to serve for ten years. The Macedonians have store and plenty i'great abundance of all things necessaries, & be provided as well by the gracious favour of the gods, as the careful diligence of a King. It remaineth now that ye, army that mind and courage with you which your noble progenitors bare before you tho'he I say, who after they had conquer'd & subdued all Europe past into Asia, by force of arms made way & discovered that part of the world that was never heard of before, and gave nor yet over to wing'd still and make more conquests, until they were barred by the red seas & could find no more land to conquer. But now believe me, fortune hath denounced a trial by war, not for the paraschel of the utmost bounds & marches of India but for our re- hold and possession of our inheritance even of Macedon. These Romans when they warred against my father, pretended a goodly title & made a glorious show to the world, is though they would
I shall deliver Greece, and establish it in freedom; but now in open and plain terms they show their infomuch to the Roman feignory, nor any nation renowned for martial prowess, permitted to bear arms and have weapon in hand. For, these things and no less, forced shall be to part with, and deliver up these proud Latins, together with King and kingdom, in case ye refuse war; and to do whatsoever they will command you. All the while that he delivered this speech, there might be heard secret exclamations of enemies, sufficiently testifying the general afeit of them all: but at these last words they lift up their voices and cried out aloud for anger and indignation, menacing the enemy part for courage and resolution, exhorting the King to be of good cheer and take a good heart; in so much as he was constrained to give over, and make an end of his Oration: only he commanded them to be ready for the remove, & to put themselves in the journey and take the enemy: for by this time advertised he was that the Romans were dislodged from Nymphæum. After this assembly was dissolved, he gave audience to the embassages from the States of Macedonia: for, some were to make promises and offer both of money & grain to maintain this war, every one according to their ability. Thanked they were each one, and released all of that charge, with this answer that the Kings provision was sufficient. Only he commanded them to find wains and carts for carriages of the pieces of war, the engines of battery, the darts, quarrels and other things, whereof of a mighty deal he had provided; and in sum, all the infrinements & furniture of war. Then he set forward with his whole army marching toward Eordea, and near unto the lake which they call Bogarites, he encamped. The next morrow he advanced to Elymen upon the river Halimauros. After this, having passed over the mountains named Camillus through a straight and narrow path, he descended to those that inhabit Axios, Pythous, and Deltae, which quarter is called Tripolis. These three towns had some while in suspense, by reason that they had given their hostages to the Latiifians: but in the end overcome with the fear presented before their eyes, were content to yield themselves into his hands. Periued and gracious words to this people making this account that the Periabetians would do the like: & in very deed he entered upon the City (which surrendered at his first arrival) without any doubt or flaw at all made by the inhabitants within. As for the town Cyrene, he assailed to batter it, and the first day he was repelled in a sharp skirmish at the very gates made by the townsmen that put on arms, drew to an head, and made resistance. But the morrow after, when he had assailed the City with all his forces, they submitted all to his mercy before night. The inhabitants of the next town to it Mylae, presuming upon their fortifications, and flanding upon this, That their City was impregnable, were so proud and lofty, that they could not be contented to shut the gates only against the King, but most rudely and malapertly dared not to call out reproachful taunts and gibing terms against his own person and the Macedonians. Which manner of dealing as it envenomed the enemies and edged them the rather to enforce and follow the assault, so it kindled themselves the more (upon despair of all pardon & mercy) to maintain and make good their place & stand more resolutely in their own defence. Whereupon for three dais together the town was assailed by one part, and defended by the other with mighty courage right valiantly. The Macedonians were so many in number, that by turns they relieved the assault without any difficulty and entered one in the place of another. But the townsmen who overmorrow day and night guarded the walls, without any change & new supply, were not only overcharged with many wounds, but also wearied and enfeebled with continual travel and want of sleep. The fourth day, when the intrenchment being once planted the scaling ladders were reared against the walls in every quarter and the gate assailed with greater force and violence than before, the inhabitants being driven from the curtain and battlements rannt all to the gate, and made a sudden fall upon the enemies: which proceeding more upon inconsiderate and blind anger, than any true and apprised confidence of their own strength, caused them (few in number and wearied) to be discomfited & put to flight by the enemies fresh and in heart, who entered pell-mell with them into the said gate standing wide open. Thus was this City taken and ravished. The bodies also of the free-born persons, as many as remained after the bloody execution, were sold in market. Periues after he had rated,ained, and burned a great part of the town, dislodged and departed from thence to Phollanum, and the next day following went onward and marched to Cyrene. But being advertised that the Massimius, Rufus and Hippisius the Praetor of Thessaly were entered still with a garrison, he paused beside the the town and never made offer of any assault. But he surprized Elatiad and Gomcui, by reason that the townsmen were bruken with exceeding fear upon his sudden arrival. These two towns are situat upon the very straight which leadeth to Tempe, but Gomnus especially. And therefore he left it guarded with a strong garrison both of foot and horse, as also fortified with a treble trench and rampier. Himself in person went onward still to Securium, minding there to attend the coming of the enemy: and withall he commanded his army to forrage and purvey corn everywhere all over the territory of the enemies lying under him. For Securium is fastened upon the head of an hill toward the very foot of the mountain Offa, having upon the south side the plain champain of Thessaly under it, but behind on the back Macedonia and Magnesia. Over and above these commodities, the place is very healthful and plentiful of all good things, watered also with many quick and running springs round about. The Roman Consul having his army on foot about that time marching toward Thessaly, at the first found good way and ready poslage through Epirus: but afterwards, when he was passed over into Athamanian, he met with a rough country & rugged soil, & in manner unsuceptible;

A so as with exceeding great difficulty and by short journeys he had much ado to reach unto Gomphi. And if at that time, whilst his men and horses were encumbered and taintd, the king had made head in barret arranged, taking the vantage of time and place against him, leading as he did an host composed but of rude and untrained novices, the Romans themselves cannot deny, but it would have gone very hard with them, and a great overthrow they must needs have received in that conflict. But when they were come once to Gomphi without any skirmish, besides the joy which they conceived, for that they had escaped and overcome that dangerous passage, they began also to complain of their enemies, for that they knew not their own good, and were to ignorant of the opportunity which they had. The Council after he had duly sacrificed (as it appertained) and distributed the allowance of corn among his soldiers, in joined there for few days for the rest and repose both of man and beast; where, hearing that the Macedonian ranged and over-run the country of Thessaly, waiting and impaling the territory of the Roman allies, he led his soldiers now sufficiently refreshed unto Larissa. And having marched from there; within in three miles of Trigipus (which they call Seir) he pitched his tents, and lodged upon the river Peric.

At the same time Eumenes arrived by sea at Chalced together with two of his brethren, Attalus and Athenodorus leaving at Pergamus a third brother Philotas for the defense of his realm. From thence, accompanied with Attalus and a power of four thousand foot and a thousand horse. he came to the Council, and left at Chalced two thousand footmen commanded by Athenodorus. Thither also repaired other aids which went to the Romans from all the States of Greece, but most of C the particulars were small as now they grew out of remembrance. The Apollonians sent 3 hundred horsemen, and a hundred horsemen. From the Athenians there came a Cornet of horsemen, even the whole Cavalry that the said nation could make. Likewise all the Cavalry of the Thessalians which exceeded not the number of three hundred that served in the Roman camp & quartered apart. The Achaian sent one thousand men of their youth armed for the most part after the Candiot manner. And much about this time C. Lucertius also the Praetor, who had the conduct of the ships that anchored in the road of Cephalonia after he had given charge to M. Lucertius his brother, to make sail with his fleet beyond the Cape of Malea, & so to pass to Chalced, himself went aboard unto a trireme gally, & sailed toward the gulf of Corinth to be seized first of the country of Bontia, and to prevent all matters there. He made way but slowly, because of the inconstancy and weakness of his body. M. Lucertius being arrived at Colurus, and advertised that P. Lentulus against the City of Halicarnassus, sent a messenger commanding him in the name of the Praetor to raise the siege and dislodge from thence. The lieutenant notwithstanding he had sent into that service with the help of the youth of that part of Bontia who took part with the Romans retired from before the walls. The relieving of this siege gave occasion of a new enterprise; for inconstently M. Lucertius befieg'd and invested Halicarnassus with his own forces. to the number of 10,000 fighting men together with 2000 foighbours from K. Eumenes whereof Athenodorus had the charge: and as they were now upon the point to give an assault, the Praetor came in unto them from Creusa. And very near to that time there arrived also at Chalced certain ships from the allies, namely, two Quinquereme galleys of Carthage, two trireme galleys from Heraclea Pontica, four from Chalcedon as many from Samos, and five quadrirreme galleys of Rhodos. All these vessels the Praetor sent back again to the allies, and caised them of that charge because there was no service to be performed in any place, Q. Martius also came by sea to Chalced, after he had won Halicarnassus, and assailed Larissa called Crenus.

This was the State of Bontia, when Perseus (as it hath been said before) lay encamped at Sperronei; who after he had from every coast thereabouts got together all the grain that he could come by, sent certain companies to give the wafe unto the territory of the Phoceans supposing that Romans might be surprized, when they should be drawn far from their own camp to the succouring of their disafficted auxiliaries. But becausing that they flirred never the more for that tumult: he dealt among his foighbours all the prey but only of men and women: now the booty stood most upon cattle where with they made good cheer. After this but near about one and the same time, the Col. & K. Perseus both debated in their counsell, how and where they should begin the war. The K. had taken great heart and courage by occasion that the enemy inflicted him to make such havoc, and do his pleasure in the Phocean territory. And therefore his resolution was to march directly against the Roman camp without giving more time and making any further delay. The Romans likewise for their parts were of opinion that all forswaking would greatly prejudice their reputation among the confederates, who took it exceedingly to the heart, that they had not succoured the Phoceans. As they fare consulting what to do. (now Eumenes and Attalus both were present at this Council) there came a messenger in post haste with news that the enemy approached near at hand with a mighty army: Whereupon the Council brake up, and presently the signal was given to arm. And advised it was in the mean while, that there should go forth 100 horse, and as many darters and foot out of King Eumenes his companies. Perseus about the fourth hour of the day, being come within a mile and somewhat more that of the Roman legiuer, commanded the enclips of the footmen to stand. Himself in person with the men of arms and light armed foighbours advanced forward, and so together with King Cessus and the Captains of the other auxiliaries, they two marched before. Now when they were within half a mile from the camp, they might discover the horsemens of their enemies. Two Cornets they were, most most part Gauls, under the conduct of Cafignatus; besides the loose and light armed forlorn hope, to the number well-near of a hundred and fifty, and those were partly Myians and partly Cretensians. Hereupon the King made a stand, not knowing well the number of the enemies: and a non out of the regiment that he had with him he drew two wings of Thracian horse, and as many Macedonians: likewise two Cohorts of Cretensian, and as many Thracian footmen. Hereupon enlisted a skirmish: but forasmuch as they were marched even in number, and no foot could run in to rescue from the one part or the other, it ended like wise in doubtful balance of victory. Of Ennenus his part there died about thirty: in which number Cafignatus the Commander of the Gauls was slain. So for that time Perseus retired his forces to Speriaum: but the next morrow the King marched with them again to the false-fame place, and much about the foresaid hour. Certain carts and wains laden with water followed after: and by reason that for a dozen miles space, all the way was watertles, and full of dult withall, hardly becalm (as it should seem) they had been for very drought and thirst in case they had been charged and put to skirmish, at the time when they were first in fight. But considering that the Romans kept quiet, yea, and had reduced their corps de guard within their rampier, Perseus likewise retired with his forces into his camp. This did the enemies for certain days together, hoping ever that the Roman cavalry would charge upon the tail of the rearguard in their retreat: and when by that occasion the skirmish was once begun and that they had trained and drawn them far from their camp then they might with ease whereover they were, turn upon them and make head, having the odds of them unto horsemen and light armed footmen. But the King seeing this would not spied, encamped nearer the morning by the break of day, after he had embattled his infantry in the usual place, he led all his cavalry and light-armed men toward the camp of his enemies. The Romans seeing a greater dust raised by more in number, and the same nearer than ordinary it had been, were mightily afraid within their camp. But at the first they would hardly believe the messenger that brought the news: for that continual all the former days the enemy used not to be seen until the fourth hour of the day, and now the sun was but newly risen. Howbeit, afterward (I say) when about their gates there were thicker alarms given, and more and more running from thence, and that now there was no doubt at all of the matter, there grew an exceeding trouble & hurlyburly, The Marshalls, Colonels, Captains and Centurions, betook themselves into the quarter about the Praetors pavilion: and the fouldeurs ran every man to his own tent. Perseus had embattled his men leis than half a mile from the rampier about a little hill which they call Calicenus. King Cotys had the charge of the left wing, with adiole of his own nation, The ranks of the cavalry marshalled suddenly one from the other by reason that the light armed fouldeurs were bellowed between. In the right wing were placed the Macedonian horsemen, and the Cretensian likewise intermingled among them, Milon of Berreheled their light armed fouldeurs: but Mavus of Antigonia commanded the horsem men; and the whole regiment of that part. Next to those wings the Cavalry of K. Perseus was ar ranged together with the select aid-fouldeurs of many and handy nations: and the same were conducted by Patrocles of Antigonia, and Didas the governor of Pannya. In the midst of all was the King himself: having about him a band called Agema and certain cornets of horsemen named [The sacred wing]. Before him he placed the slingers and darters, who both together amounted to the number of 400 and over them he appointed for to be their leader one son of Thetbookos, and Thetbookos the Dolopian. In this manner as is before said, flood the Kings for embattled; The cavalry put their infantry in order of battell, sent out their cavalry like the with the light armes companies, who were set in array before the camp. C. Lucinianus Castrum the Conuls brother had the leading of the right point, with all the Italian horsemens and the footmen lightly apointed temmingled among them, M. Valerius Lazius in the left, commanded the horsemens of the greek assiociate, together with the light armed fouldeurs of the same nation. Q. Mutilus conducted the battellen in the midw with certain extraordinary chieft men of arms. Before their Guiders, 200 horsemen of the Gauls flood in ordinance: and of the auxiliaries of K. Ennenus, 200 Cyri ians and 400 Thelbian horce. Not far from thence were ranged, somewhat above the left point King Ennenus himself and his brother Atlas, with all their power were planted behind, even between the rewarde and the trench. Thus flood both battels much after this manner arranged and having of either side a like strength in manner of horsemens and light-armoure, they en countred and charged one another; and then the conflict was begun by the forlorn hope of looke that wax to wit, the slingers and darters that went before, and first of all others the Thracians, faring like wild and savage beasts, who had been long pent up within some gates and cages, with a mighty cry advanced toward and ran upon the Italian horsemen in the right wing, to the end that they might trouble and amaze them; being otherwise a nation fastless, as well by nature as for long experience and pracie of war. *

* The footmen with their swords affixed to cut off the heads of their pikes; and one whiles they sought their horses, and another whiles they ran them into their flanks. Perseus rode into the midst of the battell, and at the first shock forced the Gekke to turn side and give way: and when the enemy pressed moreover hard upon them behind, beheld, the Thelbian horsemens who were placed in the rearward for succour, and stood somewhat apart and severed from the left wing, who at first were beholders only of the fight (as keeping without the danger of the charge) afterwards stood them in very good stead e even as they were at the point to go down & have the worse. For as they retired leisurely without breaking breaking their ranks, after that they once joyed with the aids of Eumenes, they both yielded the opportunity to their allies who were disbanded in the rout, to retire in safety within their ranks: and also eloping their own advantage, when the enemies pursued not so thick in troops, they ventured to put themselves forward beyond, and to hold many of those their allies whom they encountered and received in their flight. Neither durst the Kings men, being now also disarrayed and dispersed here and there in following the chase, come to hand-fight and joye battell with those, continuing so well in order as they did, and marching firm and strong together; whereas the matter had been dispatched and the war brought to a small end, in case the King who won the better in horse-fight had never to little come in with help and succour, For as been enraged by their foul-diers to fight, there came in place very fitly and in pulling good time: the Thracians, which Hippocrates and Leonidas (because they would not be behindhand in this hardy enterprise) brought of their own accord in great haste to soon as ever they heard of the winning hand of the Cavalry. And whiles the K. waved in doubtful suspense between hope and fear of this so great a adventure, Evander the Cretian, whole Piety and love of peace had longed in the wait awaited for Eumenes at Delphi, perceiving that main battell marching heavily armed under their enigmes ran into the King and earnestly adverte'd him to take heed, lest that bymarrying too much and bearing himself over-confident of this good speed of his, he brought not unduly the main chance of all his estate, into a needful and unnecessary hazard. For if (quoth he) you can content with the happy fortune of this fair day and so roll, either you shall have the means to make an honourable peace, or else (if you had rather profecute the war) to win exceeding many allies to bear arms with you in the field; who, no doubt, will follow the train of your good fortune. To this way flood the Kings mind ever and thither he soon inclin'd. Therefore having commended Evander for his good advice, he commanded the enigmes to retire, and the footmen to return into the camp; likewise to found the retreat unto the Guidons of the men of arms. In this battell 200 Roman horsemen that day lost their lives and no fewer than 2000 footmen, and near upon 200 of the Cavalry were taken prisoners. Of the Kings side, there died not pass 200 horsemen and forty of the Cary.

hand affail their camp, which we might have forced and won this day, but that they took them [1] to their heels and fled. But if they will come to a field and try the quarrel by the swords point, [2] look ye for no other issue of the conflict with footmen, than was before of the other with horsesmen. These words, both the horsemens (who bare upon their own shoulders the spoils of their enemies lying plain before their eyes in open view) heard with great pleasure and contentment, as meaning the hope of the future speed by the fortune pallied: and also the footmen enflamed now with the glory of others (and namely, those that were of the Macedonian Phalans) with all with their hearts to have the like occasion offered unto them, wherein they might not only shew their valorant service before the K., but also win semblable glory of their enemies. Thus the assembly was dissolved, and the morrow after the King marched forward and encamped upon Mosphlon, which is an hill situated in the mid way between Tempe and Larissan. The Romans removed their camp into a place of more security, howbeit not far from the bank of Penus. Thither repaired M. Jaferus the Numidian, with 1000 horse and as many foot, besides 22 Elephants. Now as K. Perseus during those days, sat in Council what course to take as touching the main conduct of his affairs. When his courage was now well abated and not so lofty for his late victory, some of his friends were so hardy as to advise him to use this good fortune of his for the obtaining and compassing of some honorable peace, rather than upon a vain hope to carry his head aloft, and engage himself and his whole state into some hazard & jeopardy, out of which he should not be able to recover and retire into safety. For to keep a mean and moderation in prosperity, and not over-confidently to trust upon the present flattering fortune, is the part (they say) of a wise man indeed and truly happy. And therefore the noble course is, to lend certain men of purpose unto the K. for to renew the league upon the same conditions, with which your father Philip had accepted peace heretofore of T. Quintus the conqueror. For neither (they say) can the war be taken up with greater honour and reputation, than after so memorable a battle; nor ever will there be presented more firm and assured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occasion, which will work and mollify the Romans as a man would have them, to come on and assent to any accord considering they are well tamed with the inferiority of this battell. But in case the Romans upon an inbred peevishness and engrained pettiness of theirs, should not hear reason but refuse an indifferent end, then both God and man shall be witnesses, as well of the moderation of Perseus, as of their pride & insolent broodwardens. The K. was willing enough to give ear to this, and indeed never misliked such discourses; and therefore the advice was approved by the Select of the most part: whereupon embassadors were sent to the K. & in a frequent Council assembled, had audience given. Peace they demanded, and promised that Perseus should pay unto the Romans as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for; and likewise quit the same Cities, coasts, and territories, which Philip had given up and surrender'd. To this effect (the embassadors who being retired aside, the Romans debated in Council, and in the end: Roman constancy imported and had the upper hand: for in those days the manner and use was, in time of adversity to bear all out and set a good countenance, but in prosperity to hold an even hand and to use good government. So agreed it was to return this answer, That peace might be granted with this condition. That K. Perseus should permit full and free power to the Senat of Rome, for to dispose both of his person and the kingdom of Macedonia at their good pleasure. When the Embassadors had made relation hereof; this content resolution and invincible perseverance of the Romans made them wonder again, as being not acquainted with their manners and fashions: and most of them forbid to make mention any more of peace, saying, That the Romans would be glad shorty to seek for that of their own accord, which now at this present they loathed & rejected when it was offered. But Perseus mightily feared, that this arrogant spirit of theirs, proceeded from the confidence they had in their own forces; insomuch as he gave over to it, and aspired to tempt the Col. if it haply by augmenting the sum of money, he might buy peace at any price & reckoning whatsoever. But seeing nothing to come down nor to alter one jot from the first answer: in despair now of all peace, he returned to Sycurium from whence he came, purposing once again to try the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late fight of cavalry was flown over all Greece, and did disorder the minds and affections of men: for not only they that took part with the Macedonians rejoiced to hear this news; but also very many of them who were obliged and beholden unto the Romans for benefits and favours received at their hands; and likewise who had tasted of their violence and proud government. And this they did for no other reason at all, but only upon a foolish and perverse affection like to that whereby the common people ordinarily is carried away in the beholding of disport and trial of matters, even to favour even the weaker and him that taketh the spoil.

At the same time Lucullus the Praetor had with most forcible means assaulted the City of Harptinae in Boeotia, and all the besieged defendants within were relieved by no private aid, but only the youth of the Corinthians (who at the beginning of the siege, centred the City) nor hoped for any to come: yet they hold out and made resistance with courage of heart more than with strength of hand; for they inflicted many times and filled upon the fabrics and engines of the enemy; and when the ram approached hard to the wall, they fell thereupon a mighty weight and counterpoise of lead and so depressed and drove it down to the ground. And if haply the enemies who ran with the ram against the wall avoided the device of theirs, laid battery, and shook it in some other place; the townsmen within, raised presently with great speed another more, piling
A piling up hastily the stones one upon another, which they found lying among the very ruins of the breaches. The Consul seeing this manner of service by way of ordnance and battery, to become slow and tedious, commanded to divide ladders amongst every company, and purposed to invest the City round about with the Ecladus: supposing that the number which he had would be sufficient to exploit this enterprise, because on that side whereas the Town is enclosed with a marth, it was bootless (or rather impossible) to assault it. Himself in person preferred 2000 elect soldiers before that part, whereas two turrets, and all the wall between was beaten down and overthrown to the end that in the very instant, whilst he assailed to enter at the breaches the townsmen should run all thither to repulse him, and in the mean while the walls void of defenders might in some part or other be scaled and won. But they within besifird themselw estantly to give him the repulse. For having piled in the very open breaches a mighty number of ladders made of drie vine cuttings and such small brush, they flood ready with flaming firebrands and burning links, threatening ever and anon to kindle the flame and set all on fire, to the end being defended from the enemy by the means of fire between, they might have time to oppose an inner countermove against them. But by mithanc this device and enterprise of theirs was emplaced. For there poured down on a suddain such a mighty shower of rain that the fire would not easily take fire, and what was set a burning it soon was quenned again. By which means not only the paffage was made open between the smoking ladders drawn apart one from another here and there, but whilsts they all intended wholly the defence of that one place, the walls were taken at one instant by ladders reared up against many and launge parts thereof. In the first heat upon the winning of the City, old and young, such as chanced to come in their way, without any respect at all of age were put to the sword, The armed soldiers fled into the Castle, and the next day being past hope to make good the place, they yielded and were all fold under the gurand in portico, to them that would bid met, to the number of 2500 men, or very near. The ornaments and beauties of the City as statues, images painted tables and pictures, and whatsoever was found in the piggale to bear a better price, was carried to shipboard, and the Town it self felled from the very foundations and laid even with the ground. From thence the army was conducted to Thebes which being won without any resistance he put into the hands of the banished persons and those that took part and fided with the Romans but those of the contrary faction, such as favoured the King and the Macedonians, he sold by whole families in open market to the best chapsen, Having performed these exploits in Thebes, he retired himself to the Sea side to his ships.

Whilest these affairs paffed thus in Bacons, Persia, lodged for certain daries in camp at Scurium. Where being advertised, that the Romans made great hast to in the corn newly reaped down, and to carry it from all parts of the fieldes into the leauers, and that every soldier before his tent cut and shred off the eare as they lay bound in sheaves, to the end they might thresh and drive out the cleaner corn, by which occasion they had made great heaps of straw thorough all parts of the camp, he supposing it was an easy matter to set all their tents and pavilions on fire. Wherupon he commanded to provide torches, links and balls made of tow bemaded with pitch and tar, thes provided and furnished he set out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might put this device in execution without being defrayed before. But all came to nothing for the forbes mort coe de guard although they were surprized with this suddain coming, by their trouble and allight awakened and railed all the rest, and immediately the alarm was given; so at one instant the fouldiers were ready and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and prret for to defend the camp. Persia likewise insontently turned about with his enigns, putting his farriage and carriage before, and then commanded the infantry to march after himself with the cavalry and light-armors (tased behind to fortify and guard the rearward, supposing, as he felt out indeed) that the enemies would make after to charge upon the tail of the march. His light armed soldiers had some short skirmishing especially with the forlorne hoopse and loose avant-courriers; but the horse and footmen both, retired without any imprisonment into the camp. Thus when all the corn was cut down about those quarters, the Romans dislodged and removed into the territory of Cyzicon, which as yet was not endamigged. Whilest they lay encamped in feerity and mitruring nothing (because the enemies were so far off, and by reason that the way between Scurium and Cyzicon was so difficult for want of water) they held all on a sudden. In early in the morning by day light, the Kings cavalry and light armed souldiers shewed themselves upon the hills that overlooked them from above, and put them into great trouble. Departed they were from Scurium at noon the day before, and had left the infantry behind about the break of day upon the plain next therto. For a while he flood upon those said hills, hoping that the Romans might be trained forth to an horse-flight. But receiving them not to fist at all, he sent one on horseback to command the footmen to retire again to Scurium, and himself in person followed. The Roman horsemen made after a pretty distance off if happy they could spie any advantage in one place of other to charge upon them, disbanded and stragling about. But when they saw that in their dismarch they kept close together following their guidons and keeping their ranks, they also returned into the camp. After this, the King wary of making to long journeys dislodged and removed to Megipus. The Romans for their part likewise having moven down all the corn of Cranier, passed into the territory of Phellaeum. The King having intelligence by a renegade revolt, that the Romans were staggered all over the fields and reaping the landing corn without any guard of armed men, made a roade with 1000 horse & 2000 Cандians & Thracians: who who marching with as great haft as possibly they could, set upon the Romans at unawares all on. H provided; where he took a thousand carts or thereabouts, together with their teams, most of them laden, and upon 600 men besides. The guard and convoy of this booty into the camp he committed to the charge of 300 Cretcians. Himelf having calld his cavalry dispersed here and there busy in execution, and reunited with the rest of the footmen led them to the next corps de guard or garrifion of the enemies, supposing that with little ado they might be surprised and vanquifhed.

L. Pompeius a Colonel had the command of them, who seeing his foaldiers affrighted with this sudden coming of the enemies retired with them to an hill near at hand, for to defend himself by the vantoge and strength of the place, considering that otherwise in number and forces he was too weak. Whereafter he had call his men into a ring, for toward against the shot of arrows and darts by a roof and fence of targets couched close together over their heads: Perfun having envi

ioned the hill round about with armed men, commanded home to mount up and affay to win the place onall parts; it possibly they could and then to fight close hand to hand: others he charged to lane their darts and flout their shafts thick at them a tar off. The Romans were beftet with a double fear; for neither could they maintain skirmifh and fight close together because of thofe who laboured to climb the hill: and fay they had broke any ranks with excufions and outries upon them, yet were they expofed and lay open to the shot of arrows and darts. Mift hurt they had by certain weapons called Cithrefphendone flinging darts.] A new kind of dart this was and lately de/d in the time of this very war, it had a sharp head of iron the length of two hands breadth, and the fame fell in a steel which was halfe ditto long, and about the thickness of a man's finger: for to flie direct and frighte, three teathers it had about it in a man of a flafe: the fling from the middle part had two cords of an unequallize: now when as the flinger lwung it about, as it lay even poifed in the greater capacity of the leather thong our flw the dart and was driven with violence like a bullet. Many of the foaldiers being very more wounded as well with this weapon as all other forts of fhot so as now for weariens they were scarce able to bear their own armour: the King was earnefly in hand with them to yield and labour, affuring them upon his faithful word their lives, yea and otherwhiles promised them rewards and recompences, but there was not a man whole heart enclosed once thither. Now as they ftood thus firm and refolute to die there fhone upon them a little comfort and some hope of evafion by and by all their expectation. For certain of the foragers and corn piurators, who happen'd to flie for refuge to the camp brought word unto the Conful, that the fcorp de guard afford was befeigned round, whereupon being mov'd with the jeardome where in no man seeing fuch a number (for about 900 they were, and all citizens of Rome) he went forth of the camp with the cavalry and light armed foaldiers, and unto them joyned certain new victoies of the Numidians as well home as together with the Elephants: and gave commandement to the marial Colonels, that the figns of the regions should follow after. Himelf in perfon march'd before toward the hill aforefaid taking with him a certain number of skirmifhers, for tofenthrench the light armed auxiliaries. Emnumes, Attalus, and Megacefaro the King of the Numidians flanked the Conful, on either aide. When as the befeigned Romans had a fight once of the Eon's ensigns of their friends and fellows, they took comfort and courage again upon their former eftimate deparl. Perfun, who had purpofed in the falt place not to spend any long time in laying siege to this corps de guard but to content himfelf with the forturn in Cecil which at a venture happen'd, in that he had taken and thain some of the forraggers: secondly (when he was in fome fort entred into that fition) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that he had no strength, to speak of, about him; yet pufled up and carried as it were above the ground with the concett of his late good hand, both fain in perfon to attend the enemies coming and alfo went out all hift for the [Macedonian] Phalans. Which coming later than the prefent nothing required (albeit in great heat thay hurried) it fell out fo, that they were to encounter (troubled and diforderd as they were in running) their enemies that were well appointed and provided at hand. And the Conul, who had prevented them profently welcomed them with battle. As at the first the Maclonian made refistance but afterwards being in no repect equal unto the enemies, after they had loft three hundred footmen with four of the moft foreward and brail horfemen out of that corner which they call Serta (amongwhom Antiochus also their leader died) they endeavoured to retire and be gone. But the way by which they were to pafs, was more troublesome to speak of, than the skirmifh and battle itfell. The Phalans being lent unto by a messenger in half, and confecuted as hastily encountered al front in a certain fireight a troop of prisoners, and likewise the wagons charged with corn. Who being lath at to give way, threw upon all a great trouble as well of the one part as the other; whiles no man took heed how to march in order: but the armed foaldiers call down and overthrew the heaps of forrage and baggage, for otherwise there could no way be made: and the draught-befts being pricked and proyok'd forward; raged and made fow fport in the prem and throng. Hardly and with much ado were they defigng and rid of this confined and diforderd company of captives, when they met with the King his company and the horfemen difmiffed. In which place, the noise which they made crying unto the Phalans. Back again Ba. again made a fhout among them as if there had been something ready to fall upon their heads; in fuch a fireight as if their enemies diftive have enter'd into the firit and purfued farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthow, but the Conul commeting himfelf with a mean good hand in that he had reduced and recovered his corps de guard from the A the hill, retired with his forces into the camp. Some write that there was a great battle fought that day, and how 8000 enemies were slain, and among them Spepert and Antipater, two of the Kings Captains. Also that there were taken prisoners about 3400: and military enmities 27 carried away. Neither was the victory easily gotten but cost blood, for not so few as 4300 were slain of the Conful his army, and five guidons of the left wing lost. This journey recomforted the Romans, but danced and quaked Perseus in such a fort, as after he had laid a few days at Mayodion, especially about entering the bodies of his dead soldiers, and left a sufficient garrision at Conus, he retired his army into Macedon, leaving also at Philone, one of his own captains named Timobentus, with some small forces, whom he commanded to stay the Magnesians and the borderers adorning.

When he came to Perus, he dismissed his army out of the field, and went them to their wintering harbors, but himself together with King Cogas went to Thessalonia.

Thither news came, that Atelius a petty King of the Thracians, and Coroagnus a captain under King Eumenes, had invaded the marches of Cogas, and were masters of the country which they call Marone. And therefore supposing that he must needs discharge Cogas to look to the defense of his own realm, he bestowed rich presents upon him at his departure; and gave him 300 talents for six months wages of his cavalry, whereas at the beginning he purposed to be at the charge of a whole years pay.

The Conful after he heard that Perseus was gone, approached with his army near to Cogas, and there lodged: if haply he might force and gain that also, Situat it was over against Tempe, at the very mouth and gullet of the fountains and is the very frontier Town yelding both a most affured defence and strengt to all Macedon, and also a commodious passage for the Macedonians to enter into Thessaly, and being a place impeachable, as well for the natural fire thereof, as the strong garrision therein planted, he gave over the enterprise. So turning and bending his way into Perraebus, after he had forced Malaoa at the first assault and put into the ravine: and received Tribulis with the rest of Perraebus, yeelded by composition, he returned to Larissas. And then having sent Eumenes and Artabas home into their own country, and bestowed Metauges and the Nymphs in divers Cities of Thessaal neath at hand, to remain there for the winter time, and distributed part of his forces throughout all Thessaly, in such fort, that not only they had all commodious wintering, but also served in stead of garrisons to the Cities, Q. Mucius his Lieutenant he lent with a regiment of 2000 men to guard Ambraecia and keep it in obedience. All the confederaies of the Greek Cities, save only the Achaenians he licent to depart. With one part of his army he went into Thessaly to Philae, where he rated down to the ground Peileum abandoned of the inhabitants. But Antro on he won with the good will of the Townsmen. Then afterward he approached before Larissas with his forces. The City was left desolate, for all the people were retired into the fortres, the which he besiged and assauled: and filled the Kings garrision of Macedonians quit the place of whom the Townsmen being taken and left to themselves, submitted immediately. Ther he stood in doubt whether he should affay Demetrius first, or have an eye and look into the troubles and state of Bastia. For the men of Thebes being grievously molested and annoyed by those of Corone, had sent for him into Bastia: at whose prayers, thither he conducted his army; and besides, Bastia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magnesia.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and fortieth Book Florus Pretor were judicially condemned, for demaning themselves with cruelty and rascis in the administration of their Provinces. P. Licinius Crassus the Proconsul, ro by force many Cities in Greece, and cruely rifted them. For which rigour of his, the captures whom he had taken under the garland and in open market, were by an order directed out of the Senate, restored afterward to their former estate. The Admirals of the Roman fleets committed many outrages and enormities against their allies. Besides, there are contained in this book, the prosperous affairs of King Perseus in Thessaly; after he had vanquished the Dardanians and subdued Lyctium, whereof Gentius was King. The troubles which began in Spain by means of Oloonicus, were appeased by his death: M. Emilius Lepidus, was by the Confort created president of the Senate.

The three and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

The same summer, wherein the Romans won the victory with horse-fight in Thessaly, the Lieutenant being sent into Lynonius from the Conful, compelled by force and arms two rich Towns to yeeld; unto which nevertheless he gave all their goods again, to the end that by an opinion of this Clemency, he might win the hearts of the inhabitators of Carrus, that strong City. But when he law that he could not conftrain them to render, no more than not to let them by force; because his soldiers should not seem to have been wearied for noth-thing in the besieging of two Towns, he fell to riife and ramfack that, which before he left untouched.

The other Conmi C. Caffius neither performed any memorable exploit in Cant, which was his Province by lot; and having endeavoured to conduct his legions through Illyrio into M. tral-ly, all his deignments came to no effect at all. That the Conmi was entered upon this journey, the Senats was certified by the Embassadors of the Aquilians who complained that their colony newly erected was feeble, and not as yet well secured among those fierce nations of Indians and Parians; and withal they made suit, that the Senat would provide and take order, that the said colony might be fortified, and when the question was put unto them. Whether they would be conent that commission should be directed unto C. Caffius in that behalf? they answered, 'That the said Caffius, having assembled his army at the Remes into Aquilia, was destined through Sclaven into Macedonia.' This affair was thought incredible, and every man appalled; since, that he had been gone to levy war upon the Carrians happy of the Illyrians. The Aquilians were able to reply no further, nor affirm more upon their knowledge than this. That allowance of corn was made for the soldiers to serve thirty-days, and that gods were fought and brought about, who knew the waies out of Italy into Macedonia. Hereat the senate (ye may be sure) took great fruit and was highly displeased, that the Conmi should be so hardly as prelimin to leave his own province first pass into that which belonged to another, and to lead his army an unknown and new way, and the same dangerous, through strange and distant countries, thereby to open passage as it were, for so many nations to come into Italy. Whereupon in a frequent assembly of the Senat, there passed a decree, 'That C. Sulpicius the Pretor should admit three Embassadors out of the body of the Senat, to depose out of the City that present day, to make all the half they possibly could to overtake the Conmi wheresoever he was, and to give him warning to levy no war against any nation without direct warrant from the Senat. And these Embassadors went, namely, M. Cornelius Catulus, M. Ennius, and P. Martius Rust, The prefect for as touching the Conmi and the army, was the occasion that the care of securing Aquilia was deferred for that time.

After this, were the Embassadors of certain States in both Provinces of Spain admitted to come into the Senat, who complained of the provocations and pride of the Roman Officers and Governors amongst them; humbly beseeching the Senat upon their knees, Not to suffer them (being allies and confederates) to be more shamefully pill'd and spoiled than the very enemies, Amongst other indignities for which they inveighed themselves aggrieved, notorious it was, that the said Magistrates had taken bribes, ye, and used extortion in wounding money from them. Whereupon a commission was granted to L. Cornelius the Pretor (unto whom Spain by lot was fall) to ordain five judges or commissioners (and those out of the rank and degree of Senators) for every part of whom the Spaniards claimed to recover such monies; and likewise to permit the plaintiffs to take unto them what Advocats and Counsel they would. Then, after those Embassadors were called again in the Senat, this decree and act of the Senat was read unto them, and willing they were to nominate their Advocats who named four, to wit, P. Procneus Cato, P. Cornelius Billius, the son of Comis, L. Emelius Pulena the son of Marcus, and C. Sulpicius Galata. And first they took commissioners to proceed against M. Titurius, who had been Pretor in the other Province of Spain, when An. M. Titurius and M. Furini were Conmis. Twice was the case of the accused party adjourned to a farther time, but at the third session he was quit and found guiltless. There was some variance and dilfection between the Embassadors of those two Provinces. The States of this higher Spain, took for their patrons and Advocats, M. Ceare and S. Sis; he of the farther and lower Spain, made choice of L. P. Procneus and C. Sulpicius. They met in high Spain, and due to the delegate judges, P. Furini Pllus the other of the base Spain, M. Matienus, Phobhas, been L. Depty these three years pall; when Sp. P. Pulienius and Q. Metius were Conmis; but this M. Cato was two years before, during the Consulship of L. Pulienius and M. P. Pulius. Charged they were both of them with grievous matter and detentions, and a farther day granted of a final judgment; but when they were to answer judicially again, they made default, and for excuse it was alleged, that they were both out of the country; and so they departed into voluntary exile, Furini to Praetoria, and Matienus to his country. The voice went out that the patents of the plaintiffs would not suffer them to follow process still against such noble and great personages: and the hapiness hereof was more pregnant, by reason that Conulius the Pretor let this matter fall, and began to take matters and levy soldiers for the war; and to forthwith directly went into the Province, to the end that no more men shou'd be brought into question and troubled by these Spanish. By this means, all former matters pall were buried in silence and no more speech made of them, but for future time the Senat took order and provided for the Spaniards so well, that they obtained an immunity. That no Roman Magnistrate should have power and autho-rity to set the price upon any again, nor force the Spaniards to sell the Violeers at what rate he pleased to set down; also that there should be no commissioners appointed within their Towns for the gathering and receiving of the revenues and money infiny from thence. Besides, there came another embassy of a sort of people out of Spain, after a new and strange manner: for there were four hundred persons, avouching themselves the children of Roman soldiers, and Spanish women not joyed in wedlock: who appeared before the Senat and befought them,
To allow them a City to inhabit. Whereupon ordained it was, that they should enter their names and be matriculated before their Pretor L. Cænilius: and look whomsoever of them he incarcerat and made free, those he thought meet to be sent to Carteia near the Sea side, and there planted: also that those Carthagians, who were willing still to keep home and remain there, should be privileged as Coloniz and enrolled, and to enjoy besides a portion of Lands alligned unto them. This was a Latin colony, and was called the Colony of the Liberrins.

At the same time there came as Embassadors out of Aftrick, Gulassa the son of Mafariffa, and likewise the Carthaginian embassage, Gulassa first was brought into the Senate, who declared what his father had sent unto them against the Macedonian: promising withal, that if it pleased them to impose more upon him, he would be ready to perform the same in remembrance of the benefits.

Being then the people of Rome: finally, he gave the LL. of the Senate a caveat by the way to take heed that the Carthaginsians deceived them not in the end: for that resolved they were, and went in hand to prepare a great navy under pretence of sending it to the Romans against the Macedonians: which if it were on ready rigged and furnished, it was in their choice then, to make whom they would either friends or foes.

As upon the people of Rome: finally, he gave the LL. of the Senate a caveat by the way to take heed that the Carthaginsians deceived them not in the end: for that resolved they were, and went in hand to prepare a great navy under pretence of sending it to the Romans against the Macedonians: which if it were on ready rigged and furnished, it was in their choice then, to make whom they would either friends or foes.

Being entered the camp and shewing the heads aloft, they struck such a fear, that immediately the army had come forth and advanced against them; the camp might have been won: and yet even then as it was, they fled amain: and hence there were who gave their opinion, to send Em-bassadors to treat and with prizers to inter for peace. Upon the news reported hereof, many Cities submitted and were surrendered. Such as made excuse, and laid the fault upon the folly of two persons only, who had of their own accord offered themselves to be punished, obtained pardon of the Pretor. And then forthwith he went in expedition against other Cities: but finding them all ready to do whatsoever they were commanded, he passed quietly with his army through that country in peace, which but a while before was all up in arms and on a light fire, This lenity of the Pretor, which he used in taming and subduing this most fierce and proud nation without effusion of blood, was of so much more acceptable to the LL. of the Senate and the whole body of the people, as the Confl Lusius and the other Pretor Lucertius had warred in Greece with greater cruelty and avarice. As for Lucertius, the Tribuns of the Commons accused him daily in their ordinary Orations before the people for his absence: Not withstanding his excuse was allowed, that absent he was, and employed about the affairs of the State. But in those dates, so unknown were Dtings done hard by, that even at that present he was at his arm in the territory of Antonius, and busied in compelling a conduct of water out of the river Coracinato. Antonius: the charges whereof the defrauded with the money raised out of the tale of prizes taken from the enemies. Some say that he was gained to have that peace of work effected, for the sum of a hundred and 1,000 Ases, Moreover he embellished and adorned the Temple of Aedesflapius, with the painted tables found in the pillage. The envy and ill will, the obloquy also and dis honor like to grow to Lucertius, turned upon his successor Hortensius, by occasion of the Embassadors of Aderus, who in pitiful wise complained with tears before the Senate, that their Town was by Hortensius forced and ranstaked: Hence the cause of this ruin and destruction of their City was no more but this, that being enjoined by him to pay a sum of a hundred thousand Denarri, and allowance.

Of fifty thousand Modii of wheat they requested some repit of time, wherein they might addres their Embassadors, as well to Hefillus the Confl as unto Rome, concerning this imposition. For scarcely were they come unto the said Confl, but they heard how their City was forced, the principal citizens thereof beheaded, and all the rest left in port-sale under the garland. These were grievous indignities in the sight of the Senat, whereupon they passed the same ordinance in the behalf of the Aderats, that the year before had been directed in the like case as touching the Coracinians: and commanded the Pretor Q. Marini to publish the said decree before the publick assembly of the people. In like manner two Commissioners were sent, namely, C. Sempronius Blegus, and S. Julius Cefaro, to re-establish the Aderats in their freedom: who also had in charge to signify them both to the Confl Hefillus, and also to the Pretor Hortensius, That the Senate judged the hostility offered unto the Aderats injurious, and the war unlawful, and therefore that all such as were brought into servitude, should be fought out and restored again to liberty.

At the same time the representation was made unto the Senat of certain complaints against C. Caflus, who had been Confl the year before, and at that time was employed in quality of a Colenel-marshall together with A. Hefillus in Macedonia. Likewise there arrived the Embassadors of Cineilius a petty King of the Gauls. A brother of his having audience granted in the Senat made a speech, wherein he complained, that C. Caflus had given the waft to the lands and territories of the people inhabiting the Alps, who were their allies and confeders, and from thence had led away into captivity many thousand person. And much at one instant there came the Embassadors of the Carthagians, Parians and Japides with complaints against Caflus. That first he had enjoined them to furnish him with guides for to shew and direct him the best way to march with his army into Macedonia, and so departed in peace from them, as if he had meant to war alike where: but afterwards out of the midway of his journey, he returned upon them and in hostile manner overran their frontiers, robbing spoiling & burning wheresoeuer he went: and to this day they cannot devise and know the reason, wherefore the Confl should hold them for enemies and deal so cruelly by them. As well the Prince of the Gauls afofraid being absent as these Embassadors in place received this
This answer, That as touching the outrages for which they showed themselves grieved, the Senate neither knew thereof beforehand, that ever they were intended, nor yet approved of the same, since they were committed. But against all right and equity it were to condemn unheard in his own defence, and absent, such a personage as he is, namely a man who had been Consuls considering also that his employment about the C. W. is the occasion of his absence. When C. C. Cassius is once returned out of Macedonia, then if they would shew themselves and acquire him face to face, the Senate would hear the cause and take knowledge accordingly, yes and endeavour that they should be satisfied and contented. Moreover, thought good it was, that those nations should not be dispatched only with this bare answer, but that Embassadors also should be sent two unto the forefand King beyond the Alps: and other three to the people above named for to acquaint them with the resolution of the Lords of the Senate, and they gave order besides to send presents to each of the Embassadors to the value of two thousand Allies over and above, to the two Princes that were brethren, their gifts following. to wit: two chains of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold: also five pieces of plate in silver, amounting to the weight of twenty pound: two bard horses with their riders and lackeys: likewise harness amour and their casocks: and livery likewise for all those of their train, as well bond as free. These were the things sent unto them. But at their own request granted it was besides, that they might for their mony buy each of them ten horses, and be allowed to transport them out of Italy. The Embassadors sent with the Gauls beyond the mountains, were C. Lucius and M. Amylius Lepidus: to the other nations C. Sicinius, P. Cornelius Blafo, and T. Memmius.

Moreover, there met together in Rome at once, the Embassadors of many States both of Greece and Asia. And first the Athenians were brought into the Senate, who related, That they had sent unto the Consul P. Licinius and the Proctor C. Lucretius, what shipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make: but seeing they had no use of them, they had raised a levy of a hundred thousand Medois of corn. Which albeit their land was but barren for tillage, and the very husbandmen themselves lived of forrain corn brought in unto them, yet they had made means to do accordingly, because they would not seem to want in any dutiful service: and willing they were yet, and pref to perform whatsoever they would require. The Milefians for their part said, That hitherto they had done nothing, marry they offered themselves to be ready to accomplis all that the Senate should command them toward this war. The Alabandians shewed, That they had build a Temple to the City of Rome, and ordained besides, that in the honour of that goddes there should be a solemnity of games and plains exhibited every year. Also that they had brought with them for a present, a crown of gold weighing fifty pound, to set it up in the Capitol: a gift and offering to Juno, Minerva, and withal, three hundred horsemens shields, which they were minded to befalow upon those, unto whom it pleased them to appoint and command. Their petition was, that they might be permitted to offer their present in the Capitol, and there to sacrifice. The men of Lampacons came with a golden crown weighing fourscore pound, presenting, That they had quitt and abandoned Persia, to soon as ever the Roman army was arrived in Macedonia, notwithstanding they owed allegiance unto Persia, and were homages to his father Philip before him. In which consideration as also for that they had performed their devour to their full power to the Roman Generals, they requested no other favour: to be gratified withal, but M to be received into the amity of the people of Rome: and in case there should be peace concluded with Persia, that they might be excepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The rest of the Embassadors had a gracious answer returned unto them. As for the Lampacens, order was given to Q. Manius the Proctor, to enter and enrol them in the number of allies. Every one of these Embassadors were rewarded with a present worth two thousand Allies. The Alabandians were appointed to carry back with them into Macedonia their shields aforesaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hostilius the Consul. Over and besides, the Carthaginian Embassadors out of Africa, made relation that they had brought from thence ten thousand thousand Medois of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, which they had on shipboard at the sea-side ready to carry the same wherefore the Senate would appoint. This benevolence of theirs was accompanied with good words, saying, they knew well that his gift and recognisance of their duty, was inferior either to their own good will, or the demerits of the people of Rome. Howbeit many times heretofore they had shewed themselves to do the part of thankful, faithful, and truly allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both states. In like sort the Embassadors of Magnesia promised the same proportion of corn, with 1200 horses and twelve Elephants, alluring them in his name, to do whatsoever the Senate would impose and should be thought needful: and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his own accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and also to the King, requested they were to transport over into Macedonia to the Consul A. Hostilius those things which they had promised. To the Embassadors were sent by way of presents, two thousand Allies apiece. The Cretenian Embassadors, related how they had sent into Macedonia such a number of Archers, as the Consul P. Licinius had imposed upon them: and when they denied not upon the question asked, that there served more Archers of theirs under Persia than with the Romans, this answer was made unto them. That if the Cretenians would well and truly and in good earnest prefer the friendship of the people of Rome before that of King Persia, the Senate of Rome likewise would give them answer as certain and assured allies: in the mean while, they should let their country men to understand, and that it was the will and pleasure of the Senate that the Cretans should have all speed possible call home all those soldiers whom they had in any garrison of King Perseus. The Candians being divulged with this dispatch, then the Chalcidians were called in: and at the very first fight of them, it soon appeared upon what terms of necessity they were driven to send an embassage: when Micion the chief man among them, by occasion that he was lame with the gout in his leg, was brought into the Senate in a litter, in which extremity defeated as he was there was no pleading of any excuse by his infirmity, nor craving pardon, since he was to go without, when he had all done. He began by way of preamble and saying, "He had nothing left alive but his tongue, for to deplore and bewail the calamities of his country: then he went forward, and first shewed what countries and good turns the State wherein he lived had performed to the Captains of General and armies of the Romans, both of old, and also of late in the war against Perseus. After this, he declared what parts of pride covetousness, and cruelty, this, C. Lucertius a Roman Pretor had exercised upon his country-men, and afterwards what L. Hortensius practised, at that time above all others: also, how the Chalcidians were enforced to endure all calamities, were they more grievous than those which they presently suffered rather than they would yield to Perseus. And as for Lucertius and Hortensius, they knew full well, that it had been better and more for their safety to have shut their gates against them, than to receive them into their City. For such as had excluded them forth, as namely, they of Embasias, Amphipolis, Macedonia, and Euxin, remain still entire and in good estate: but with us (say they) the Temples have been robbed of all their beautiful ornaments, and utterly spoilt by these sacrilegious. C. Lucertius had carried all away by water over to Antium, and hath led away into bondage and captivity the persons free born, C. Cn. Aufidius. And these two not only counted him before the Senate, but also having drawn him perforce into the general assembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproaches, took out prosals alike and arraigned him to make his appearance and answer judicially at a day before the people. Then Q. Mucius the Pretor, by order from the Senate, answered the Chalcidians in this manner: "Wheres ye alldege and say, That ye have well deserved of the people of Rome both heretofore and also in this present war now in hand, the Senate knoweth all that to be true, and accepteth the same thankfully in the best part, as of right they ought. As touching your grievances and complaints for the levies which C. Lucertius hath placed, and which L. Hortensius still practiceth (both Pretors of Rome) the same neither have been nor are committed and done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge fo of it, that knoweth how they levered war upon King Perseus and his father Philip before him for to enchaintie Greece and set it at liberty; and not that their allies and friends should thus hardly be intreated by their Magistrates and Governors sent from hence? Write therefore they would unto L. Hortensius the Pretor, to let him understand, that the Senate is not well pleased with these pranks of his which the Chalcidians complain of. Also if any free-born persons were become thrall and bound, that with all convenient speed he should take order to leek them up and restore them again to their former freedom. Last of all, that they deemed it meet and reason, that no officer or mariner, but only the masters of ships should be lodged and entertained in your hovels. And there the contents of the letters written unto Hortensius, by commandment from the Senate. Unto the Embassadors these were gifts sent, to every one of them as came to 2000 Asles. At for Micion, he was allowed his carriage in charitors at the charges of the City, and order given that he should with all ease ride in them to Brundisium. As for C. Lucertius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribuns commended an action against him before the people, to be done at a million of Asles. And in a general assembly and Seffion holden for this purpose, cast he was and condemned by the suffrages of all the tribes, thirty five and no fewer.

In Liguria no memorable exploit was that year performed: for neither the enemies entered into arms, nor the Conful led his legions into their country; and when he was allured of peace for that year, he discharged the soldiers of two Roman legions, within 60 days after his first coming into the Province. As for the army of the Latin allies, he brought it early into the Cities of Latium and Pisa there to winter: and then himself with the cavalry visited most of the Cities in the Province of Gaul.

In no place was there any war but in Macedonia: howbeit they had in fulfillment Genius and the King of the Illyrians, Therefore the Senate ordained to send from Brundisium eight ships ready rigged and fully manned, unto the Lieutenant C. Furnius an Ifar, who was Governor of the land with the guard and strength of two Ifean Vessels; which were put abroad and shipped 3000 soldiers, which Q. Mucius the Pretor by a warrant directed out of the Senate, enrolled in that quarter of Italy which lieth opposite to Illyricum. In like manner the Conful Hostilius sent

Appius Claudius into Illyricum with four thousand footmen, for to defend the people in those parts: who not content with those forces of his own which he had brought with him thither, demanded here and there aids and succours of the allies, until he had put in arms eight thousand men of divers and sundry nations. And after he had made his progress through all that region he set him down and ended at Lichidum a City of the Daffacicians. Not far from thence there stood a frontier Town called Ufana, and for the most part ranged under the obedience of Perge. These were within it one thousand citizens, and a small garrison of Cretesians for their better safeguard and defence. From thence there came to Claudius secret couriers, advising him, that if he would approach nearer with his army, there would be some ready at hand to betray the Town into his hands: and worth the adventure it was (say they) and would quit for all the pains: for able it was with pilgrimage not himself and his friends only, but also all his followers. I hope of this cheat, sitting to well his covetous humour, to blinded his spirit and understanding, that he had not the lense to keep with him any one of those couriers that came unto him, nor the wifedom to demand holocausts for alacrity of his enterprise which was to be accomplished by health and fraud, nor yet the forecast to lead out fowts and Turkeys, or to much reason and mother wise to acquire their oath and bond of faithful promise. Only at the day appointed he departed from Lichidum, and within twelve miles of that City toward which he went, he encamped. Then by night at the relief of the fourth watch he removed and set forward, leaving behind him a regiment of a thousand, for the guard of the camp. As long as the City they came, deliberated in a long train, marshing nothing close, but at a distance, one from another and scattered, by reason, that in the night reason went many of them out of the way. This negligence of theirs was the more, when they saw no man approaching upon the walls: but so soon as they were approached within a dark cave, the inhabitants filled forth with noise and confusion, and together with the front of them that filled forth, a mighty noise and outcry besides arose from the walls of women howling, yelling, and ringing broken plates and bells on every hand; besides, the combined multitude of the base people and bond-slaves together, set up much hideous and difdama cries. These manifold terrified from all sides, the people of that City could not abide and stand out the first tempt and violent storm, as it were, of their fury and charges. Down went therefore and were slain more in flight than fight: and scarce 4000 men with the Lieutenant himself escaped and recovered the camp: for the longer way they had thither, the more means and opportunity had the enemy to chase and overtake a greater number of them, wearied as they were upon the way. Appius not on the day long in the camp, until he had rallied those that were dispersed in the town, which had been the only way to have saved those that were fragel in the fields, but immediately retired with the broken relics of his army after this overthrow toward Lycidium. This insolvency and such other like misfortune happening in Macedonia were made known at Rome by occasion of Sext, Digitus, and L. Colonistus, which was returned home for to celebrate a solemn sacrifice. In regard whereof the LL. of the Senate fearing to receive some greater ignominy and dishonor addressed Embassadors into Macedonia, M. Fulvius Flaccus and M. Caecinius Rubulus, to make a true report upon their knowledge how the world went there. Allo that A. Hesilius the Consul should publish the assembly for the election of Conuls, so as it might be held in the mouth of Tana: and then repair himself with all convenient speech to the City. In the mean time M. Recius the Presor had in charge, by virtue of an edict, to call home into the City all Senators from every quarter of Italy, unless such as were absent about the affairs of the state; also give them the first warning to them who now were at Rome, not to absent themselves farther than mile from the City. These things were done according to the advice of the Senate. So the grand assembly for the election of the Conuls, was held on the 28 day of August: whereof were created Conuls Q. Martius Philippus the second time and Q. Servilius Capito. Three days after the Presor also were chosen, namely, Cais Decimius, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Spurius Gallus, C. Marius at Figulus, Sca. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Fannius Capito. Unto these Presor elected besides the two charges within the City of civil jurisdiction, these four provinces and governments were assigned to the Senate. Spain, Sardina, Sicilia, and the admirality of the navy.

At the very end of February, the Embassadors afoaid returned out of Macedonia: who recommed the 323 the architected by Perce and the summer past, and in how great fear the allies of the people of Rome fled, after to many Cities reduced under the obedience of the King. Moreover, that the Conul his army was disturbed of men, by reason to many of them made friends to be discharged, and to further their had their pas-port and were dismissed: the fault here in, the Conul laid upon the military tribunes or Colonels, and they again upon him. The LL. of the Senate perceived well that they made but light of the shameful fell received by the inconsiderate ratheens of Claudius in saying, that there were many few soldiers left of the Italian nation, and thace for the most part taken up in war and enrolled on a fudder. The Conuls electo soon as they entered into their magistracy, were commanded to proceed unto the Senate concerning the Province of Macedonia, and to them were assigned the government of that land. This year was leap-year and the third day after the 25th of February, was the day inferred between, which hapned upon the calender of March. Within the compass of that year certain Priests to wit, L. Flaminius, and two Pontiffs, or Bishops, L. Furius Philus, and C. Livius Salinator, departed this life. The college of the Pontiffs, elected T. Marinius Terentianus in head of Furius, and Marcus Servilius in the room of Livius.
A In the beginning of the year next following, after that the new Coif, Q. Marcius and Q. Sertorius, had moved in the Senate as touching their provinces, advised it was, That with all speed possible they should either agree between themselves, or else call for the governments in Africa and in Macedon. And before that the lots determined this matter so doubtful and uncertain, to the end that nothing afterwards should be done for favour partially, thought good it was, to ordain before hand a competent and sufficient number of soldiers for the supplementation of the armies in both Provinces: namely, for Macedon 6000 footmen of Romans, and as many of Lateine allies; 500 horsemen Romans, and 300 allies: also to cast the old soldiers, so as in every Roman legion there should not be above 6000 foot and 300 horse. As for the other Confi, he was not gaged with any certain flant of Roman citizens, to be leis for the full accomplishment of his legions.

B Only this was determinably set down, That he should enrol two legions, and either of them containing 2400 foot and 200 horse: but for footmen of Latins, he had a greater number allowed than his colleague: namely, 10000 foot and 600 horse. Moreover, commandment was given to enrol four legions more, to be led forth into the field, upon what need and occasion should fall out. The Marshal-Colonels of the army the Confi might not be permitted to elect, but created they were, by the people. The allies of the Lateine nation were enjoined to set out for their sixteen thousand foot and a thousand horse. And this power was only to be in readiness at six hours warning, for to be led forth as occasion should be ordered. Their principal care was about Macedon. Ordained also it was, That for the service at Sea, there should be enrolled to serve the navy, of the Roman citizens (such as were libertins and newly enfranched) out of all parts of Italy. If by one thousand, and as many out of Sicily. And into whether of the Confi the Province of Macedon fell, he should give order for their transporting thither, to the armado wherefore it was, For Spain, there were three thousand Roman footmen and three hundred horsemen appointed to make up the decayed bands. There also, a certain number was set down for every legion, to wit, five thousand foot and three hundred and thirty horse. Moreover, that Confi whose lot was to govern in Spain, had commission to 77. of the allies four thousand footmen, and three hundred horse.

I am not ignorant, that from the same profane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly men now adays are of belief, that the Gods portend and fore-signify nothing to come by figns and tokens; it proceedeth also, That no prodigies which happen, should any more, either be published and reported abroad, or recorded in the annals and chronicles. Howbeit, for mine own part, in writing of these acts and monuments of ancient times, I know not now but me thinks I say a mind, that is become (as it were) antique. Also, yea, and some insipid devotion ariseth in my spirit, which moveth me to account the things not unworthy to have place in my histories, which those sage fathers and most prudent personages in old time thought meet to be considered by the State, yea, and to require public expiation. Well to proceed from Amago there were two fearful fights reported that year, namely. That astonishing and blazing flame was seen in the skies, and a cow known to speak, kept and nourished at the publick charges. At Marenus much about those daies, the weal Think seemed to be on a light fire. At Riece there fell a shower that rained fones. In the fortsres at Claret the image of Apollo werp three daies and three nights continually. In the City of Rome, two sextons or keepers of the Temples made report, the one, That in the Church of Fortune there was seen by many men, crept with a mane the other. That about the chappell of Fortune, which standeth upon the Capitol hill there happed two divers and different prodigous signs, namely. That in the Chappell-yard there sprung up a palm-tree, and all one day it rained blood. Two other strange things there were, whereof there was no regard nor account made of the first, because it chanced in a private place; for T. Marcius Flaccus reported, That there grew up a palm or date-tree in his court-yard: the second because it hapned in a forest place: for spoken it was, That at Frugella in the house of M. Arrius, a lance or spear which he had bought for his son a fouldier, burned in the day time for two hours space and more yerefo, as the fire confirmed nothing thereof. In regard of these publick prodigies, the Decemvirs had recourse to the books of Sibylla: who out of them declared, That the Consi should sacrifice forty head of greater beasts, and they shewed also to what Gods, They added moreover and gave advice to hold a publick procession, and that all the Magistrats at every shrine and upon every altar of the Gods should sacrifice greater beasts, and the people wear garlands and chaplets of flowers. All things were executed accordingly, as the Decemvirs suggested and directed.

After this, the assembly was published for the chusing of Censors. In election there were for this dignity of Censorship, the very principal persons and of best note in all the City, C. Valerius Leansius, L. Porcinius Albinius, P. Marcius Scipio, C. Junius Brutus, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Trib. Sempironius Gracchus. These two last reheared the people of Rome chose for Censors. When as by occasion of the Macedonian war, a greater care was had about the taking of matters, than at other times before, the Consi found much fault with the common people, and complained unto the Senate, that the young and able men for service being called would not answer to their names, But, C. Sulpicius and M. Claudius two Tribunes of the Commons, maintained the cause against them in the behalf of the Commons, saying, That it was no hard and difficult matter for Consi to levy soldiers: many, for corrupt affectations and popular Consi, it was not so easy a thing, and namely, such as would be fure to enrol no soldiers against their wills. And to the end that the LL. of the Senate might know this to be a truth, they should see the Pretors (if the Senate were

* The civil Pretors within the City were allowed but two Lidirs, and the provincial abroad inforain parts not above fix apiece, whereupon Pobius called a Vctor ever the made it known, and protected in the full assembly of the people, that they would publish an act, as touching the review and estimate of every mans demeanour and hability, that besides the ordinary oath of all citizens, they should swear to these points in this form following: Act thou under six and forty years of age? then by virtue of the edict made by the Cenors C. Claudio and Tib. Sempowruni, come forth and shew thyself at the冒出 tos so often as there shall be any levy taken: and what Cenors ever shall happen to be in place, thou shall appear and be enrolled; in case thou were not a prette soldier before. Moreover, because the voice were, that many soldiers of the Macedonian legions were absent from the army, and had obtained large papsters without limitation of return, and that through the corruption and favour of the Generals, they published an edict as touching the soldiers enrolled for Macedow when P. Fieonius and C. Pollius were Con- fuls, or any time after. That as many of them as remained within theps, after they were enrolled and registred full under their hands, shoul within thirty days repair again to their colours into the province: and whoever of them were at the disposition of father or grandfater, their names should be preferred and declared before them. Semblably, they would take knowledge of their causes who were clean dismissed and called: and look whomsoever they judged to have obtained their discharge by any special grace and favour, before they had served out their full time by law, and if they thought they would command them to be enrolled soldiers again. By virtue of this edict of the Cenors as also by their letters sent out and divulged abroad in all incorporat Towns and places of resit for market and merchandize, there assembled together and came to Rome such a multitude of lively, young, and able men, that their usual and extraordinary number was chargeable and cumbersome to the City. Thus besides the former levy taken of those that were to be sent and employed in supply of the old armies, four legions more were enrolled by C. Sulpius the Preor, and within eleven days the mutters were accomplished and ended.

Then the Conuls called for their provinces. For the Pretors had their governments allotted unto them before, and the sooner, by reason of the civil causes which required their juridictions. The one over the citizens was falling to C. Sulpius, the other over访urers to C. Decimus. M. Claudio and M. Murerus obtained the regiment of Spain, C. Ferieius and C. Cornulfus the legions of Italy, to C. Martius the other of Macedow. This Martius so soon as the Latine sellots were solemnized, departed toward his province immediately. After this, upon the motion of Capo to the Senat to know their pleasure, which two legions of the new he should conduct into Gaul? the LL. ordained; That the Preors C. Sulpius and M. Claudio should give unto the Conuls, which it pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This he took to the heart, that he a Conuls was thus subjected to the will of the Preors; yet after the Senat was riven, he flood walking at the Tribunal of the Preors, and required them according to the order let down by the Senat to assign him his two legions. But the Preors submitted the choice thereunto to the Col, himself. This done, the Conuls took a review of the Senat and chose new Senators and M. Sempronius Lepidus was elected president of the Senat; and there were the third Senators who made choice of him consequently one after another. Seven were dispersed and deposited from their Senators dignity. Now in taking the number of the people, and in allfessing them, they compelled to return into Macedow those who were departed from the army there: and by means of this affliction, they soon knew who were able from their companies they examined them for what causes they were discharged from fouldery; and whose licence they judged not to be grounded of good and sufficient reason those forced to take the military oath again in this manner and form: According to the edict of C. Claudio and Tib. Sempowruni the Conuls, thou shalt well and truly swear, to return willingly and with all thine heart, into the province of Macedow: and this ye shall do to thy power without fraud or covin. In making the review of them that served on horseback their cenure was executed with great rigour and extremity. They took from many their horses of service: upon which occasion having given offence to the whole estate of Knights and Gentlemen of Rome, they blew the caws and kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against themselves: by a certain edict of theirs besides, whereby they intimated, that none of them who in time that Q. Fulvius and Au. Pofhumius the Conuls had taken to form the revenues, fruits and profits of the City, or undertaken at a price the public works and provisions, should be so hardy as to present themselves to their service, either to be farmers or under-takers, no, nor to be partners, or have any thing to do with those that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicians and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senat: but when they could obtain no comfort from them, to moderate and abate this infinite power of the Conuls, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Rutilis, to stand with them and defend their cause: a man who upon a particular and private quarrel of his own was offended and bare a grudge against the Conuls. And this was the occasion: They had commanded one of his late vaillants and enshipping retainers to pull down a wall standing in the street Sacred over against a publick edifice: pretending that the said wall was built upon the City ground. The man a private person, called unto the A the Tribuns for their lawful help and favour: but when as none of them all but only this Rutilius would meddle in the matter and interpose their helping hand, the Centors lent to strain and take gages for to bind him to answer the cause, and before the body of the people intended an action against him, and set a grievous fine upon the head of that party aforesaid. By means lay of this debate begun upon such occasion, when as the old publicans betook themselves for sucourt to this Tribune presently there was a bill preferred and subjudi rubed with the name of the said Tribune alone, in this form. That what publick revenues and provis of the State, C. Claudius and T. Sempronius had to farm let for a rent, or what publick works and provisions they had put out to be made and purveyd at a price, the same leaves and bargains should not and had good but be cancelled, and new demies drawn and made. Also that it might be lawfull for all men indifferently either to be farmers or undertakers of the premisses. And the said Tribune affigned a day for a general assembly and election, to have this bill to be call by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Centors advanced and put themselves forward to dissuade and plead against the bill. So long as Gracchus spake, he was heard with patience and silence. But at Claudius, when he opened his mouth, they hisled and kept an muttering, lo as he was forced by an aites made by the Tribune to procure audience: which being made, the Tribune found himself grieved and complained, that the people there assembled were withdrawn and called away from him, to the prejudice of his authority and honour, and with that flung out of the Capitol where this assembly was holden. The next day he kept a great coil and made a toulitair: first, he interdicted the goods of Tib. Gracchus as condemned and accurd, for that in letting a fine, and bering gages of him, C. had he appeased to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condlockd to his opposition, he seemed to set light by his Tribunes authority, and prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius, he arrested him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawn the assembly from him: may. he professed that he would indite both the Centors of treason or felony in the highest degree, and required of Sulpicius Prefor for the citizens, a day of aites for their judicial trial. The Centors refused not to have this matter put to an issue with all speed, and to be tried by the doom of the people. So the time to the hearing and determining of this baimous crime of majesty or treason aforesaid, was affigned the * dates immediately before and between the caland of October. Upon this, the Centors intermendly ascended into the Portico of Liberty, where after they had made sure and sealed the publick Registers and Records, shut up and locked all the offices of the Chancery, and discharged for the time the publick Clerks and prono-Notaries attending upon that Court, they proceed that they would not go in hand with any pubb kaffairs of state, before the sentence and judgment of the people were passed upon them. The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his own cause and spake for himself: and when of twelve Centors that were of Gentlemen, eight had found the Centors guilty and cast him, yea, and many other peoples of the first Classis. Then presently, the principal persons of the City in the very light of the peoples, changed their weeds, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manner, to crave the common good to be good to the Centors. But tht which most of all either laid or restored the definitive doom against him, was (by report) Tib. Gracchus himself the other Centor: for that when the commons cries from all parts, that there was no danger growing toward Gracchus, he wrote by express words, That if his colleague were condemned, he woud (without attending the people of the publick accompani him into banishment, Howbeit the defendant and accused person, was driven to this mine point and hard exigent of extremity, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned. Thus when Claudius was acquit, the Tribune said he would not trouble and molest Gracchus.

This year at the earnest suit of the Aquillean Embassadors into the Senat. for to have the number of their colonies encreased: a thousand and five hundred families (by virtue of a decree granted out of the Senate) were entolled: and for the conducting of them to aquilon, were sent as Triumvirs or commissioners the three, to wit, T. Annon. Lacco, P. Decius Subkle, and C. Cor

Felimus Cethegus. The same year C. Poppius and Cn. Octavius Embassadors, who had been sent into Greece, having first read and publificated at Thera the arid ordinance of the Senate, carried it afterwards throughout all the Cities of Peloponnesus to this effect. That no person should contribute toward the war, and put into the hands of the Roman Magistrates, more than that which the Senat had let down. This put them in good hope and assurance for the future time that they should be eased of those charges and expenses, by which they were impoverished and walled, whiles every one impoused upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose. In the Achaean general council holden at Argos, they had audience given them and were heard in grauci-ous fort: from when, leaving this most loyal and faithful nation in agnugia: good hope of happy estate for the time to come, they passed into Aetolia. There was as yet no sedition broken out there: but all were in jealousy and suspicion one of another, and full of natural ac��inations in regard of which jars and troubles, the Embassadors only demanded hostages, and without any other end made, went directly into Acaanania. The Acarnians grained unto these Embassadors a Diet to be holden at Tyrrheum: where some debate was between the partakers of divers faction. Some principal men of the States required that there should be gatherings received into their Cities, to bridle the wilfull folly of those that enlinded to the Macedonian nation: others gainst this course, and besought the contrary, for fear lest that peaceable and confederat Cities should be put to receive that disgrace and dishonor, which usually follow upon H known enemies and those that are conquered by force of arms, And this requet was repated juf.
Then the Embassadors returned to Laus a unto Ambroceu the Pro-confid, for from him they were empoited in embassage. Oliviaus he retained fill with him: but Popilius together with a 1000 foaldiars or very near, he fent to Ambroceu, there to lodge for the winter time.

Persius in the beginning of winter durst not go forth of the frontiers of Macedon, for fear lest the Romans would invade with violence his realm in some place or other, if they found it void and dilfurnished. But toward the mids of December about mid-winter, when by reason of the depth now the mountains are unpaflable and unfortifiable from out of Thessaly, thinking he had then a fit fefon and opportunity to cut off the hopes and break the hearts of the neighbor-borderers, that when he should be avettet another way and baffed in the Roman war, he might be fecure of danger from them: confidering that from the parts of Thessaly he had peace with Cypcis, likewise from Epirus hide (by the means of Cephons, who luddinly of late was re-tored from the Romans:) moreover having newly vanquished the Dardanians in war; and feeing only that quarter to infet and annoy Macedon, which regarded and athonthed Ieonian; and that those Illyrians also were not quiet and at peace, but ready to give extrance unto the Romans: but if he had indued and armed those Illyrians which were next unto him, then King Gentius also, who a long time hung between in doubtful terms, might be induced & drawn wholly into society with him: he refolved at length, and with ten thousand footmen heavily armed, whereof part were Phalanges, and other two thousand lightly appointed and five hundred horse, he made a rode and presented his forces before Sinope: from whence after he had provided him of corn to serve for many days, and given order that the ordnance and engines of battery should follow afters: at the third days end he loded neet Ithaca, the head City of all that Land Penetria. But beforfe that he offered any affault, he lent certain of purpose to found and dilficit the afeceptions, one while of the Captains of the garrifion, and another while of the Townmen. Now there lay within the City, together with the manhood and youth of the Illyrians, a garrifion also of the Romans. And when he faw that they brought no news of any peaceable dealing from thence, he began to bend his forces against them, and affaid to invent them round about, and to force the City.
And albeit both night and day without any Reid and interruption, they prefled upon the inhabitants, and evermore one succeeded another: whiles terme rear'd ladders against the walls, others threw balls of fire against the gates, yet the defendants of the City held out and endured that furious and violent tempet: because they hoped that neither the Macedonians lying abroad were able any long time to endure the rigor of the cold winter; nor the King on the other side could have too much releafe and relaxation from the Roman war, as to play there and make his abode. But after they perceived once the mantillets approach, and the frames of torches and fabrics erected their perifhan was over-marched & they began to relent. For besides that in plain force they were the weaker and not able to refet dilferted alfo they were for want of corn, neither had they store of any other provision, as being taken on a huffian, and looking for nothing lefs than fiege at fuch a time of the year. Therefore when they were put all hope to be able any longer to refist. C. Avienius Scipionius and C. Afranius were fent from the Roman garrifion, to crave or Persius fill that he would permit them to deparit in their arms, and to carry with them their bag M baggage: fcondily, if they might not obtain so much, that he would but give them affurance of life and libertie. The King was more free and liberal to promise, than fett and faithful to perform.
For after he had commanded them to go forth and carry with them all that was their own: the free thing that he did was to difarme them and take away their weapons.

They were not foone departed out of the Town, but both the company of the Illyrians, to the number of 500 men, and also the inhabitants of Ithaca remitted themfelves and their City. Persius when he had put a garrifion in Ithaca, led away the whole multitude of the yielded Town-men (and thole were well-near as many in number as his own army) and transported them to Stiturra: where, after he had fent the Romans (all besides their Captains) who were 4000 fighting men, into fundry cities to be kept in ward, and fold the Tarentians and Illyrians he led his army back into Pe-rifia, intending to be matter of Oranum, a Town feated otherwife commodiously, and until that is the key and high way that openeth passagio into the country of the Labeas, within the bounds of the King Gentius, and where he kept his royal state. As he paifed by a strong be-grong-Town well inhabited, named Draudum can, one about him that was well acquainted with the coasts of that country put into his head, that better it was and to no puro to win Oranum, unles he had Draudum all in his hands, as being a Town fitte more commodiously in all respects. Whereupon he advanced forward, and took Draudum ever he prefled his army before it, inconvenience all the inhabitants submitted and yeelded. Being mun. animated and enraged with this surrender of theirs, which they made far sooner than he hoped or looked for; after that he perceived how terrible this redoubled army of his was, all the way as he marched he brought under his subjection eleven other Citie and strong holds, upon the like fear that they were put into. Violence he used against very few of them: the rest yeelded willingly: wherein were taken 1500 Roman foaldiars, placed there in severall garrifions. In general hand and very good use the Car. Avienius Scipionius in all their pathes, who evermore gave it out that there had been no qualty nor rigor exercised upon them and his fellows. At length the King came before Oranum, which could not possibly be won with a fee and full fiege. For the Town had far more youth and able
A man within it then the left, was fortified with a strong wall about it, and defended of the one side with the river called Aratus, and of the other with an exceeding high hill, and the fame of hard and difficult ascent. All these things considered, the townsmen were in good hope to be able for to make resistance. Perseus, having entrenched the town and cast a rampier round about it, began likewise to raise a terrace & mount from the upper part thereof, so that height as might sufformt and over-top the walls, But during the time that this piece of work was in hand and brought to perfection, a great number of the inhabitants within were consumed by divers and sundry adventures, whereas they skirmished out and fell in, desiring both to defend their own walls, and also to empacl the fabric and devies of their enemies. And those that remained alive, what with toilsome labour night and day, and what with many a wound, were past all service and good for nothing. So soon as the terrace and mount were laid was situated on the wall, both the Kings cohort (whom they call Nicatores) mounted up into it, and also with ladders the allay was given unto the City in many places at once. All that were above fourteen years old he put to the sword: their wives and small children he cast into prison. The rest of the booty and pillage fell to the forterers share. As he returned from thence with victors to Sitikera, he lent as Embassadors unto Genus, Mentor the Illyrian (a banished person who sojourned with him), and Antunus a capt. of Berisia. Them he brought to him, that he might declare unto Genius, what he had achieved against the Romans and Dardanians the summer past, together with the late exploits performed in that winter expedition; and withal to persuade the K. for to be heir in and with the Macedonians as. Thee Embassadors having tramvomnted the top of the hill Sevran and traversed the wilds and woods of Illyricum, which the Macedonians of purpose had laid waste and defert, to the end, that the Dardanians might have no easy passage either into Illyricum or Macedon after much pain and travel they arrived in the end at Strada. Now was K. Genius at Lippas, and thither were the Embassadors sent for, where they declared their message with gracious audaces: but they went away with an answer to no effect; namely, that he wanted no will, and his heart was good enough to war upon the Romans: but his soldiers were empty, and he lacked money especially, to go in hand and enterprize that which he desired. This answer they related unto King Perseus at Sitikera, at what time as he was most base intolling of his captives taken in Illyricum. Then forthwith the same Embassadors addressed again unto him, accompanied with Glanias one of the Kings guard and squires of his body, without any mention made of money, and that was the only means to induce the bare and needy Barbarous Prince to levy war. After this, Perseus rankened the City Asopus, and once again reduced his army into Peloponnes country, and having strengthened the forces in Scas and, in all the forces at home, he returned into Macedon.

L. Callius a Roman Lieutenant, lay in guard for the defence and rule of Illyricum, who durst not as long as King Perseus was in those quarters: but in the end after his departure, he endeavoured to recover the Scas in the Peloponnes country, but was repulsed from thence by the garrisons of the Macedonians there: and carried away nothing but many spy knock and bloody wound: & to retired with his foresse Lychnidas : from whence, some few days after he sent M. Fabrirus Pregeollum into the Peloponnes country, with a strong power, for to receive hostages of those Citieis which faithfully had perished in amity & friendship. He commanded him also to go to ward the Partins (for they likewise had covenanted to put in pledges) for that of both these nations the said hostages might be gotten without any fear and trouble. The hostages of the Peloponnes were sent to Apollonia: but those of the Partins to Dyrrhachium, which in those days was more strictly called by the Greeks Epidamnus.

App. Claudius, desirous to safe out the blemish and make amends for the dishonour received in Illyricum, let in hand to assault Thassus a port of Epyrus, having brought thither with him the Thessalians and Thelphronis (over and above the Roman armi) to the number of 6000 men: but he got nothing there but travell for his paines, by reason that the place was valiantly defended by Cleuss: left there with a strong garrioll by K. Perseus, Perseus likewise made expedition to Elymnes, left there after he had taken a solemn survey of his army about it, he conducted his power to Stratus as the sequel of the Epictis This Stratus then, was the strongest City of Illyria. Situat it is upon the bank of Ambrosa, near the river Arachthus, he advanced his therewith to not above 300 spent of them the took the fewer with him in number, by reason of the length passage and rugged waves. Being come at the third days end to far as to the mount Cirrus, from he had with much difficulty crossed over it, the now they to deep, that hardly and with much ado he could find a convenient place to encamp in. From thence he removed, more for that he could not there abide and remain, then for any intolerable way and weather he met withall in the difficult march and journey forward to with passing great travel and troubl of his beastly necessary, the second day he arrived at the temple of Jupiter called Eleusis, and there lodges. Then after he had taken an exceeding long journey, he abode at the river Arachthus, being halted thereby reason of the deep water: during which time, he made a bridgover and transported his forces; and when he was gone a daies journey onward, he encountered on the way Arachthus a principal person of the Thessalians, by whose means the city yet Stratus was to be delivered up unto him: And that day he lodged upon the frontiers of Arachthus; from whence new marow he journeyed as far as to Stratus, where having encamped near the river Arachthus, he looked that the Thessalians would run out unto him by heart at all their gates, to yeild themsevles to his protection: but in Ulfius Manlius Philippine passing? through wilde and woods, entered into Macedonu and surprized many Cities. The Rhodians sent Embassadors to Rome, there being in Rome, Persus, not left. The people of Rome would conclude peace and contrite amity with him: whereas was taken great Jear and disdain. Now when the charge of this war was committed to L. Aemius Paulus the Consul, the next year following, Paulus before the publick assembly of the people prayed unto the gods, that all insolvency and misfortune coming towards the people of Rome, might be

The four and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

In the beginning of that Spring which immediately followed the winter wherein these events happened, Q. Marius Philippus the Consul came to Brundisium with five thousand men, whom he intended to transport over the seas for the supply of his legions. And M. Popilius (one who had been Consil) and other brave gallants of noble parentage as well as himself, followed after the Consul to be martial Tribune in the Macedonian legions. Also about the same time C. Magnus Figulus the Pretor, and Admiral of the navy, repaired to Brundisium. Who weighing anchor, looked to sea from Italy together, and arrived the next day at Corbus; but the Pretor having doubled the point of Lentus, entered the gulf of Comiae leaving his vessels at Comiae jorneled likewise by land to Corbus unto the land forces, making such expedition that he crossed through the midst of Brundisium in one day. At the same time A. Hostilius lay encamped in Tresflay, near to Palepخارat. Who albeit he had performed no memorable exploit of warlike feats, yet he had reclaimed his followers from all licentious looting, where with they were corrupted, and ranged them within good order of discipline. Also by his faithful course in government, he had entertained and kept the love of the allies still, yea, and protected them from all manner of wrong and injury. Now when he was apprised of the arrival of his face, he assembled with all diligence his forces both men and horses; gathered together all armor, as well offensive as defensive; and so with a brave army well appointed, he went forth to meet the Consul upon the way. As their first encounter and meeting was honorable, and beholding as well their own reputation as the greatness of the Roman name, so for the managing of the affairs afterward [it was very expedient to the Consul Philip. For the pro consuls turning to his own army, exercised the soldiers to perform valiant service; and so when he had delivered it to the Consul, returned to Rome.] Some few days after, the Consul made an occasion in a solemn audience of all his followers. Wherein first he began with the patronage of Perius, committed upon the person of his own brother, but projected against his very father. Then he proceeded farther and declared the wicked and dastardly ways whereby he attained to the crown, also his practices of poisons, his bloody murders, he laid away for King Ennius his life by way of detestable brigandage and robbery; moreover, the injuries offered to the people of Rome, and lacking of afflictive cities against the covetous of Rome. All which dealings of his he should have onid: (quand ce) by the name of his affairs, how odious and cruel they are in the sight also of the immortal gods. For the gods are evermore favourable and gracious to piety and fidelity, the only means whereby the people of Rome is mounted to that pitch and height of felicity. Then he compared the forces of that State which already compassed the round world, with the strength of Macedonia; he let arables to armies, making remonstrances how far greater was the patience of Philip and Antiochus before; and yet was it defeated utterly by no greater power then the Romans now were able to show. Having thus enkindled and enflamed the courage of his followers by this manner of exhortation, he began to debate in council as touching the principal and main point of the whole war. And thither retired without him from Chalced, the Pretor C. Marcius; after he had taken the charge of the armado and sea-fores. Resolved it was and concluded to make no longer abide in Tresflay, and there to lose time, but presently to dilodge and remove directly into Macedonia; that the pretor also should endeavour and catch, how one and the self same time he might inter and annoy the forces of the enemies. Now after that the Pretor was dismissed from away, the Consul commanded his soldiers to bring every man with him provision for a month: and to the tenth day after he had received the conveyance of the army, he removed the camp and let forward. When he had gone a days journey, he called together the guards, and alter he had commanded them every one to declare before the Council there assembled, which way each of them intended to direct the army, he caused them to go and so the Consul was in counsel, which course to take above others... Some were of opinion to lead by the way of Pythias; others advised to pass over the Cambrian mountains, like as the year before Hostilius the Consul conducted his army; and there were those who gave advice to go nearer to the moor of Aenaria. Now therefore remained yet some part behind of the way, which lay indifferent flat and common to all those places; and therefore their contemplation of this point was put over to the time when they should encamp next to the pasting and division of the said ways. So from thence he led the army to Ferroabia, and sent him down between Aenaria and Delische, for to consult once again for all, which way to take.
The same time Perseus knowing that the enemy approached, but yet ignorant which way he meant to come, determined to beate all pasages with strong guards. Whereupon he lent ten thousand young and lusty men, and men armed, to the pitch of the Cannoabrum hill, which the inhabitants themselves call Polis from the concourse of captains, assembled. But he commanded Hippias with a power of twelve thousand Macedonians to fort the firetiges of a certain fort upon the north Africus, and called Lopatins. Himself in person accompanied with the rest of the forces, lodged his men to Dium: but after wards seeming as if he were unprovided of counsel and void of sense and understanding, he with his light horsemen made several and various ambigions among the stand, while one toward Thessalia, and others to Phila, and so backward again the same way to Dium. In this mean time the Conulit resolved fully to lead his army by that part where we said before that the army of King Philip, had sometimes nearer a place called Dium, as he thought good to lend out before four thousand armed men, for to prevent the enemies and be possessed half of the most commodious places of advantage: this regiment was commanded by M. Cleopatras and Q. Maratus, the Condelions, and incommemrantly all the rest of his army followed after. But the way was steep and difficult, through many rugged, that in two days space, they which went before, albeit they were not charged with the carriage of anything, had much ado to march fifteen miles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choice of was called the Tower Embro. From whence the morrow after they journeyed seven miles forward and feized a hill nor far from the enemies camp, where they dispatched a courier back to the Conulit to give intelligence that they were come near to the enemy, and were in a place of safety commodious also for all purposes; and withall to advise him for to make all possible speed after for to overtake them and join together. This messenger encountered with Conulit at the near Ateria, where he was greatly perplexed as well for the difficulty of the way which he was in as well as as to regard of the danger of them whom in to few number he had before, even through the midst of the enemies corps de guard. Whereupon he took a better heart to himself, and having united all his forces, encamped upon the foresaid hill where his men were held, on the side which considering the nature of the ground, was most commodious. And there they might discover within the view of eye, not only the enemies camp distant from thence a little above two miles, but also the whole country as far as to Dium and Phileas, and all the inmost coasts, by reason that the high pitch and top of the mountain yielded a prospect far and near round about. And this was it that set on fire the forebodings hearts, when they beheld the whole weight of the war, the Kings forces altogether, and the enemies country to fence with. In which spirit of circumspection, when they were encamp'd with the Conulit, and expected him to advance directly against the enemies camp, they had but one day granted them to rett after their wearisome journey. So upon the third day the Conulit leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, led the rest against the enemy. Now had Hippias been lately lent from the King to keep and guard the passage, who since the time that full he riop the Roman camp upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battle, and so encountered the army of the Conulit, and met it half way. The Romans advanced forth to fight, nimbly appointed; and the enemies like wise were highly armed, and by reason thereof molt fit and provided for to give the charge and begin a skirmish. So soon as they approached and encountered one another, presently they fell to inquiring of their darts on both sides. Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their first charging at a man, and few of both sides were slain. Thus were their Iromarks whetted and edged against the morrow, and then had they skirmishes, and maintained fight with greater forces, and more deadly feud, if the ground would have served them to have disposed their battalions at large; for the top of the mountain was a high and steep to a sharp crest in form of a coin or whey, and hardly afforded room enough for three ranks of armed men to stand, and therefore when some few were in fight, all the rest and specially they that were heavily armed, stood as lookers on. As for the fight, arm of one part, they would run forth as the broken edges of the hill, and ever from the sides join battle with the like of the other pane, and find means to charge the enemy; and if they be one or uneven, it skill not whether. But after that more that day, no were wounded then killed, the night at length parted the day. The third day, the Roman Generall was to ferland and will not what to do; for neither could they lay any longer upon that hill, for worst of all times; and retire back from thence it was not possible,without dishonour and danger both. Moreover, if he had retired, the enemy might precede him from the upper ground with advantage. There remained therefore no other means tomed that which was the sustainably entifered, with assidulity & harry periliss in execution; a thing that otherwisethrows well in the end, as it is proceeded from wise and deliberate counsel. And verily to this hard pass and difficult turns they were come, that if the Conulit had been to deal with an enemy like to sich of the Macedonian Kings in old time, they might have received a great blow and overthrow. But K. Perseus as he coiled and ranged with his cavalry, upon the stand, near Dium (albeit for the space of 12 miles or there, he made the cries and sights of them that were in fight, neither reenforced the companies by lending fresh soldiers in place of the wearis, not howing him self in person at the battle; as thich had been a thing for shame of most importance) whereas the Roman Generall being above 60 years of age, corpulent besides soundly performed himself right lustily all military services of a valiant warrior, perilling in that to the very end most bravely, which he had begun and enterprised so boldly and and having left Ploplins & to guard the hill top, passed over places that had no roads at all to direct them, by sending out before, certain men of purpose to scour and prepare to make a passage. As for Arialus and Milage, he commanded them both, with the auxiliary soldiers of their own nation to guard them that opened the way before. Then he putting before him in the march the horsemen with baggage, came behind with the legionary footmen in the rear guard. No tongue is able to express what a toil and painful labour they found in going down the hill, the lighter horsemen with their backs and carriages stumbled to down one with another, so much as when they had scarcely gone four miles forward, they wished in their hearts nothing more, than to return the way they came, if it had been possible. The elephants troubled the march as much in manner as the enemies could: for when they were come to a place where they could see no way, down they cast their riders and governors, laying them along on the earth, and with the horrible crying that they made, affrighted their horses especially, until such time as a device was found for their passage. They began first to make the head or entrance of the bridge at the very brow and edge of a steep downsall; this done, in the lower ground beneath, they fell all in the earth good and strong walls of wood, two by two distant one from the other traverse, while little more than the largeness of one of their beaks. Upon which rested first joined: [with ten & more] certain rafters like wall-plats 30 foot in length, and those being coated with planks crosswise in form of a bridge, had earth and mud cast thereupon. A little way off beneath it, such another bridge was made, and to a third likewise, and many more consequently according as the creasy ground was broken and uneven. Now the elephants from the firm ground entred upon the first bridge aforesaid; but before he was once as far as to the foot and end thereof, the posts above them were cut in two underneath, to the end that the bridge might fall, and in the haste reeling thereof the beasts also gently slide, as it were, and he carried therewith as far as the head of the second bridge. Thus some of them glid and kept themselves standing upright on their feet, others reeled upon their buttocks. Again, when they were come to the plain and level floor of another such bridge, by the fall of it in manner aforesaid they were driven unto a third bridge beneath it, until such time as they were come to a more plain and even valley. In this order the Romans could ride little more then seven miles that day. And the least part thereof went upright on their feet, but were fast moit with a tumbling and roll over and over with the armor and harkels about them: and thus they got forward in all kind of pain and trouble, in such a fort that he who induced them to this journey & conducted them therein, could not deny but the whole army (with a small power coming against them) might utterly have been defeated. By night they arrived at a pretty plain, but the place being enclosed on all sides, they had no space and room to view round about, whether it were dangerous or no. At length after much ado and beyond their expectation, they met with a firm piece of ground, whereas they might take sure footing; and there they were forced the morrow following to attend in the hollow valley the coming of Ploplins and the companies left with him: who also were exceedingly fore vexed and plagued with the roughness of the way, albeit the enemies troubled and affrighted them no whit at all. The third day, after they had joined their forces together, they took their way through a pale, which the inhabitants call Calipence. The fourth day they passed over a place that had no more means to direct them, then the other before; but by use and experience there were grown more skillull: and better hope they had, for that the enemy in no place appeared, but approached near to the sea. When they were once come down into the plains between Haracetus and Lebeiburis, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hills) pitched their tents and took up the valley, and a good part of the plain wherein the horsemen should quarter. As the King was bating himself, it is said that word came, How the enemies were near at hand: at which news he was so fearfull, that he kept out of his bathing vessel, and in haste got him out of the same, crying aloud, Th the was vanquished without drawing sword and frase given: neither will he for fear which way to turn him, taking without dry countels one of another, and commanding he knew not what, sometime this and sometime, in this perplexity he sent for Aisleidorum (one of his two especial friends) out of the place where in garrion, to go to Pella where all his money and treasure lay: and by this means opened all the avenues for the Romans to make war. Himself, after he had had in great hale bellowes and piled up in his ships, all the gilded images at Diams, to the end the enemy should make no prize of them, caufed with all speed possible to make up and to remove to Pydna; & hereby gave occasion, that the enterprize of the Conul which might have seemed rashness (in that he had engaged himself to far, that he could not possibly to retire again without leave of the enemy) proved in the end no inconsiderat and unadvised delignment. For now the Romans had the choice of two passages through which they might escape away, the one, by Tempe into Thessaly, the other into Macedonia, by the way near Diams: both which before were held by the Kings guards. So as if a resolute and fearless captain could have held out and endured but one ten days the fairest appearance both of power that approached, the Romans could never have returned into Thessaly by Tempe, nor found way for convience of provision & victuals to the place where they were. For Tempe is of it self a difficult passage, even without any force of arms to make it dangerous. And why? besides the strait gallet five miles in length, yielding a very narrow way for one beast to go charged with burden; the rocks of either hands are so steep and upright, that hardly a man is able to look down from them, but his eyes will dazzle, his brain turn, and his head be giddy withall. Moreover, the foun and moode yes, and the depth of the river Perses running dr really through the midst of the valley, encrusted the fear to much the more. This place is perilous in its own nature, had been bold and guarded with the Kings garrisons in four several & distant places. The one kept at the very first entrance, near to Connoii, the second at Condylus, a fort impregnable; the third about Lapathus, which also they call Charax; and the fourth was placed even upon the very avenue it lies about the midst of the valley, where it is at the fence, and which may easily be defended with ten men, if there were no more. In this manner (I say) the passage being stopped up by Tempe, as well for passage of provisions this as for return from thence, the Romans must perforce have retired again up to the same mountains from whence they were defended. But as they come down and were not discovered, to be now desired, they could not possibly have gained them again in open view, considering that the enemies had posseiled the tops of the mountains; and no doubt the difficulty thereof besides, which they had tried already, would have cost all hope of that adventure to us, being wasted thus far into this rash enterprise there remaining no means else for them, but to have passed through the midst of the enemies, at Dium, for to escape and pass into Macedon: an adventure no doubt, if the gods had not bereft the King of his right wits most difficult and dangerous unto them. For it being so, that from the foot of the mountain Olympus unto the sea, there is little above a mile space between: the one half whereof, is taken up with the mouth of the river Bephyrus, which in this place spreaddeth very broad and large; and another part of the plain, either the temple of Jupiter or the town it fell occupieth: the rest besides, being but a very small place, might have been enclosed and made fast against them with a little trench and rampier: besides such store there was of stone ready at hand, and of timber out of the forfeit, that they might either have raised a KiiHure, or framed turrets and such like fortifications in their way. But the K. {Who's spirit and understanding was blinded with uddain fear} foreseeing none of all these things, but disfacencing every fort of their garrisons, made open passage for the current of war, and fled himself to Pydna. The Conul perceiving that he had gotten great advantage and many hopes by the bloody and negligence of his enemy, dispatched a courier toward Larnaca {Or Sp. Lucertum}, willing him to leizc thosc forts into his hands about Tempe, which were abandoned by the enemy: and after he had sent Popilius before in spiall to discover all the passages about Dium, and perceived that the avenues were open in all parts, he marched forwards himself; and the second journe came to Dium; where commanded to encamp under the very temple, to the end, that no violent outrage should be committed in that holy place. Himself in proper person entered into the City, which as it was not great, so it was garnished with fair publick buildings, beautified with a number of goodly images, and paling well fortified besides: in so much as he could not well believe, that things of such importance were abandoned for nothing, but that there was some secret deceipt and treachery lurking underneath. After he had staid there one full day, to elpise and see that all coasts were clear, he diissolved and marched on; & supposing very well that he should be provided of sufficient store of grain, he advanced forward that very day to the river named Mytis. The morn after, he took possession of the City Agafla, which the inhabitants willingly resigned unto him. And to win the hearts of all other Macedonians, (contenting himself only with hostages) he promised to leave their City euer without a garrison, and to permit them to live under their own laws without payment of any tribute. Being marched onward one daies journey from thence, he pitched down his tents falk upon the river Ascurds: but feeling and finding still the farther he went from Themis, more and more want of all things, he retired back to Dium; and then all men lawfully and safely, to what freights he should be driven, in case he had been clean shut out from Themis, consider ing that it was not safe for him to remove far from thence where he was.

Perb. ut having rallied all his forces, and assembled his captains into one place, check'd and rated up the captains of the garrisons and guards thereof about the passages; but above all he rebus ked Aplepoiados & Hippas, muttering that those two had betrayed unto the Romans the portgate to Macedon, whereas indeed no man was more justly to be blamed, for that than his owne self. The Conul after he had discovered a far off from fees a fleet of Roman ships, conceived good hope that vessels were coming charged with provition of victuals (for now in his camp the death was great, and brought they were already to extrem want and dearness.) But he was advertised by them who were entred within the harbor, that the ships and fleets of burden were left behind at Magnusa: Whereupon, in being in great doubt what to do (so hard went all things with him for the present, that he had work enough to wrestle with that only difficulty, without being further encumbered with any emprachment from the enemy) behold, in happy time, letters were brought unto him from Sp. Lucertus, importing thus much; That he was master of all the forts and holds planted upon Tempe and round about Phila, where he had heard great plenty of corn and other necessaries. The Conul right joyous for these good tidings, let his army on foot from Dium to Phila, as well to strengthen the garrison there, as also to deal corn among his followers; which would have required a long time ere it could have been brought over to them at Dium.

That departure & journey of his was nothing well spoken of: for some gave out that the General retired from the enemy for very fear; because that if he had stayed there still, he should have been forc'd to a battle: others said, that he had no skill in war, neither in those occurrences, which fortunes where then turning about altered every day, offering one new thing or other; who when occasions and opportunities were present unto him, let the same slip out of his hands, which soon after might not possibly be recover'd again. And verily he had not so soon quit the possession of Aof Diom, but he startled and awakened the enemy, and put in his head now so length to regain those matters, which had been lost before through his own default. For hearing that the Conful was departed, he returned immediately to Diom: where he repaired whatsoever had been demolished and runneth by the Romans: the battalions of the walls which were cast down he set up again in the right place; and in all parts fortified the mure and bulwarks of the City. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this side Enjimsus, intending that the river it self (which is very hard to be passed over) should serve instead of a rampier and trench of defence. This river runneth out of the vale from under the mountain Olympus, and in summer season is small and shallow, but in winter is twelve high and tripeth broad by reason of rain: running also with a forcible current and stream, it formeth great rocks, and among those fliny crags and cliffs maketh many whirlpools: by occasion likewise, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the sea, there are many gulfs of exceeding depth: and by reason that it hath eaten a hollow channel in the mids, the banks of each side are very high and steep upright. Persius, supposing that by the means of this river, the enemies were debared from all passage, purposed in his mind to hold off, and drive the reft of the summer in that fort.

But the Conful in the mean while sent Popilus from Phila into Heraclea with 2000 armed fighting men. This Heraclea standeth about five miles from Phila, and in the midway between Diom and Tempe, upon a rock that commanded this river, Popilus, before that he cauc'd his men to approach the walls, sent certain persons of purpose to persuade the magistrates and chief of the City, to make proof of the faithful protection and clemency of the people of Rome, rather than to trie their rigor and violence. But this motive and advice availed not, because they might discern the fires out of the kings camp neer to Enjimsus, whereupon both from the land and sea (for the fleet also being arrived anchored near the shore as well by force of arms as by fabrics and engins of battery, they began to affail the town. Moreover, certain yong and lusty Roman soldiers (making as now in war of exercise which they had practis'd in the games Circean) gat over the wall where it was lowe. The manner was in those daies (before this was prodigy came up) filling the whole circle or Shelby place with beasts set out of all countries) to devile and feke landy forts of publick lights & speculcates to be hold, & not running one course with the charter, and another on horseback, and so an end, to employ at both races the space of one full hour. Among others fears of activity exhibited, the matchers and wardens of those exercis'es and games brought into the race commonly 60 (and otherwheres more) lusty young men in arms well appointed. There training in part represented a shew and appearance of two armies encounters and encountering and charging one another, in part also the use and practice of a more gentle and elegant exercise then military profession, and coming nearer to the handling and managing of weapons after the order of sword-fencers. Thence yong gallants, after they had performed other ordinary running courses, put themselves into a four-square squadron, with the bucklers or targets close couched and joined together over their heads, in this manner: they that were formost in the front (foot bolt upright, the second rank loosed somewhat lower under the other, the third course more than they, and to the fourth until the hindmost kneeld on their lines; and by this means they resembled a pavioide rising up higher & higher, like the pent-houfe or roof of a deiceps. This done, two men well armed, fetching their ran fifty foot or thereabout backward from thence, and seeming to desie and challenge one another, mounted the foresaid pavioide, ran from the other end up to the top upon those targets to jointely united and set close, and thick together: and then while they set their countenance as though they would defend the sides and edges thereof, otherwise in the mids they seemed to performed their devoir and maintain combat one with another, as upon firm and steady ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavioide framed and brought close to that in the wall: and when armed men were mounted upon it, they shot upon the very ridg thereof, were as high full as the defendants which kept the walls being once beaten back and turned down, two ensigns of foildiers gat over into the City. The only difference between this pavioide and the other above described was this, that they only who stood in the front before and in the flanks, bare not their targets aloft above their own heads, because their foilders and bodies should not be naked and exposed to shot, but caried them before after the usual manner of fighting men in a battall; By which means, neither the arrows and darts discharged from the wall hurt them afrone, nor the shot that light upon their targetes took any hold, but glanced and glid down-ward from the top without doing any harm, like to rain water that floweth from the ridg of an houte, and runneth down the eves. The Conful likewise, now that Heraclea was won, advanced forwards with his army thither, pretending as though he marched toward Diom, and as if after he had chaisd and driven the King from thence, he minded to pulled forward also into Persia. But preparing now against winter, he commanded to make the wares fit and handly, for the carriage of provision out of Thessalonica, and to chaise out commodious places for garners: also to build certain houses, wherein they that brought the provision, might lie in covert and lodg commodiously. Persius in the end having taken heart again and gathered his wits together, upon that late fright which had amazd his spirits, withdrew then withall his heart, that his commandments had not been obeyed, at what time as in a tearfull fit he gave expresse charge to call the treasure into the sea at Pella, and set on fire, the armentall at Thessalonica. Andronicus being sent for to the same purpose to Thessalonica made no halt to execute his will, but rilled out the time for the torch, leaving the King some respite to repent, as it fell out indeed. Nicias was not provident and well advised at Pella, in throwing away some part of the mony which he there found: howbeit he thought his fault such, as might in some sort be remedied and amended, for that all the said treasure in manner was recovered by the means of certain dyvers that fished for it under water, and fetched it up from the bottom of the sea. But the King himself was so ashamed of this foolish feat, that in a melancholy he commanded thofe poor dyvers to be secretly murdered, yes, and afterwards Andromius and Nicias also: the end that no pention should remain alive that was privy to that foolish commandment of his.

Amids these affairs, C. Maruus having looked to sea from Heraclea, and with his fleet failed to Thegulonos, landed his armed outliers in divers places of the shore, and made war in the territoty all about: and when they made fallace out of the City and charged upon him, after some fortunate skirmishes, he chased them back and beat them within the walls. So as at length he terrified the town itself: but not only they who ranged up and down here and there, unadvisedly approached the walls, were wounded with that discharged out of instruments of all sorts, planted upon the walls: but thofe also who were in the ships, were butt with fumes, weighed and levelling from engines a far off. Upon which occasion he commanded his outliers to retire a shipboard, and leaving the fiege of Thegulonos, they sailed from thence to Endia, a City fiftten miles off, situate in a fertile soil侏against Pydna. Where: when they had spoiled the territory lying to that City, they coasted along the shore and arrived at Antigonia. Where, being fet a land, fift they spoiled the country in every quarter, and brought good fcore of prizes to their ships: but afterwards, as they fligated out of order and disband, the Macedonians, as well footmen as horfe, ran upon them, and chased them as they fled pace to the sea side; in which rout they flew about 500 and took as many prisoners. And nothing else provoked the courage of the Romans (in regard as well of utter despair otherwife to save themselves, as of the indignity it fell, both to hazard their honour, but only the extreme necessity wherein they flioud, having no means to recover their ships in safety. Whereupon they turned head, and renewed the fight upon the very sea land. They also who were a shipboard, lircourced and helped them, in which conflict, two hundred Macedonians loft their lives, and as many were taken prisoners. From Antigonia the fleet weighed anchor, & made head toward the territory of Pella, where the outliers were yet on shore to poffy the country. The territory appertained to the confines of the Caffandrians, the most fruitful tract of land parts which they had coasted and failled by. There, King Lcnmec, being departed from Ennea with twenty war ships met with them, & likewise five other covert ships were sent from King Ptnias. The Pctor seeing this good ensaye and addition of his forces, took a better heart unto him, even to besiege Caffandra. This City was built by King Caffander, in the very height & guilte which joineth the territory of Pella with the rest of the Macedonian country, enclosed of one side with the Tornonian sea, and on the other with the Macedonian. For there lyeth a bank or shelf like a tongue into the sea, upon which the City standeth and beareth unto the deep, no ledge in compafs or quantity then is the mountain Arbo. It butteth full against Magnesia, with two promontories of one small height: of which the greater is called Pejaldus, the lefe Canastrum. This town they began to affay in two divers parts. The Roman (Pctor) drew his fortifications to a place called Shia, opposing certain strong fortes for to debarr and shuf the way from the Macedonian sea to the Tornonian. On the other side there is an entrench or arm of the sea, from which quarter Enmores gave the assaite. The most troublesome torrent that the Romans found, was in damming and filling up the trench, which Perusin had cast against them a little before. And as the Perusin acquired where the earth was belowed which was thrown out of the trench stored, because he could not keep there any where of which were fliowed unto him certain vaults and arches with which he builded a new wall, not built to the thickness of the old, but with perpnd work, and had none course of brick and no more. Whereupon he resolved to pierce through the said wall, and to make way into the City. The which he thought to execute and perform without being discovered, in case he teased the wall in another quarter, and by making a shout and alarm there, with drew all the defendants of the City to the guard of that one place. There lay in generall Caffandra (being a sufficient number of serviceable yong men of the City) eight hundred Agrians, and two thousand Penetins of Seleucia, fought from thence by Pleurastis; and both their names are hardy warriors. While these defecled the walls manfully, and the Romans endeavoured withall their might to mount over, the thin walls of the vaults and arches storied were wrought and digged through in the turning of an hand, and gave entrance into the City: Now of they who took it, had been armed (as they were but pioners) the town had been taken at that instant. But when as the pioners heard news that the said work was finishd, they laddinly let up a cheerfull shout for joy, being ready some in one place and some in another to ruffle into the City: The enemies at the first wondered what the meaning should be of that sudden cry, but the captains of the garrison, Pydna and Philippes Proceed being once advertised that the town lay open, propounding hereunto confident the vantage, who could hit prevent the other and give the charge, fellcred forth with a strong band of Agrians and Illians: and whiles the Romans ralled themselves some from this place, and others from that, and were called together for to enter the City with banner dispayed, they let upon them unready as they were, and not ranged in any good order: put them to flight and chased them as far as to the trench, where they overthrew them one another by heaps; 60 or very were there killed; and A and in manner whom they could reach between the wall & the trench were hole hurt. The Pre, thus over taken in his own enterprise, was not to bally to project any new design; neither did Eumenes any better, at least at one time he assaulted the City both by land and sea. Whereupon they recorded both, so fit strong guards, for to impeach the passage of all garrisons out of Macedonia thither and (since open forces took no better effect) to assail the walls with fabrics & engines, as they were built in preparation there where, they had ten thousand of the Kings, sent from Macedonia with certain selected auxiliary Gauls. Then when they perceived their enemies ships riding at anchor nigh in single range one after another, as close as possibly they could to the shore in the dark night, and so entered the City. The brute that went of this new succes and garrison, forced as well the Romans as the King to give over the siege; so fetching a compasse about the promontory, they

B arrived before Trisone. When by the then began to lie against it after they perceived once that there was a valiant company there to defend it, they abandoned their enterprise without effect, & failed to Demetrius. Being approached another, and seeing the wall full of armed men, they passed by and anchored as follows: 'To sit there while they may, before they could put the terri-ory, to set upon Demetrius. Meanwhile, they could also, because he would not fight doing nothing in the enemies countrie, sent M. Popilius with five thousand soldiers to give the alarm to the City of Melibe.
Seated it is at the foot of the mountain Offa, on that side which looketh to Thessaly, and very fit ly for the purpose commandment Demetrius. The first assault of the enemies put the inhabitants of the place in great affright; but after they had recovered their spirits danted with so unexpected fear, they ran in arms to the gates, and up to the walls, where they doubt ed and suspected any place like to give entrance, and incontinently cut off all hope from the enemies, that it could pos-entially be forced at the first assault. Whereupon they prepared to lay siege unto it, & began to make fabrics and engines to batter the walls. Persius having intelligence, that in one in that both Melibe was beleaguered by the Conul, and also that the fleet anchored before Selinus, to the intent that from thence he might go in hand to assault Demetrius: sent Eumenes one of his captains, with a regiment of two thousand soldiers to Melibe; with this charge and direction:
That if he could raise the siege from Melibe, and force the Romans to depart, he should forthwith secretly to Demetrius, & put himself within the town, before the Romans could remove from Idas and advance before the City. The inhabitants of Melibe discovering him with his forces all at once upon the higher places, quit their fabrics and engines in fearful flight, and set them all on fire; and thus that departed from before Melibe. Eumenes having levied the siege from the one City, forthwith led his army to Demetrius. And then the citizens assured themselves, that they should be able not only to defend the City against the siege, but also to save their territories from wall and spoil; and to make the Corsairs of the northerners disperse Southwards there and there, without drawing blood of their enemies. Howbeit the Pretor and the King took notice of the walls, and viewed the situation of the town, if it were possible they could elope any one place which they were like to force, either with battery of engines or force of arms. The voice went, that by the means of Cyrus the Cretmean, and Antiochus governor of Demetrius, there was a treaty of peace and amity between Philae and Eumenes. But howsoever it was, this is certain, both Eumenes and the Pretor departed from Demetrius. As for Eumenes, he failed to the Conul, and testified unto him the joy that he conceived for his safe and prosperous entrance into Macedon, and from hence returned to Pergamus into his own realm. But Marcus Furgus the Pretor, when he had sent part of his fleet into the harbor of Seleucia there to winter, with the rest of his ships went to Oreum in Russia; supposing it a commodious City, from whence victuals and all provision might be sent to the armies that abide either in Macedonia or Thrace. As touching Eumenes, it is plainly authors have written diversely. If a man should go by Valerius Antias and believe him, he reports, that neither the Pretor had any help from him, but that he had not been there at all; but with the ships which he had by his letters; no took his leave of the Conul in good terms with favour, at what time as he was to depart into Asia, as being highly displeased, that he was not permitted to quarter with him in one £. The same campion so much as he could not possibly be entreated by him, to leave behind that Cavaus of Gaul which he had brought thither with him. As for Antixus his brother, bereavement still with the Conul (as Valerius faith) and continued ignere and fastful unto him without any change or alteration; yet and performed right good service in all that war, During the these in Macedon, there came Embassadours from beyond the Alps to Rome (sent from a petty K. of the Gauls Balaur he had to name) ; but of what image he was sentenced (its not recorded) promised and to the Macedonian war. Thanked they were from the Senat, and presents were sent unto them to win a chain of gold weighing two pound, certain golden cup of four pound weight, a brave clothe and barbed, and an hispanian armor. After these Gauls were gone out of place, the Embassadours of Pamphylia brought with them into the Senat a golden crown, valued at 20000 Philip peaces of gold; their request was, that they might be permitted to set up the said present and anation in the chappel of two thousand Ailes. Then the Embassadours of King Pra-flus, and soon after, others from the Rhodians had audience; who of one and the same argument discouraged diversely, for both tended to one thing, namely, a treaty for recon$('#ent of peace bet-then the Rom. & K. Persius, Pra#sus seemed to instead rather then to demand: protellling to the had ever to that day flood with the Romans in that war; and willingly would send them full. 11 to the very end thereof: but since that there came Embassadors unto him from Persia, and dealt with him to make an end of the war between him and the Romans, and for that he pro-mitted them to be a mediator and intercessor for him to the Romans; therefore his request unto them was, (if they could so find in theirs hearts) to fmit their anger, &c. so they should use him in any service, as one that would acknowledge himself beholden unto them, for a favor, in effecting this atonement and reconciliation. In this manner (say) make the K. his Embassadors.

But the Rhodians contrived, with a proud humour of theirs, reckoned up a beardless of their demets towards the people of Rome, attributing the greater part (believe me) of the victory of K. Antiochus to themselves: moreover they added and laid, that when the Macedonians and Romans were at peace, they began to enter into league and amity with K. Persia; which they, had interrupted and did continued against their will; not upon any defect or occasion given of his part, but only because it pleased the Romans to draw them into the afcociation of the war.

Three days now already [say they] have we felt the heart of this war and lived by the fchio: by reason that the seas are flut up from us, and our land is decaysed and distrefled for need and want, having lost our collage and coutons tlling from the seas, which we are not able to endure any longer, have addressed Embassadors to Persia into Macedoiny to intiis me unto them, that the Rhodians would and pleasure was, that he should grow to a composition and beat at peace with the Romans. Our selves also are sent to Rome to declare the fame: and likewise to convene, that whatsoever shall impeach and hinder this course tending to pacification, the Rhodians will consider of them accordingly & bethink how they are to proceed against them.

I am verily perswaded, that there is no man at this day, who can hear or read this, but his hi-mack will nie threaten with indignation: guefe then thereby how the LL. of the Senat of Rome were excited and touched as then, at the hearing thereof; Claudius mine author tells, that there was no answer at all given unto them. Only an arcc or decre of the Senate was read before them, importing much, that by order from the people of Rome, the Carians & Lyctians were made free: and presently, were letters dispatched to both nations to signify to much flat unto them.Which when the principal persons of the embassage once heard, even he, whose big and brave words a little before, the whole Senate-house was hardly able to contain, tell down flat before them in a twon and extaie. Other Historians write, that this answer was returred, 4 That the people of Rome at the very beginning of this war, knew assuredly (by intelligence given from persons of right good credit) how the Rhodians had secretly complotted with Persia against the state of Rome: and if there had been some doubt thereof before, yet the words of the Embassadors ere-white delivered, made all clear and put it flat peradventure: and no marvell, since that for the most part it falleth out, that such cautious practices, howsoever at the first they are covertly & cleanly carried, yet one time or other are bewsied and discovered. Let the Rhodians lend their messengers over the world and scape not; let them make themselves judges to determine of war and peace at their pleasure; as for the Romans they will take arms in hand, and lay them down again at the will and appointment of the gods in heaven. We are well holpen up now in deed, if we must have the gods no more to be witnesses of our accords, but the Rhodians for footh. And mull the Romans (I would not else) be ruled by them, and withdraw their forces out of Macedoiny? They will consider and advise themselves how to proceed against us! How M shall we do then? What the Rhodians will see to, we mayly they perhaps themselves know: but the people of Rome (that is certain) well consider indeed and resolve after that Persia is vanquish'd; which they hope will not be long frill to recom pense and require every City and state according as they have deferved in the service of this war. As hars this answer was yet, we lay them a reward to the Embassadors, to every one of them two cuia, but none would they receive.

And this, were the letters read of Q. Martius the Consul, containing thus much, namely, how he had paused over the firearms of the forrest, and was come into Macedoiny, where he had provision of viuables which the Pretor had given order for out of other places to serve for wonters and besides, had taken up of the Epirots twentie thousand Modii of wheate and ten thousand of barley, for which corn they should make money ready at Rome to content their Embassadors.

Also that they must lend from Rome certain riches and other apparel; and need he had besides of 500 horse or other carbuncle especially of Nymphafor in those parts he had no plenty of any thing.
Hereupon an all was granted out of the Senat, That all these things should be done according to the tenor of the Consil his letters. So C. Sulpitius the Pretor bargain'd for the transporting over into Macedoiny 600 side caicton's and 3000 short coats or jackets, together with horses for be dispoised and distributed at the discretion of the Consil: and besides paid the Embassadors of the Epirots good money for their grain. He brought also into the Senat Oneimius the son of Pytho, a noble perfomage of Macedoiny. This man was evermore of counsel with the K. perswaying him to peace: and admonished him as his father Philip before him offered an order even to the time of death to read over twice a day from point to point the instruiment of the accord & covenents between him and the Romans; to he also would take up that good counsel: and pradice the fame, if not continually yet at leastwise many a time and often. But when he could by no means lett him nor set his mind from war, he began at first to withdraw and assent himself, alleging for his excuse one while this occasion, and other whiles that, because he would not be present at the debating of those matters which he approv'd not: and in the end perceiving A that he was had in some jealousie, & otherwhiles charged to be a traitor, he changed his allegiance revolted to the Rom, and serverd the Consul in right good head This Oneifimus being brought into the Senat house, related all these premisses: Whereupon the Senat ordained, that he should be enrolled formally in the number of allies: also, that he should be provided of a lodging, and his ordinary expences for the time allowed at the Cities charge. Moreover, two acres of land in the territory of Tarentum, which was conficcat to the people of Rom, should be let out for him; and a meafurage in Tarentum bought for his habitation. To see all this performed, C. Decimus the Pretor had in charge.

The Centors upon the 13th of December, took a survey of the number of citizens and an entailment of their goods, more freightly then before time. Many were unknit, and had their B horses taken from them, and P. Rustus among the rest, who when he was Tribune of the Com- had been their accailer and called them to violently to reckoning; degraded he was besides and displicated out of his own tribe, & made no better than a very labourer in the Cities works. Whereas the one moiety of the Cities renewes and profits for that year, was let by and showed unto them by the treasurers (according to an ordinance of the Senat) Tab. S وميًار قصص out of the mony assign- ed unto him, purchased the house of P. Africianus on the back side of the old Caru near the image of Fortune; the shops also where in they fold wooll, and the other adjoineth thereunto, all to the use of the City. He cailed likewise the Rarely palace to be built, which afterwards was called Semppona Basilica.

Now was the yeer come about and well neer at an end, when by reason of the great care prin- cipally about the Macedonian war, men began to talk, whom they were to create for Consuls agaunt the next yeer, to achieve and end the said war? Whereupon there passed a decree of the Senat, that Cn. Servilius with all speed possible, should make halt to Rome for to hold a general assem- bly of election. This decree Sulpicius, the Pretor within few daies after read to the Coj to the end that he should repair home into the City before the day prefixed. Whereupon both the Coj, halted; & the said election was also furnishd by the day appointed. COff, there were created L. Emilius Pansius the second time (even 14 yeers after his former Conflitutio) with C. Livius Crassus. The day following were the Pretors also chosen, to wit, Cn. Batinus Sambuliis, L. Anicius Gal- luc, Cn. Ottavius, P. Flaminus Balbus, Mar. Eubinius Helius, and C. Papius Carbo. The carefull regard of the Macedonian war caufed every thing to be done with greater expedition. And therefore it was thought meet, that these new elect magistrates should cast lots out of hand for their provinces, that it might be known to whether Coj Macedon, and to which Pretor the conduct of the navy should fall; that thereupon they might presently consider and provide for all things requisite to the war, & require the advice of the Senat where as required. O named it was when the Coj eneterd into their office, to solemnize the Latine festival holidays as soone as they might conveniently, without offence of the gods and breach of any religious order: that the Comul whole fell to go into Macedon, were not detemned behind upon any occaion. After these ordinances, Italy and Macedon, were nominated for the provinces of the two Coj: and for the Pretors, the two civil jurisdictions within the City of Rome, the navy, Spain, Sicily and Saratine. In fine, Macedon fell to Emilius the Consul, and Italy to Livius. Of Pretors, Cn. Batinus was had chief justice of the plese of citizens, and L. Anicius of allies. And in the Senat thought good to send the navy any whither, Cn. Ottavius had the the charge thereof as Laddimari. P. Flaminus was appointed by lat L. Deputy of Spain, M. Eubinius of Sicily, and C. Papius of Saratine.

All men ill saw, that L. Emilius intended not to go coldly about the managing of that war; both for that he was not an ordinary man, but singular above all other, and also because that night and daie he mused and studied upon nothing else, but that which was requisite and pertinent thereunto. The first thing of all where he went in hand was this; a requent to the Senat for to dispauch certain elagant commissioers into Macedon, to visit the armes there and the armado; to make true report upon their certain knowledge, what was needful to be done for the tipp of the forces as well by land as sea: also to lie in eipiall & entailment as much as possible they could there Kipower; moreover, what quarter of the province were taken by our men, and which of the enemies kept; whether the Romans lay encamped still within the forrest, or if they were pasted beyond the freights and come into the even ground; who continued truly allies, who were suspefted, who hung in double doubts, as whole faith depended upon fortune: who seemed to be professed enemies: how great the provisions were of victuals from whence they were conveyed by land or what places transported by water; & Jlly, what exploits had been done the summer past both by land and sea: supposing, that for a light given and certain intelligence delivered of theie things, they might be more directed in the calling and laying of future plans & engagements, So the Senat granted out a commision to Cn. Servilius the Coj, for to send the delegates into Mac- edon, such as L. Emilius thought good of. Whereupon within two daies after, Cn. Decimi- us Lepidus and A. Livius Nero, took their journey as legats and commissioers. News came in the latter end of this yeer, that it rained stones twice, namely in the territory of Rome, and like wise about Veii: and therefore a novendial sacrafice was celebrated. This yeer there di- ed certain priests, namely, Pub. Quinctius Tarsus, a flamen of Mars, and M. Claudius Macellus Decemvir, in whole room was substituted Cn. Ottavius. And now noted it was, that the mag- nificence and port of the people of Rome encreased, for that in the playes called Comices ex- hibited by Publulus Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and Publulus Lepidus Ediles Curiae, thirtofore and:
The four and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

3 wild beasts out of Afric with 40 bears, & elephants, were baited to make sport to the people.

When L. Aemilius Paulus and P. Licinius entered their Consulship upon the fifteenth of March, which was the beginning of the year following, the LL of the Senate were in great expectation, and especially what the Consul would propose unto them as touching the Macedon war, which was his proper province. But Paulus said that he had nothing to propose and put to counsel, seeing that the Delegates aforesaid were not returned. And at Erundium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voyage upon the sea been driven back by tempest and cast upon Diophaimum. But so soon as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledge of those things that first are to be known, I will then consult; and that will be within few days. Now to the end that nothing may hay and hinder his journey, he told them, that the even before the Ides of April, was appointed for the solemnity of the Latin festival holidy. And after festivity duly performed [upon the Albane hill] the Senator should no sooner obtain, but he and Ca. Ollaurs would set forth and put themselves on their way. As for C. Licinius his colleague, his charge should be in his absence to provide and lend all things requisite and needful for this war. Mean while (quoth he) the embassies of foreign nations may have audience given. So when he had sacrificed as the matter was, before they took in hand the great affairs of State, the Embassadors of Alexandria, from King Ptolomeus and queen Cleopatra, were called in. Glad they were in poor array, the hair of their head long, their beards side and overgrown: and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive-tree, they entered into the Senate, and fell crowding and prostrating on the floor. Their habit and apparel was not so simple and meek, their look and countenance not so heavy and forrowful, but their speech was more pleasant and tameable. Amicus now King of Syria, and who had sometime been hostage at Rome under a colourable pretence of honesty and equity to restore Ptolomeus the elder to his Kingdom, made hot war upon his younger brother, who then held Alexandria: and after a victory obtained in sea-fight near Pelopion he made a bridge of bits of work upon the river Nilus, over which he transported his army, & now laid siege to Alexandria; to as by all likelihood he would shortly by way of conquest be lord of a multitude and wealthy Kingdom. In which respect, these Embassadors made pitiful men and grieved complaint, beseeching withal the Senator, of their aid and succour to that realm and those Kings, who were so near their friends to the king and dominion. For persuaded they were that the people of Rome had done so much for Amicus in particular, & were of that account & sumptuous with all other Kings and nations, that if they would best send their Embassadors to intimate unto them just such matters, that the Senate was not well pleased with wagging war upon a confederate King, he would presently raise his siege, depart from before the walls of Alexandria, and withdraw his army clean away into Syria. But if they pressed the time long and delayed thus to do, then they should Ptolomeus and Cleopatra within a while be driven out of their realm, and forced to come to Rome with some themetfull part of dominion to the people of Rome, in that they had not yet their helping hand in that extreme danger of all their fortunes, The LL of the Senate moved with compassion at the prayers of their, Alexandrians, sent incontinent C. Popolus Lencas, C. Decimus, and A. Hofidius as embassadors to determine and make an end of the war between those two Princes. In commission they had left to go unto Ptolomeus, and then to Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unless they sued and gave over arms, they would take him neither for friend nor confederate, whom it was long of that the war was not given over. So their three together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, took their leave within three days & departed. Then the forsaid Delegates returns from out of Macedon, the last day of the festival games to Monerva called Quinquana, and not before they were welcome; but followed for they were, had it not been even then when they came, the Consuls would immediately have called the Senator together. But the matter after the Senator was, whose commissioners had audience given. Report they made ful, that with more danger then pitiful ending, the army entered into Macedon, ny over those pales and forts, where was no way nor pass at all, Item, that the King kept the country of Persia, into which the Roman armie was now advanced, and were to necro encamped one to the other, that nothing but the river Elisseus between kept them asunder; that neither the K. made offer of battle nor the Roman, were of sufficient force to challenge & force him to fight; moreover the winter had overtaken them (a time unseasonable for warlike exploits) that the horse were mazed and nourished in unfortunes, notwithstanding they had victuals to serve their men longer then six days; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. Were it so that Ap. Claudius had a good and sufficient power about Seleucia, he might be able to trouble the K. and put him to his trysts in a battle; but now both Apusus and the garrison with them, are themselves in extreme jeopardy, unlesse with speed either a complete armie be sent thither, or else they draw from hence where they are, into Macedon. Over and besides they related, how from the camp they went towards the fleet, where they heard say, that some of the fastening men and marines were dead of tickets, others, and namely, those of Sicily above the rest, were gone home again to their own houses, in much as there were not men enow to serve the ships, & those that remained, had neither their wages paid & mony to put in their purses, no victualls & appurtenances to hang on their backs. As for Eumenes & his fleet, they (like ships driven to a coast by force of wind and weather, without any other eend or canonicall) were come and gone again; & it seemed the mind of that K. was not yet settled and resolved. But as they reported all of Eumenes suspiciously & in doubtful terms, so they assured them of the singular fidelity & constancy of Artabas his his brother. When the Legates had spoken, this said:

L. Althcr. Let us debate now in council, what is to be done as concerning the last war. So the Senate ordained, that for eight legion, the Commanders and the people should elect an equal number of senatorial Tribunes; or Colonels, the one as many as the other; and that none should be created, and advanced to that place for that year; but such as had borne some honourable dignity then, out of all those Tribunes this elected, that L. Lucius should make choice of those two legions which were to go into Macedonia, of whom he would himself: also, that after the solemnity of the Lent elections performed, L. Althcr. the Consul, and C. Scordia the Praetor and Admiral of the fleet, should depart into their Provinces.

A third was joyed in commotion with them: to wit, L. Anicetus the Praetor, and chief justice for strangers. And ordained it was, that he should pass into Libya about Lycia, for to succede.

The charge of taking munifers was put upon C. Licinius the Consul. He had commandment to enroll even thousand (foot) Citizens of Rome, and two thousand horsemen and to charge the Latin allies with half of seven thousand footmen, and four hundred horse. Also to send letters unto Cn. Servilius, who governed the Province of Gaul, to enroll his hundred men of arms. This army he had commandment to fend with all convenient speed to his College into Macedonia. So as in that Province there should not be above two legions, and the time tall and compleat, containing six thousand foot, and three hundred horse apiece. As for the incalfe, as well of the Cavalry as Infantry, they should be disposed and bestowed in frivily garrisons. And all such as were unmeet for service, were to be called and sent away. Moreover, the allies were put out and find 5000 foot, and 800 horse, And those were to serve in garrison under Anicetus, over and above those legions, which he was commanded to lead into Macedonia, consisting of 5000 foot, and 500 horsemen either of them. Also for the navy were enrolled 3000 mariners and rowers. Licinius the Consul was appointed to defend and keep in obedience his Province with two legions, and to take besides of allies, ten thousand foot, and six hundred horse.

After these ordinances of the Senate were accomplished, L. Althcr. the Consul, were forth of the Senate house into the common place before the assembling of the people; where he made a speech unto them in this wise following: 'Me thinks I perceive and see, my good friends and Citizens, of Rome, that ye have thrown more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation in my behalf. For the Province of Macedin is given to my lot; and neither at the time that I was declared and familiarized, nor at the time that I was appointed, to that place. And I was entered into government; & for no other reason in the world, but upon the opinion which you have conceived, that the Macedonian war, which hath so long continued, may be brought by my means to such an end as becometh the great & and majority of the people of Rome. And in mine own mind I have good hope, that as the gods in favor have directed this fortitude, so they will be present and propitious unto me in performing the service, in these matters. I say, I am but carried partly with conceit and partly with hope. But this one thing I am assured of; yes and I dare affirm and promulc on my own head, that I will endeavour my life and employ all that is in me, that this your good opinion of me may not be in vain conceived. As for all things necessary and requisite to this war, both the Senate hath ordained; & also, that they have thought good I should depart immediately (for which my oath is well pleased and contented,) neither in me there shall be any delay.) My colleague C. Licinius, a singular man, and of great valour, will provide with as great care and diligence, as if himself had the full conduct of this war. For the effecting whereof, I see that whatever I shall write either to the Senate, or to you, ye believe for true: as for running rumours which have no certain author, give no ear and believe thereto; neither feed them with your foolish credulity. For now and adays verily, anything that I have observed to fall our ordinarily in this war, there is no man more fateth to little by the common brutes that are blinded abroad, but his spirit and courage may be thereby qualified and danted. In all meetings now past and at every board, (I would not ellyeye them have them, that in their table talk will lead your armies into Macedonia; that know where they are to lodge and encamp; what commodious places are to be seized and kept with garrisons: at what time and through which paths the entry must be made into Macedonia; where the Garnerers and flour houses for corn should be built and set; which way by land and sea both, the provisions of victuals ought to be brought; when the time of peace is to encounter and fight with the enemy, and when to sit still and retire. Neither are they content to set down and pronounce, what is to be done for the better: but if ought hap to be managed otherwise than they have judged expedient, they are to bold as to control the Col, and ready to comment and proceed against them judicially. There are few hindrances, I may tell you, to warriors & men of action. For all men have not the gift of resolution and constancy to neglect the speech and talk of men, as sometimes Fabric had, who chose rather to have his authority & command diminished and impaired by the folly and vanity of LED people, than with their favourable applauce and good opinion to manage his affairs but unwortdily. Yet take me not, if I were a man that would have no capa is to be admonished and advised by others; may come off, of this judgment I am. That he who worketh all by himself, & followeth only his own head is self-willed and proud, and nothing able & wise, What is then to be done? First in mine opinion. Generals and Commanders of armies are to be instructed by discreet and prudent men; by such as are skilful by profession in feats of arms and military science; by those also that by long practice are thoroughly experienced: may more than that, they are to be taught and counseled by them, that are usually present and constant in the execution of affairs, who daily see the advantage of members.
The fourth and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

... consider the proceeding of the enemies, and observe the opportunities of times: those (144) who as passengers in one ship are partakers of the same danger. If there be any man therefore, who is verily persuaded of himself, that he is able to direct me, and give me any counsel (in the conduct of this war which I have in charge) for the good of the common-wealth, let him come forth, and not deny his helping hand to the public welfare, and go along with me into Macedonia. Furnish him I shall, with ship, with horse, with tent-room, with common-money, and all things necessary for his voyage. If any be loath so to do, and had rather sit warm at home preferring the ease and repose of the City before the travel and pain of warfare, let him not here on the land take upon him to play the pilot and steersman at sea. Matter shall find enough within the City to talk of and seek no farther: let him hold him there & keep his babble and prattle to himself: know he (whosoever he is) that we will content our selves with our own counsel about us in the camp. And this occasion ended, and the Latine festivals solemnized the day before the ca.

lends of March, together with the sacrifices duly celebrated upon the Alban mount: the Cof, and the Praetor Co., Oiius, departed incontinently into Macedonia. It is recorded in the Chronicles that the Cof was honored with a greater consequence that accompanied him than any had been known: and that men preferred in manner formally, the end of the Macedonian war: how the Cof should have a speedy return, and obtain a brave and glorious triumph.

During these occurrences in Italy, Perseus who (became he was to be at the charges of disbursing money) never thought of, to go through with that which before he had begun, namely, to adjoin unto him Gentius King of the Illyrians: so soon as he perceived that the Romans were entered thestraights, and the war come now to this extremity of hazard: thought good now to make that fire and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had coveted & promised by his Em- bassador Hippas three hundred talents of silver, with condition also, that for security hostages should be put in of both parties interchangeably: he sent Pantaucus one of his most truly friends to dispatch and make an end of this affair. This Pantaucus met the Illyrian King at Medeo in the Country of Liberens: where he both took an oath of the King, and also received his hostages, Gentius likewise sent his embassador, named Olympio to demand the immbable oath of Perseus, and require hostages accordingly: with him were certain persons sent of purposé to receive the money, who also by the advice of the said. Pantaucus were to go into embassage with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio and Mocrenus. They had in charge and commission after the oath taken after hostages & money received, to go to Rhodes, & not before. Good hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be solicited and induced to take arms against the Romans, by using the name of these two KK, at once: and this account they made, if this State which carried the renown and honour above all others for sea-service, would once combine and band with them they should leave the Romans no hope at all, either on land or sea. When these Illyrians arrived, Perseus departed with all his Cavalry from before the height Enopus where he was encamped; and encountered them near Dinum, There were all the complements performed according to the covenants, in the sight and midst of the Cavalry, whom the King, of purpouse would needs have to be present at this accord of association made between him and K. Gentius, supposing that it would comfort & encourage them the more. So the hostages were given and taken in the presence of them all. They also who were to receive the money were sent to Pella M where the King's treasure lay: and those that should go to Rhodes with the Illyrian embassadors had commandment to embark at Thessalonica. Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes who affur'd them by the means of Dion & Polyarthus, two principal persons of that City that the Rhodians were pret and ready to war. Whereupon the said Metrodorus was appointed the chief in this embassage of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the same time likewise was addressed and imparted both unto Eunomus & also unto Antiochus such advice and counsel in common, as the present condition wherein their affairs stood, might minifter & afford argument name-ly. That a free City and a K. were two; by nature enemies that possibly could not fort together: That the people of Rome went in hand with them severally one after another: & that was a greater indignity & unsupported: the force of KK to overthrow the state of KK. For (o) by the aid of Attalus they had brought his father Philip to marry the help likewise of Eunomus, & partly also of his father Philip, Antiochus was defeated; and even now against himself both Eunomus and Perseus were in arms, the kingdom of Macedonia was once subdued, have at Africa next: which the Romans have in some part seized already for their own under a colour of encompassing Cities, & forcing them free: & then they will not leave until they have Syria too. For now is Perseus preferred in honour before Eunomus & Antiochus; for all his conquest is chaited & debared out of Egypt, which ought to have been the recompense of the war by him enteredp & achieved. In these regards Persus advertised each of them to consider & provide therefore either to force the Romans to make peace with him, or else to hold them for the common enemies of all KK, in case they perfified still in so unjust a war. The commision that the embassadors had to Antiochus was apter & open: but unto Eunomus an embassador was sent under a pretence of ransoming certain captives but professed there were under hand more secret complotts which caused Eunomus even then to be impeached & odious unto the Romans, & charged afterward with more grievous matters, although unjust. For he was reputed little better than a traitor & a professed enemy to their state, whereas indeed both he & Perseus trove who could compass, surprize & overtake one another better in fraud & avarice. Now there was one Cypas a Cretefis-
A manward & most secret friend to Eumenes: this man had communed first at Amphipolis with one Chrysus a countriman of his, who served under Perseus in the wars; and afterwards at Demetrias conferred with another named Mecrenataello with a certain third person called Antigonus Brill captains to K. Perseus even under the very walls of the forefald City, Oe iser and beside, Epirus who at this time was sent, had before time been employed in two severall embasses to the same Eumenes. These secret communications and embasses were badly spoken of; but no man knew what between this two KK, Howbeit, the case stood: Eumenes as he had no mind not intention to war upon Perseus, so he was not desirous in his heart that he should have the victory of the Romans: not so much for the old enmity which had been between both their fathers; as for the hateful quarrels kindled among themselves. For this concurrence & emul-

B lation there was between these two Princes, that Eumenes could never abide to see Perseus to purchase so great wealth & so much honour, as he must needs acquire by the conquest of the Romans: he saw moreover, that Perseus from the first beginning of this war fought by all means possible for peace, & the nearer he was to danger & damage, aimed thereafter at every day more than others employing his whole study & care about nothing else. He perceived also that among the Romans, because the war grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains as the Senate were not enough content and very desirous to see an end of so troublesome, hurtfull, and difficult a war. Knowing thus as he did, the mind and will of both parties he enkindled & framed to that which of it itself as he thought might fall out, where the stronger was weakest and the weaker in fear: and therein desired he to shew his double diligence, thereby to win a thank & pur-

C hase favour of both parties. For he entered into bargain with Perseus for a sum of money, one while not to aid the Romans either by land or sea: another whiles to be a means for peace and to treat with the Romans thereof, and not to meddle at all in the war; but to find him the capitulation (I say) for 1500 talents; making semblance and shew, that for the assurance both of the one and the other ready he was not only to swear, but also to put in good and sufficient hostages, Perseus was the willingest man in the world to let in hand with this, as being driven therto by the extent of fear: and presently without delay dealt with him as touching the hostages which were to be received: and in fine concluded it, that they should upon their delivery and receipt be sent into Cret. But when they came to talk of the money aforesaid, he haffed and found, that that; and to lay a truth either of these two sums (between Princes of so great name and honour), was but a bare and dishonest consideration: a thing, much unfitting (I wis) the giver, and most the receiver.

Perseus very for his part, in hope to purchase peace with the Romans, was willing enough to be at the expense of so much money: may he said that he would make payment thereof when the thing was done and accomplished: & in the mean time lay it up safe for that purpose within the temple of Samothrace, Eumenes again considering that the said island was an appurtenance to the dominion of Perseus could not see but that it was alfo for it to lie there and in Pelis and therefore was content to have part thereof in hand. Thus between them there was nothing but lying in the wind of the vantage, which could over reach the other: & what was gained in the end but infamy and discredit? As for Perseus, he not only let fall this design and lost this opportunity: and that by his ignorance only) when by the means of Eumenes he might have had either his money fire enough, or peace for it (which indeed he should have bought it cost him the one half of his kingdom) and being once received into grace & favour of the people of Rome he might have defamed and brought into obloquy and danger his concurrent, by charging him to have received a piece of money for a bribe, and so juilily have set the Romans upon his top: but also the association with King Grues which now was at the point of a contract, was negled; as ye and a mighty army of Gauls spread at that time all over, and presented unto him, was even then recharged and discharged by this pinching and taxing of his money. For there came and offered their service ten thousand horsemen, and as many foot, and those so well practiced and so good of count manship that they should be able to hold out & keep pace with horses ye, and run by their sides: such (I say) when the riders were unhorsed and fell, could vault & mount on the empty horse backs ready to fight in their turns. These had bargained to have or pay every horseman ten Philip pieces (of gold) paid down aforesaid, and a horseman five and their Captains thousand, Perseus departed from his league lying near the river Enipeus, and with the one half of his own forces met there coming upon the way, and caused proclamation to be made in all towns and villages near the high wais, To make ready and bring abroad their provision of victuals, and see that there were plenty of corn, of wine, and castel. Himself brought with him horses and trappinges, and fine fouldiers caufcoks to be left as prelents upon the chief of them, with some little sprinkling of gold to deal among a few of them, sippoaling that all the rest besides of common fouldiers, might be drawn on and retained with bare hope. Thus he came to the City of Ahtamass, and encamped upon the bank of the river Axios. But the army of these Galatians were lodged about Delphi, in the country of Maeceas, and refled there excepting the paimen of the money aforesaid, according to covenant. But Perseus sent unto them Antigonus one of his gallants and counters, to will and command the multitude of the army to dislodge and remove to Pthrion, a place so called in Porrion, and a good fort of their chief to repair unto him. Now were they three fore and fifteen miles from the river Axios and the Kains camp. And when Antigonus had deliyed unto them this mandat as he had in charge, and added besides, with what care and dilige tence the King had laid his provisons by the way of all things in great plenty for the army, and with what gifts of apparel, silver, and horses, he purposed to receive and entertain their Captains at their first coming unto him: as for that (say they) we shall take knowledge thereof when we are in presence personally: but now for this time, we demand, Whether ye have brought with you in ready coin according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the soldiers, as well horse as foot? And when he could make no answer thereunto, but was set a-splume; then the said Claudius their Prince, Go your waies then (eq, he) and tell your King and Matter, that the Gauls unless they may receive the gold, and hostages besides for their security, will not sit one foot forward. Relation being made hereof unto the K., he called his Council: and when it was soon seen what they all would advise him to do, himself, who could skill better to keep his money together, than hold the royal estate of his kingdom, began to enter into a diuourse of a dishonour, and savage nature of these Gauls: making a remonstrance, how he had experience by the calamities and losse of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive so great a multitude of them. That the Gauls forsook the woods of those places which laid nearer to them, to open the road for himself and his forces. And after they had given the waies unto those parts of Thessaly which lay near to their parts, they returned back again to the river Ister, which power of men it had past the strait of Persia into the Thesalians against the Romans (although Perseus had not stirred at all, but fitten still at Epirus) might not only have spoiled and laid bare the territory all about, and empeached the Romans for expecting any victuals there, but also destroyed the towns utterly, while Perseus held the Romans play at Enipeus, that they could not relieve and succour the Cities of their allies and confederates Nay, the very Romans should have enough to do to look unto themselves, considering, that there was no carrying for them, after that Thessaly was lost, which nourished and maintained their army: and past forward they could not possibly, having the Macedonian camp to assist them, but Perseus by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romans, so quelled not a little the courage of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectation of their aid by the same miserable pinching of his he strangled also the heart of K. Gentius from him. For when as at Pidias he had paid 500 talents unto those that were sent of purpose from Gentius to receive the same, well content he was that they should deal up that money. Afterwards he sent unto Pontus ten talents, and commanded him to deliver the same to the K. in person: as for the rest signed up with the seal of the Illyrians, he commanded his own men who had the convoy thereof, going in with it to take small journeys, and when they were come to the utmost frontiers of Macedonia, there to ret and attend the messenger from him, Gentius, after he had received as earnest that small portion of the whole sum foresaid, being called upon continually by Pontus and set on to provoke the Romans by some hotly or other, made no more ado, but committed to prince M. Persicinus and L. Petrius, who chanced at that time to come unto him in embassage. Which when Perseus back heard, he had enough, and thought well that Gentius had done that, whereby of necessity he must be forced to wage war with the Romans; and thereupon sent out presently to call thole back who had the carriage of the foresaid talents; as if he had studied and sought for nothing more, than to reserve as great a booty as possibly he could. for the Romans to enjoy, after that they had vanquished and subdued him, Erigon returned likewise from Enipeus, and will not what had been contrived secretely between them. That their treaty was about certain captives, they themselves had given forth abroad, and likewise Eunienes advertised the Consilium to much, for avoiding of all suspicion.

Perseus after the return of Erigon from Eunienes was much dismayed and cast down. Whereupon, he sent Antonius & Calidippe (admirals of his navy) to Tendos with forty pinnaces into which number five Gallions were adjoyned: who from that coast dispersing themselves all about the Islands Cydades, might wait and guard the lighters and hodies charged with corn, as they failed to Macedonia. These ships were put to sea at Caffandreus, and first they fell with the havenis that lie under the foot of the mountain Athos, and from thence passed to Tendos with pleasure in calm seas: where finding certain Rhodian open ships riding in the harbour, they spake courteously to Eunienes their admiral, and let them alone without any hurt at all done unto them. But afterwards upon knowledge, that they hulks of theirs on another side were put up and pent in by the war-ships of K. Eunienes (which rid in the mouth of the haven, and were commanded by Dioction) he turned about in all haste & dispersd the enemies ships with a sudden terror that he put them in, & sent the said hulks & vessels of burden into Macedonia, with a convoy of ten bigantines to wait them over, with this charge. That after they had conducted them past all danger into place of safety, they should return again to Tendos. After nine days they retired toward the fleet anchoring then.
A in the rode of Sigenn. From whence they crost over to Subata, an Island lying between Elege and Achar, it being, that the morrow after the fleet was arrived at Subata, it, a, and thirty ships which they call Hippagesa (serving for the transporting of horses) which came from Elege, having aboard certain hortemen of Gaul, and their horses, made head toward Phenick cape or promontory of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Macedonia. And these were sent from Eumenus to Attala. Antenor being advertised by a signal given him from a watch-tower, that those ships were discovered under sail in the open sea, looke from Subata; and between the cape of Ephryeas and Chios, where the sea is most narrow, he encountered them. The admirals of K. Eumenus thought nothing les, than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas; but imagined one while they were Romans, otherwheres, that it was Attalus or some sent back from Attalus.

B who from out of the Roman camp were falling toward Peganeum. But as they approached nearer, they took knowledge by the form and fashion of their pinnaes, that were, by their haly rowing also and making head full against them, they were not of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then they were mightily afraid, as having no hope to resist and withstand them, considering the ships were unwieldy and unhandsome, and the Gauls besides could hardly brooke the very lea without any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were near to the land laved themselves by swimming to Ephryeas others set up their sails, and being cut upon the Island Chios, fortook their horses, and ran as fast as they could for refuge to the City. But the banks discharged their armed soldiers nearer to the City in a more commodious place for landing, where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and slew them: some in the way as they fled others before the very gate of the City, being kept out and excluded from thence: for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who pursued, had shut their gates upon them. Nine hundred 'Gallegroes very near, lott their lives and were hewn in pieces, and too taken alive. As for the horses, part perished in the lea after the ships were split and broken, and the Macedonians hauget and cut the strings of their gimbrels of as many of them as they found upon the shore. Twenty of the best and fairest horses, together with the pinnaces, Antenor commanded that those ten ships which he had sent before, should transport to Thessalonica, and return again with all speed to the fleet for that he would expect their coming at Phoina. The fleet laid ab out three days under the City side, but afterwards went forward to Phoina; and when the ten pinnaes aforesaid were returned sooner than they looked for, they set sail in the Aegean sea for Delos.

D In this while the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilion, C. Decimius, and C. Hostius, departed from Charias, and arrived with three Quinqueremes gaines at Delos, where they found forty Macedonian pinnaes, and five roall Quinqueremes galleasses of K. Eumenus. The holines of the Temple and Island wherein it stood afforded security to them all, so as there was no hurt done nor violence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romans as Macedonians, and besides the sailors and mariners of K. Eumenus conveyed together, intermingled one with another in the Temple, and the religious devotion of the place yielded them true and honest of holy,

Antenor the admiral of K. Perseus, when he was advertised from the watch and sentinell, that certain ships of burden were seen far off in the sea, set sail & made after them himself with part of his pinnaes, and part of them he bellowed in wait among the Cyclades, and saving those that directed their course toward Macedonia, he either drowned or spoiled them all. Popilion did the best he could and Eumenus with his ships likewise, to save some; but the Macedonians, who failed by night with two or three pinnaes at the most deceived them and were not discovered.

Much about this time the Macedonian and Ilyrian Embassadors came together to Rhodos, who carried the greatest authority and credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the coming of their brigants, which failed to and for ranging over the Aegean sea and among the Cyclades, but also by the conjuncton and association of the two K. Perseus and Gentius, together with a suitor that ran of the Gauls, who were coming with a great number, as well of horse as foot. And now both Dios and Palaemon, who took part with Perseus took more courage and heart unto them by whom means there was not only a gracious answer returned to the Kings, but also pronounced openly, that it was by their authority they would make an end of the war: in regard whereof, the Kings also for their parts were to be disposed and well willing to accept of peace.

Now was it the prime of the spring, when as the new generals were arrived into their Provinces: C. Aemilius the Col. into Macedonia; Q. Asinius to the navy at Orybaeum, and Aemilius into Illyri- cum, whose commiion was to levy war against Gentius. This Gentius was the son of Plemaius, K. of the Illyrians, and Eurides was his mother: two brethren he had, to wit, Potter of the whole blood by father and mother both, and Caraventius only by the mothers side. This half brother he left suspected, by reason of his base parentage from the father; but as for Potter he murdered, together with two especial friends of his Etrurian and Epicadus (brave men of action) to the end that he might reign in more safety and secrecy. The voice goeth that he carried anonious eye to that brother of his, for that he had espoused Erinis the daughter of Honymus the Prince of the Dardanians: as if by this marriage he meant to make himself strong and compine with the Dardanian nation: and the more likelihood this carried with it after he married the damoell. Indeed, when he had made away Potter, and rid himself of the fear that he might have of his brother, he began to molest and oppress his own natural subjects: and as he was by nature given to violence, so that indisposition of his he set on fire with untemperat drinking of wine. But as we saide before, being moved and incited to war against the Romans, he assembled all his forces together.
unto Lissus, to the number of 15,000 armed men, and sent his brother from thence with 1000 foot and 50 horse against the Cevian, for to subdue that nation either by force or fear, whiles himself led his army five miles against the City Baffania from Lissus. Now were the Baffians confederat allies of the Romans: and therefore when they were first solicited by messengers to yield, they resolved rather to endure a siege than do so. As for Corvantineus he was peaceably and friendly received at his first coming into Durium, a town of the Cevians: but Corvantineus another City, made the gates fast against him: and as he gave the waite to the territory about it, certain of his oudiardsragging here and there, were by the peasants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head against them.

And now by this time Appius Claudius having taken him, over and above his own army, the auxiliaries of the Baffians, Apolloniats, and Dyrrachians, diloggod out of the place where he had wintered, and encamped near the river Geeniun. For hearing of the alliance made betwixt Perusius and Gentius, and incendi befor the outrage committed upon the Roman embassadors, whom Gentius put in prifon, he resolved certainly to war upon him, Ancius the Praetor being at that time at Apollonia, and adverified in what terms the affairs loft in Illyrium, dispatched letters before hand to Appius, willing him to attend at Geeniun for his coming: and to within three days after came himself to the camp there: and to those aids which he had of his own he took with him two thousand foot, and two hundred hotte, drawn out of the youth and flower of the Partins. Of the Infantry Epicus had the conduet, and Agathus commanded the Cavairy. With this power he prepared to go into Illyrium, principally for to levy the siege before Baffania: but this design projected by him, was empechd by a bruit that was blown of certain pinasses which waited and spoiled the seas-coasts. A fleet they were together of eighty sail, sent from Gentius by the instigation of Pantamut, to forrage the territories of Apollonia and Dyrrachium. Then the fleet

Which being surrendred, they submitted all, and yielded themselves. And so conveniently other Cities of that country one after another did the semblable: and the inclination & disposition of men minds that way, was much ferter forward by the Clemency and justice of the Roman Praetor which he used toward all. Then they marched to Scodra, the capital place and fea-town of the war: not only for that Gentius had feizd upon it for his own, as the chief strength and forrest of all his realm, but also because it was the strongest piece of all the Labecats nation, and very difficult for access. Enclosed it is with two rivers: to wit, Claafola which runnel through the East side of the City, and Barbaana on the W. Wole, arising out of the marke Labecats. Their tow rivers joyn in one, and are dischared together into the great river Osmundus: which springing from the mount Scodrus, and encreesed fil with the confluence of many other waters and rivulets, falleth at length into the Adriaticke Sea. This Scodrus is the highest hill by odds of all other in those quarter: 0n the east it hath Dardania under it, on the South Macedony, and Illyrium on the West. Albeit, this town was strongly built, by the natural site of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the King himself in person: yet the Roman Praetor (encouraged with the good success he had at the first, and supposing the fortune of the total war would beanswerable to so happy beginnings, and that a firm and victorious issue would serve him in much stead and prevale) approched the walls of the town with his army ready mustered, and deployed his banners against it. Now if they had shut their gates, and defended their walls and turrets over the gates, with armed guards bestowed accordingly, sorely they had repelled the Romans from the walls, and defeated them of their enterprise clean but they issu'd forth of the gate, and in the plain and even ground gave battell with more animosity and courage than they maintained it with persistance. For being discomfited and driven back, and in the chace hunted by heaps together as they fled, after 200 & above were slain in the very straight entrance of the gate, they put the rett within in such a fright, that Gentius incontinent sent unto the Praetor as Observers, Teniens and Bellus the principal persons of that nation to treat and interest for a fusae of arms, that in the mean while he might debate in counsell and be advized as touching the main estate of his affairs. And when for this purpose he had obtained a grant for three days, and the Romans lay encamp'd from the City halfa mile; Gentius took a barge, and sailing along the river Barana, fell'd into the lake or meer of the Labecats, as if he had fought some secret by-place to constel in. But as it appeare after wards, he was moved upon a certain vain hope of his brother Corvantineus his coming, who was said to be near at hand accompanied with many thousands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was sent But when this rumour was over blown & vanish'd to nothing, down the river he went again with the stream the third day after in the same vessel to Scodrus and sent couriers before him to the Praetor, requiring leave to parley & commune with him: which being granted, he entred into the camp. First, he began his speech with acclaming and condemning his own folly: in the end his last revenge was to pour out prayers and theft tears: and so humbling himself at the feet, he submitted to his devotion. The Praetor at the first had him take a good heart unto him and be of good cheer, and invited him to supper: and so he returned to his own people into the City, where he was honorably feastcd that day by the Praetor. But afterwards he was delivered to the guard and keeping of C. Coffinus, a marciall Colonell: and thus receiv'd he of K. Perfeus only ten talents (a mean reward and hardly sufficient to content a simple word-plaier) to engage himself into a world of danger; and being a K, as he was, to fall into this extreme calamity and misery. Ancius having entred upon Scodrus, first before all other things, took order that A that the two Embassadors foresaid, Petrus and Perpenio should be sought out and brought unto him: whom after he had restored to their pristine estate and reputation, he sent Perpenio presently to apprehend the friends and kinsfolk of the King: who took his way directly to Medea, City of the Labeans, and brought with him into the camp: at Scenida Elenus the Kings wife, with her two Servitors and Pleumani, together with Caradonius the K. his brother. Thus Antioch having ended the Illyrian war within the compasse of thirty daisies, sent Perpenio to Rome with tidings of this victory; and within few daisies Egestis himself after him together with his mother, his wife and children, his brother, and other UI. of the Illyrians. This was the only war achieved and brought to an end, before they heard at Rome that it was begun.

During the management of these affairs, Perpenio also was in great fear and affliction, by reason of the coming of L. Emelius a new Consul (who as the voice went marched against him with great menaces) together with Octavius the Praetor. Neither was he less terrified with the Roman navy and the danger of the sea-coasts. Emelius and Athenaeus had the keeping and command of the galleys with a small garrison of two thousand targettiers. Thither he sent Captain Andreae also, with commandment to encamp close to the very harbor where the ships lay in rode. Unto Emelius he sent one thousand horsemen under the leading of Antigonus, to guard the sea-coasts, to the end that in what part forever they heard the enemies ships were arrived, they might incontinent advance to the succour of the peacans and country people. Five thousand Macedonians were likewise sent to lie in garrison at Pythium and Petra, under the command of Hystias, Theogenes and Midon. After these were departed, he went in hand to fortifie the bank of the river Emelius: because it was passage of the very channell on dry foot. And to the end that all the multitude should be employed hereabout, the very women were compelled out of the towns adjoining, to bring virtuals into the camp. The soldiers were commanded from out of the woods near by.

Finally, the water-bearers in leather bits or botte's, were commanded to follow him to the sea, which was a quarter of a mile off: and thereupon they flood to dig pits, some in one place, and some in another, a pretty distance aunder. The exceeding height all about him in good hope (and the rather because they sent out from them no rivers to be seen in open view,) that they contained within them some hidden springs, the veins whereof draining into the sea, were intermingled with the sea-water. They had scarcely sunk through the uppermost course of land above, when they might see small sources to boil up, as the first troubled, but after ward they began to yield fier and clear water in great abundance: by a speciall gift (as it were) of the gods above. And even this Occurrent also enriched the name and reputation of the Captain with his soldiers. Then after he had commanded his men to make ready their armour, himself with the martiall Tribunes and the principalfor most ranks, marched to recognise and view the paffages, and to see where the armed men might defend with ease, and where they might with least trouble mount up the bank on the farther side. When he had taken a sufficient survey hereof, he foresaw & gave direction aforehand, for all things to be done in the army in good order without trouble and tumultuous noise, even at the very back and commandment of their leaders. For when a armies be affected in pronounct to sit and sit still, it is apparent that every man is not within the hearing: and to recommence under the general and commandment of others, is some more of their own head to that which was commanded: and others do least again for it: and also were affrighted from all parts disannoint, and by this means the enemies know sooner whereabout the army go, than many of themselves. Therefore to avoid this confusion, he ordained that every martall Colone should give a secret watch-word to the principal Centurion of the legion, and round him in his ear what he would have done: then he and to forth every one should deliver unto each Centurion as he is next in rank and place, what was to be executed: whether it was that the commandment was to be carried from the front of the army to the tail, or from the rearward behind to the vanguard before. He brought up a new order and custome, forbidding the watchmen to carry with them any targets to their lenticles: for the that watchman was not out to fight, whereby he he needed any armure, but to keep watch: that when he descried the enemies coming, he might retire himself, and raise others to take arms. Item, he ordained that the helmettiers or armature should stand upon their feet, having their shields upright before them: and when they were weary, to lean and bear upon their javelins, and setting their head upon the edge of their shields to take a nap and sleep: to the end that their glittering armure might be discovered a far off the enemy, whereas himself could not see in front him. The manner also of warding in the day time, and of the corpor de guard he altered clean. For whereas they were wont to stand all the day long armed, and the horsemen holding their horses bridled; it fell out to that in summer daies when ordinarily the sun is extrem and torching hot, both horse and man became weary and languisht again with abiding so many hours in the heat, and ostrometimes the enemies beingfresh, although they were but few in number set upon them and put them to trouble and hazard enough. He therefore commanded that the morning guard should break up at noon, and others infornced in their places for to ward in the afternoon. By this means the enemy fresh and in heart could never take them weary and to charge upon them. When he had pronounced in a publike assembly gathered together that his will was, that their orders should be observed accordingly he delivered unto them a speech, much resembling the former Oration which he used before to the people within the City of Rome. Namely, 'That the Generall of an army ought only to oversee and provide for all that is meet to be done, sometimne by himself, otherwhiles with those whom he hath joyed *affiliates unto him, as for such as are not called to be of his counsell, they ought neither in pub-like not in privai to shoot their bolts and give their advice. Three things indeed, the souldier was to care and provide for, namely, to have a body most strong and nimble withall, his armor and weapons decent and fit; and thirdly, a spirit prompt and ready at all times to execute any commandment on a sudden. For all things else he ought to know that the gods immortal and his General will take care: forasmuch, as in that army wherein the souldiers, the Consuls and their commander, suffer themselves to be carried away with rumbrous and bruits of the common fort, it is not possible for any thing to go well forward & come to good effect. For his own part (according to the duty and devoir of a captain General) he would endeavour and provide to give them the occasion and opportunity of brave exploits: as for them, they were not to enquire after any future thing, but as soon as the signal is given, then every man to perform the service of a doughty souldier and valiant warrior. After these good precepts and instructions, he dismissed the assembly: and the old souldiers themselves concluded commonly in plain terms, that they had taken forth a leon that day as young and raw novices, and learned in military profession that which they never knew before: neither knew they only by thee and such like words, with what content and general liking they heard the Cofhis speech, but also ratified the same by pre-tent deed and visible effect. For immediately, you should not have seen over all the camp one man idle and doing nothing: some left to whet and sharpen their swords: others furnished their head-b{e{s,}figs and bowers: some foamed their shields and bucklers: others their cutaees and cost-less: some fitted and buckled their barrets to their bodies, and tried how they could belter their limbs and rule their joynts under it: some shook their pikes and struck their javelins: others branded their swords and lookt that they were sharp at point: So as a man might easily percieve by them, that upon the first occasion pretend of encounter with the enemy, they would enter into confflct, either to achieve a brave victory, or to die an honourable battle.

Perfect also aon the other side, perceiving that upon the arrival of the Conful and the beginning of the ipring together, the Roman camp was crowned and raug again with their flitting and ruffling of armour, as if there had been some new war towards: that they were dislodged from Pyjilae and encamped upon the bank just over against him: and that now their leader and commander rode up and down to view and behold his fortifications and works, to spie (no doubt) some way or other for passage

* * * * * This encouraged the Romans hearts, and danted not a little the Macedonians and their King. At the first, Perfect endeavvoured to intercept secretly, and stop the burst and fame thereof, by sending out certain of purpoe to Parmacon (as he came from thence) to forbid him in any wise to approach the camp. But by this time were certain children been brought by their own parents among the Illyrian hostages: and look how much more carful order was taken to conceal all, so much the sooner was every thing set abroad and blured out by the prattle and babbie of the Kings servitors attending about his person.

About the same time the Rhodian Embassadors came into the Rhodian camp, with the very same charge and commissio as touching peace, which at Rome had (as the LL. of the Senat in exceeding heat & cholera, but far worse and hence there they in the council of the camp, & with greeter and & more content. And therefore when some advis'd, that they should be thrust out by head and shoulders without any answer at all: the Cof pronounced, that he would shape them an answer after fifteen dies, and not before. Mean while let it might appear what a gally reckoning was made of these Rhodian peace-makers who came about a pacification: he began instead thereof to debate in Concall as concerning the means and manner of making war. Some were of opinion and principally the elders and ancients) to give the allaut, and for to remove or bring all the munitions and defences planted upon the bank of the river Empres; for that the Macedonians were never able to resist it, they came upon them hastily and charged them by thick troops: for why? no longer ago (say they) than the year before, disstrib'd they had been of so many holds both higher and bettur fortified, and the same holdsen with strong garrisons, Others were of mind, that Octavius the Admiral should with the fleet sail to Thesaly and lay wasting the maritime coasts, to cut off & weary the kings forces to the end, that upon another war shewed from behind at their backs the K. might be withdraw and trained about to defend the heart of his realm, and therefore by force in some fore to open and lay naked the Passage over the river Empres. And Octavius himself was of this judgment, that the bank as wellby the natural site thereof, as for the forces made upon it by mans hand, was imperfect and not to be gained: & besides the engines planted every where thereupon, he heard say, that the enemies had the flight and skill to discharge all kind of shot far better and shout much more deadly: but the invention of the General Eumenes was wholly bent another way: after he had dissolv'd the assembly of his Concall, he called unto him the M. hans of the Perrhebians namely Schaus and Menapho (men of approved fidelity and wildom) and of them in general were encounterd. What kind of passages there were over into Perrhebia? when they answered. That the waies were nothing difficult and dangerous. but only that they were kept and beef by the Kings guards:he conceived some hope that if he affield them by night with a valiant compaon, and took them suddently at unawares before they looked for him, he might chase those {garrisons from their holds: for darts, arrows, and all other shot, served to little or no purpose in the dark: when a man cannot see his mark at offe before him: but close sword-fight, hand to hand pell mell, was it that must do the deed: wherein the Roman souldier had no fellow, Minding therefore
A therefore to use those two as guides, he sent for Ofatius the Prefect: and when he had declared unto him the effect of his desigment, he commanded him to sail with his fleet to Heraclea: and to have with him vessels baked and dried to serve a thousand soldiers ten days. Himself sent out P. Scipio Naevius and Q. Fabius Maximus his own son, with five thousand select soldiers to Hendae, as if they were to be embarked (for to wait the maritime coast of Macedon, lying far within the country, according as it had been before debated in Council: ) secretly under hand; they were given to wit, that there were stands and vehicles in the fleet prepared for them, to the end that nothing should stay their expedition. Then the guides, who were to conduct them in their way, had commandment, so to call their gills and journeys that by three of the clock in the morning the third day, they might affay Pydna. Himself in his own person the next morrow,

B with intent to amuse the K and keep him from all regard of other enterprises, early by the break of day began to skirmish with the enemies guards in the very mouth of the channel and place of the current. The light armour and formest hopes as well of the one side as the other, maintained the fight: for it was not possible for soldiery heavily armed at all parts, to skirmish in the channel, so uneven as it was. The defect from the banks on either hand to the sea laid chanell, contained somewhat less than three hundred paces, or little better than a quarter of a mile; and the space of the channel between hollowed and eaten with the current, in some places more, in others less, took up little above a mile. In this middle plot was the skirmish maintained within the view and eye of the K. of one side, who looked upon them from the ramper of the camp; and of the Consul of the other, who beheld them standing with his legions. The Kings auxiliaries lightly armed,

C fought with terror far off, being unarm'd in their darts and other shot. The Romans were more firm and steady, yet and better defended with their rend bucklers or Ligurian shields. About noon the tide the Consul commanded to find the third best man of his men; and so for that day the fray was parted not without much bloodshed on both sides. The next morrow by running they fell to it again, and fought not much more by reason that their blood was up, and their Romains sharpened the day before: but the Romans received hurt not only by them with whom they entraps in fight, but much more also from a number of those who flood in turrents and petry hones crept here and there; who discharged at them all kind of darts and shot, but hurted themess all the same, and when they approached once near to the bank where the enemies were, their bulletts leveled out of engines, commanded and reacht them that were outmost and farthest off.

D The Consul having left that day more men by many than before, called them to retire somewhat later than the former day. The third day he forbore to fight, but turned aside toward the nearer quarter of the camp, as if he minded to lay passage by an arm of the river that bounded to the sea. Persuading before his eyes

Now was the season of the year past, but read in Summer, and near unto the hour of noon heat. In the day, so they journeyed in a way full of duft, when the inn was exceeding hot; and even now they began to feel thirst and wantiney already, but it seemed evidently, that when high noon was come indeed, they would be more troubled with the one and other. Whereupon Antonius resolved, not to prevent his men thus tormented and afflicted unto the enemies all refresh and in heart: howbeit, so sharp fery they were on both sides and so eager on fights that the Consul had

E as much need by some cunning cast or other to deceive and beguile his own men, as to divine his enemies. Before they were all embattled and set in array, he was earnest with the marshall Tribunes, and called upon them to make haste and put them in order: himself rode about from rank to rank, by his comfortable words encouraged and incensed the hearts of his foildiers to fight. At the first they were all very busy and called for the signal of battale; but after wards: as the heat of the weather encreased, to their visages seemed les vigorous, and their voices more hoarse, and dull: say, some of them flood leaming on their targets, and rested themselves bearting upon their javelins. Then he made open shew of his meaning, and in plain terms commanded the foremost companies in the vanguard to measure out the forefoot of the camp, and to lay down their baggage: which when the foildiers perceived, some of them there were who rejoicd

F penly, for that he had not forced them to fight: so weastly as they were with travelling: and during that most Coraching and burning heat. About the General flood his lieutenants with the captains of strangars, and Attalus himself among the rest. All of them allowed and thought well of the matter, all the while they thought no other but that the Consul would very fight: for he had not so much as made them acquainted with this delay and lingering of his. But then seeing the cause altered and the purpose changed, all the rest held their peace: only Naevius of them all was so hardy and bold as to tell the Consul his mind and admonish him to take heed; that he suffered not the enemy by avoiding fight, to slip and escape out of their hands, like as he had mocked and beguiled other Generals before him: for he feared much, lest he would dilodge: and depart in the night: and so they should be driven to pursuie him with exceeding great travel and danger in to the inland middle parts of Macedon: so as the army should be put to wander up and down about through the blind lanes and over the narrow strights of the Macedonian mountains; like as it happt to other Captains before him. And therefore he counselled him in good sense, while he had the enemy within the open plain field, to charge upon him and not to lose the opportunity of a goodly victory now present. The Consul, nothing at all offended with this frank advertisement of so noble a young gentleman, said no more but thus unto him: "The day hath been (Naevius) when I carried that spirit with one which you do at this present and the time that was."
time will come when you will be of that mind, of which I am now. Taught I am by experience H of many adventures and initiatives in war, to know, when it is good time to fight, and when it is better to forbear and stand still. For this present needlets is is and booles (hasting as we do now) arranged in order of battle) to tell you what motives they be, that induce me to think it better to be quiet and not to stir this day: another time demand the reasons thereof: and let content I advise you, with the authority and credit of an old warrior and experienced Captain. The young man was blank and said not a word: persevered he was doubliers, that the Col, some impediments to lay the battle, which to himself appeared not, Paulus, when he perceived that the camp was let and quartered out, & the carriages belowed accordingly, drew first out of the teure guard the Principis then afterwards the Principis, whereas the Hostis or pikes kept their standing full in the vanguard (if haply the enemies should offer battle:) at the last he withdrew them al so, beginning first at the right point, taking by little and little the soldiers from every enenige one after another. By this means were the footmen had away without any stumble and tumult, and the horiemen together with the light armours opposed against the enemy in the front and head of the main battel before the enemies: neither was the Cavallry called back from these stations where in they were placed, until the forefront of the rampier and trench was fully limied. The K, like wife, who without any reftfull of battel had stood ready that day to fight, consented himself with this that he knew the day thereof was occasioned by the enemy, led his companies back into his camp. After the Romans were encamped and well fortifed, C. Sulpius Galca, martiall Colonel of the second legion, who had been Praetor the year before, by permission of the Consil called the fouldiers to a general audience, and before them all declared and pronounced, that the next night following there would be seen an eclipse of the moon, from the second hour of the night until the fourth; and this he did, because no man should wonder theareat, as if it were a prodigies ro ken. Also he made demonstration unto them, that it might be well fore-known and fore-told, because it as a thing coming at certain times by the ordinary course of nature. For like as they nothing marveled at the rising and going down both of sun and moon at seft hours, nor to see the moon sometimes shine bright out at the full otherswhiles in the waing, giving light only with the small stirps of her horns: even so they ought not to make a wonder and miraculous marst of it, that thee should be dark when her body is hidden by the Shadow of the earth. Thus the moon was eclipsed at the hour before prognoticated overniglht before the:even of the Nones of Sep ember: by occasion where of, the Roman fouldiers hold Callic as a deeply learned sage, and a divine Philosopher: but contrariwise, the Macedonians were troubled with the fight thereof; as an heavie prodigy, pertending and prafing the ruin of that realm and the utter deftruction of the whole nation. And surely the holling and yelling which they made in their camp all the while, until the moon recovered her full light again, was a very prognotication and predicaror of the leets. The morrow after both the armies were to hall, as and greedy of fight, that both K, and Col, were blamed by some of their own fouldiers, for that they went out of the field the day before, and Warwick not battel, As for the K, he had his estate and defense ready not only because the ene my retired the fight first, in open view of all men: and so rettled his forces into his camp, but also in that he had pitch and rangd his ensigns in such a place: unto which the Macedonian battel, called Phalare, could not advance: considering that with the smallest disadvantage of the ground, there is no use at all thereof. The Col, for his part, as the day before he seemed to have prearante and left the opportunity of a combat, yes, and to have given the enemy advantage to depart in the night-leson (as he had said) to now also be trilled out on the time making semblance of facti cile, whereas the sigall of battel at the point of day was put forth for the fouldiers to enter into the field. Well at the last, when the farrace was duly performed, about the third hont of the day, he assembled his Counsell about him: where, some there were that thought he prolonged the time on for purposes, with his difficure and unfeasible situations, and spent that opportunit ity, which should be employed better in fight and execution of some worthy exploit. Hoewer, other some speeches which, the Col, made an Oration unto his fouldiers in this wise, "Pub Nahe (qd, he a right valiant young gentleman, of all those that advised to give battle yesterday, was the only man that uttered his mind, and acquainted me with his counsell; yet afterwards, even he held his peace, and kept silence, in such a way, as he seemed to change his opinion, and to be of my mind in the end." Some others there be that have taken a general course by themselves, and thought it better to slip at their General behind his back than to admonish him to his face.
For me, I will not think much nor make it dainty, to render a reason both to you, O PJN, and to them also who have thought the same that you did (altho' they carried it more secretly) why I made such stay and deferred battel, For, so far off, and 1 by repelling on our yesterdays reports, that I am of this belief, as how that means and politic alone missed the whole ar my. And because none of you may think that I have taken up in a pitch; and hold that opinion of mine without just cause, let him consider & dispute together with me (if he think so good) what advantages the enemies had, & how many things made us, first and formost how far they furnis us in number, assured I am that none of you either was ignorant before, or could chuse but observe and mark yesterday, seeing their army how it was thrilled and throng left behind to guard the carriage, we yet we at last the most towards the keeping of our baggage. But suppose we had been all there together. How then think we, I pray you,that

As we have not enough of it, even out of this very camp wherein we have reeled one whole night, to go either this day or to morrow at the farthest, with the leave and power of the gods into the field, if you shall to think good? Skillett it not indeed, and is it all one, to bid a loundier take arms, whom neither the travel of this dayes journey, nor toll of laborious work hath tainted and wearied, but is at quiet, yea andireth within his tent & so to bring him forth into the field for a battel lusty and strong, full of bodily vigour of heart: or to outer and expose unto the enemy who is hearty and breth, who hath taken his rest and ease, & hath brought with him to a fight, his strength entire and whole not foiled or spent upon any occasion: to pretend, I say, unto such an enemy, a loundier tried with long journey upon the way, wearied with carrying carrying his burden all molten to sweat and dropping therewith, his throat torched for thirst, his face and eyes full of dust, and all his body arrayed against the noon-him, now tell me, by the eye to the gods, what is he that being in this so good a plight, were he the vertest bearand coward otherwise in another country could not fold and beat out of the field the hardiest & most valiant man that is? Moreover, what should I say how material & important this also was that our enemies had marshalled their battalions with great leisure after long time of rest: that they had repaired and refreshed their own strength, & flood ranged every man orderly in his own rank, whereas we were at one instant both hastily to embattel and set our men in array,yea, and also to fall to skirmish bell melt without all order? But may some men say, True it is, our battel indeed we should have had much out of square and shimbled in great confusion: yet our camp was well fortified; we had forecastl and provided for good watering, the pallege thereof was good.

C & so be reason of strong guards placed every way: & all coasts were cleared about us by our espials. Nay, I wis, but contrariwise, nothing (to say truly) was ours, but the bare & naked plain field where we were to fight. Your ancelors in times past, efceem ed a camp fortified with rampiers and trenches, as good as a port and harbor of lurking, for an army against all chances and misfortunes whatsoever: from then to high forth, & thither to retire for safety, after they had been toiled and beaten with the tempest of a battel. And therefore when it was emplaced round about with good defences, they had a care also to erect & strengthen it with strong guards for a much as he that hath lost his camp is turned out of it is ever holde for vanquished, norwithstanding he won the day & had the better in the field. The hold of a camp iereth for a place of retreat to the conqueror: & refuge to the conquered. How many armies could

D I reckon whilshaving iped but badly in the battel, were driven to take their leisters yet after wards leeing their time, and trying their vantage otherwhiles failed forth & in the turning of an hand replied and dillcomet the enemy, for all his former victory? This test and retreat of foildiers in time of war, remembeleth as a man would say, another native country of theirs: the rampier setteth instead of walls the tent and pavilion is to every loundier his house and home, & And should we have fought indeed like vagabonds without any place of mansion wherunto we might betake our selves after victor? But against these difficulties and empeachment of giving of battel, this one thing is objected: How and if the enemy (say home) had gone his winces last night between what a foul deal of trouble & sorrow should we have endured again in pursuing him as far as to the heart, say, to the farthest confines of Macedon: But I for my part verily hold this

F for certain, that if he had ever meant to have flarted from hence, he would never have laid thus here as he hath done, nor brought his forces out into the field. For how much more easie was it, for him to depart & be gone when we were farther off, then now when we are ready to tread upon his heels, and go over his back? Surely he could not possibly have given us the slip but we should have been aware of his dislodging either by day or night. But, &say he had gone his waies, what could we have wished more at the gods hands; than to set upon the back part of the enemies in the open plain ground, departing in disarray disband one from another, & they abandoning their fort and strong hold, and whole camp intact more faire upon an exceeding high and steep bank of ariver, fortothrighted also with a rampier, and many a fence and turrett beside we gave the venture to affunk? Lo, what the catle were, why the battel was put off from yesterdays to this prent, For I must tell you, I am as willing my self to try the fortune of a field as any other; and to that end became the advenues to the enemy over the river. Empus were stopped up agaist us. I have found a new way through another pass and strait, by dissolving the guards of the enemies there left; and never will I give up until I have deieted him quite, and brought this war to an end. After this occasion all kept silence partly for that many of them were wont to his opinion and partly because they feared to find fault to no purpose & to give offence, when a thing however once past cannot be recalled and amended. But that day neither, was there battell fought, for any great defrate that the Consil or King had thereto. The King wished it not, for he was now to charge his enemies, not weary of their way at the day before, nor troubled about their embatteling in such fort & hardly at the last brought into order. The Consil had no great fomack thereto, for that his camp newly pitched, was provided neither of well nor forragge brought in and laid up already: and for the pursuayce thereof, out of the villages and fields near at hand, many of the soldiers were gone abroad forth of the camp. And thus when neither of the Generals were willing thereto, mere chance and fortune (which is more powerful than all the counsel and policy of man) made means and gave occasion of a battel. There was a river not very great, near to the enemies camp, whereas both Romans and Macedoni men watered: and on either bank side certain guards kept their stations for the very security.

as well of the one part as the other. Two Cohorts there were for the Romans of Matrinanes and Pelignians, footmen; two troops or cornets besides of Simitt horsemen; all commanded by Mr. Sergius Syrus a lieutenant. Over and besides, another standing corps de guerre quartered before the camp, containing three cohorts, namely, of Firmian, Vethine, and Cretonian footmen, together with two troops of Placentine and Efferian horsemen, all conducted by lieutenant Octavius. Now when all was well and quiet about the river, and no tide provoked or challenged other; it fell upon that a tempest broke of the Romans about the fourth hour of the day brake from the hands of those that had the tending and keeping of such, took the river and made toward the bank of the farther side: & when three soldiers followed after crost the water a short knee-deep to catch him, the Thracians began to train the jade from the midst of the river to their bank side but after one of them was slain, the Romans recovered the beast again & retired to their own guard. Now there was a litter corps de guerre of 800 Thracians upon the bank which the enemies kept from whence some few at first, taking it to the heart that a countian of theirs should thus be killed becames their face, traversed very over the river in purgity of that hole had slain him; afterwards more and more, and in the end all followed after, and together with that guard led their leaders to the battell. Men were moved with a reverence of the memory of his part, as was Le General also with respect of the honour and glory of the man otherwise, and above all, with the regard of his age: for that being about three years old he did undergo the offices and parts of young men in the adventures of great and travel danger. That void space which was between the light targetteers, called Cetoreis, and the thick battallions named Phalanx, the legions took up clean, and blew within the battell of the enemies. Behind the Cetoreis was this legion and had at front them the Pavoiers called Aglafides, with repelidem or thinning shields. Those of them who had been Consul beforetime, was commanded to lead against the battell of other Pavoiers called Lennafides with white shields. And that was the main battell of the enemies. Against the right flank from which quarter the skirmish first began about the river, the Elephants were conducted together with a wing of confederat horsemens and from thence began the Macedonians to fly. For like as many new devices and inventions of men, vary some shew in appearance of words when they are first spoked of: but come to practice and try them once, and not to argue and dispute how they should be put in execution, they vanish away without effect and prove just nothing: even so at that time, the Elephants bare a name only in the battell, without any use or service at all. That violence of the Elephants (as it was) the Latine allies seconded immediately and forced the left flank to retire. Then the second legion was put forth and in the midst entred upon the Phalanx and put it to flight; neither was there any cable of victory more evident than this, namely, that many skirmishes there were in divers places, which at the first troubled the Phalanx, and afterwards disconcerted it. True it is that to abide the force thereof is impossible, so long as it keepeth close united together & putreth forth their sharp pointed pikes bent thick coupled together brieve-high: but if a man by changing the fame here and there, force them once to turn about those pikes, which for their length and heavy weight are unwieldy and hard to guide, they soon are intangled and catch one within another unto a verso: but in case it fall out so that there be any tumult made either allank or behind, then there enueth a general trouble and commotion of all, as if they all at once came tumbling down; like as it hapned then, when as against the Romans, who sbateil them by troops in sundry parts, they were driven to break their Battalione into many places, as it were, and so to make head & affront the enemy. But the Romans espied where there was a breach made and lane left between, and there they would intrude and wind in with their ranks and files: who, if they had runnopen the front of the Phalanx closed ranged together with their whole battallion, they had encompassed and entangled themselves within their pikes: which in the beginning of the conflict hapned to the Peligns, as they undefinedly dealt with the targetteers called Cetoreis, and had never been able toiffin that battallion thick and couched together. But as there was a cruel slaughter committed upon the companies of the infantry in every place five only those that flung away their weapons and fled: so the oudiers of the Cavalry departed in manner late and found out of the conflict. The K himself was the first man that fled: and now by this time was escaped beyond Pelins and with his cornets of horsemens which they call Sacred made hallo to Pela. Anon after followed Confident and the Cavalry of the Odrysians consequent, other troops and companies of Macedonian horsemens departed and kept their arrais unbroke; for that the Phalanx or battallion of the footmen between which kept the conquerors occupied in execution, put them quite out of remembrance to pursuit the men of arms. A long time continued the massacre of this Phalanx afront, afflack & behind. In the end, they who escaped the hands of the enemies & fled without weapons to the sea; some took the water and stretching forth their hands to them that were aboard in the ships, most humbly besought them for to save their lives: and when they saw the small pinnaces and cockpit making space on all hands toward them from the ships they imagining that their coming was to catch them for their prisoners rather than to kill them outright, waded farther into the water, yes, and some swam forward: but when they saw they were by them of the boats salin in all hostile manner like enemies, as many as could, swam back again to land: where they met with a thouer mischief, and were worse plagued than before: for the Elephants (driven by their governors to the shore) trode them under foot and crushed their guts out. All men generally agreed in this point. That never at any one field, were so many Macedonians defeated and killed by the Romans: for 2600 men were were there slain, and to the number of 6000 (who fled to Pydna out of the battle) came alive into the enemies hands: 5000 besides were taken prisoners, as they fled scattering and disbanded here and there. Of the victors, there died not above an hundred, and the more part by far of Pergamians; but a greater number somewhat were hurt and wounded. And if the battle had begun sooner, that the winners might have had day enough to follow the chace upon their enemies, all their forces had been utterly defeated and daunted by the sword: but now the night coming upon them, as it covered and shadowed the enemies that fled, so it caused the Romans not to be so hastily and forward in pursuit; considering they were not acquainted with the coasts of the country. Perfect fled to the forest; Porsena by the post rode away with a great number of horsemen and his royal train about him. So soon as he was entred the forest where the way divided into Funyrdy and divers parts, seeing that the night approached, he turned out of the high beaten way with very few of his most loyal and faithful friends. The horsemen being thus abandoned and lost, defir'd of their leader, first some one way and some another home into their own cities; certain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Porsena himself; because they rode a direct and ready way. The K. was much troubled and vexed until midnight almost, what to fear and what with difficulty to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Enlalus the Governor thereof, and the kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and do him service: but contrary-wise, of all those friends who escaped safe out of the battle and chanced by variable adventures to come into Pella, there would not one come at him; notwithstanding they were often-times sent for. Three only bare him company in that flight of his, to wit, Eumander of Crete, Neoptolemus of Argos, and Archidamus the Aitolian. Fearing therefore left they who relish'd to come unto him, would soon after enthrone some greater matter against him; with those three he fled still forward, about the fourth watch of the night. After him there followed upon 500 Cretensians, Toward Amphipolis he went; but he departed in the night from Pella, making all the halt he could to pass over the river Axios before day-light, supposing that the Romans would give over the chace there, by reason of the difficult and dangerous road.

The Consul being returned into the camp with victory, (because he should not have the fruition of sincere and perfect joy) was greatly disquieted and troubled about his younger son, and that was P. Scipio, surnamed also afterwards Africanus, because he raised the City of Carthage: the natural son he was of the Consul Publius, and the adopted nephew or grand-child of Africanus: he was at that time 17 years of age, and (which augmented the sorrow of the father) whilsts he followed in chace the enemies upon the spur, was carried by the preb a contrary way, in such fort, as it was late ere he returned: and then the Consul having recovered his again safe and found, felt the joy of a greater victory, and not before.

When the burnt and news of this battle was arrived at Amphipolis, and that the dames and wives of the City ran flocking into the Temple of Diana, whom they call Theapodos, to beseech and call for her aid, Dileomus the chief Governor of the City, hearing the Thracians (who were 2000 in garrison) left in that tumult and garboils they would spoil and rife the City, most hastily informed a fellow on per observation in guise and shew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the midsts of the market-place: wherein it was written. That the Roman fleet was arrived in Euboea, and that the territories all about were pitifully walled by them; and therefore the rulers and captains of Ematdia requested his help to send a garrison to succour them against their foragers. When he had read these counterfeit letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go into Ematdia for to guard the coasts thereof: giving them to understand, that considering the Romans were loollly fringeing and scattered about the fields and villages, they might make a foul havoc and slaughter of them, and besides rife and bring away with them a great booty: with all, he forges not to elevate much as he could, the fame of the forfald unhappy field fought, saying, That if all had been true, there would have been messengers coming thick one after another upon their flight, to bring fresh tidings still therof, Under this pretence he sent away the Thracians; and so soon as he law they were pass'd over the river Strymon, insensibly he flung the G. gates. The third day after the battle fought came Perfect to Amphipolis, and from thence he sent Orators to Panaus with an herald of peace. Mean-while Hypias, Midon, and Pantaclus the Kings principal friends, went themselves to the Consul, and intende'd unto the Romans Berrises, whether they had retir'd and fled immediately out of the field. Other Cities also bracken with fear one after another, prepared to do the like.

* The Consul, after he had sent to Rome with tidings and letters of this victory, Q. Fabius his own son, together with L. Lentulus and Q. Mertellus, gave the spoil of the enemies army thus lying deserted, unto his footmen: but the horsemen he allowed the booty of all the territory round about, with condition, that they should not be absent from the camp more than two nights. Then, he removed nearer unto the sea and lodg'd about Pydna, first Berrises (as is beforeold) yeelded; then Thessalonica and Pelion and consequently, all Macedonia while-teen within two days was surrendred. But the Pydneans who were next unto him, as yet were beholding with sending their embassadors: the reason was, for that the confud confuion cloudier of many nations, and the disorder'd multitude of those that fled out of the field, and were all met there together, hinder'd the counsel and content of the whole City: so as the gates were not only took but also mur'd up. Now were Midon and Pantaclus sent to part under the walls with holo, who lay there with a garrison: by whose means the whole troop and multitude of armed men was sent away, the City rendred up and the pillar given to the fouldiers.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and fortieth Book.

Percius was taken prisoner by Psmylus Paulus in Samothracia, when Antiochus, King of Syria besieg'd Ptolomæus and Cleopatra, King and Queen of Egypt, Embassadors were sent from the Senate of Rome, willing Antiochus to give over, and besiege no more an effeclive King unto them: but when The five and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

When he made answer to this, their message delivered, that he would consider better what he had to do, Popilius one of the said Embassy's with his rood that he had in his hand drew a circle about the king, and charged him to give him another answer before he went out of that circle: by which under-though, and blush behavior, he forced Antiochus to lay away arms and forsook war. Divers Embassadors of States and Kings came with congratulation, and were admitted into the Senate. As for that of the Rhodian besiegers in the late war they stood out and took part against the Roman: it was excluded. The morrow after, when it was debated in council about making war upon the Rhodians, the Embassadors pleaded the cause of their country in the Senate: So, they neither had a friendly dispatch and forswore, as allied sovranets yet were bent away as preferred enemies. Macedonia was now reduced into the form of a Province, Amylius Paulus triumphed, notwithstanding the conduct of his own soldiers, disconsolat for that they were pinched & curs'd short in the pillage: & although Ser, Sulpius Galba interpret'd himself & gain'd it, He led before his chariot Perucus with his three sons. And that the joy of this triumph of his should not be entire and accomplished, but that it was with the death of his two sons: the one died before, the other after the fighting. The Court took a review of the City, in which were a seal'd and enrolled in their fabulous books 312,005 citizens. Brutius King of Bithynia repaired to Rome, he rejoys with the Senate in their behalf for the victory and conquest of Macedon, where he commended unto the Senate his son Nicomedes. This he misdain'd King, made all of slattery, pam'd himself the un-franchised vafl'd of the people of Rome.

Quintus Fabius, L. Lentulus, and Q. Metellus, the messengers of the late victory, albeit they made all the haste that possibly they could, made speedily to Rome, yet found the joy thereof to have prevented them: for the fourth day after the battle fought with the King, even as the plays and games were exhibited in the New-place, there was heard fuddainly at first, a confounding humming noise, which spread over all the companies of the spectators, That a field was fought in Macedonia and Persia vanquished: afterwards arose a more clear and evident voice, which grew at length to a open shout and clapping of hands, as if certain news had been brought of the said victory. The magistrates wondered great, and made search after the author of this suddain gladness; but none would be found: and then view it pass'd away as the momentary joy of some vain and uncertain occurrence; howbeit a joyful preface of some good luck fell'd in men's hearts and remained behind, But after that was confirmed by the true report and relation of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, which they made at their coming, all men rejoice as well at the fore-going of their minds, as for the victory itself. This joyous conceit of this assembly in the New-place, is reported otherwise, and carrieth with it no less probability and likelihood of truth, in this manner: Upon the 22 of September (which was the second day of the solemnity of Romans games) as the Consul was going up to the lifts for to set out the running of the chariots, a post by report (who said he was come out of Macedonia) presented letters unto him, which where deck'd with lawrel. The Consul then so soon as he had set foot on foot the race, presently mounted up into his own chariot: and as he rode through the New-place toward the common affairs, he shewed unto the people the said laurel letters: which being once seen, the people presently forgetting all their sports and games ran out into the mids of the circle & thither the Consul, assembling the Senators unto whom when he had read the letters, by the advice and assurance of the L. E, even before the publick frages and affidaffs, he publish'd the contents therof to all the people in this manner, That L. Amylius his colleague had fought a new field with K. Persius. That the army of the Macedonians was discomfited and put to flight, That the King himself was fled with some few of his train, and that all the Cities of Macedonia were subdued and brought under the subjection of the people of Rome. Th[e] tidings were no sooner heard, but there arose a shout with exceeding great applause, so much as many men there left the fight of these divers, and carried these joyful news home to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battle given in Macedonia, The morrow after the Senate assembled in Curia (11 l, 151) and ordained it was that public proceedings should be solemniz'd: an Act also pass'd, that the Consul Amylius should dismis all those that had taken the military oath, excepting only the 150,000 soldiers and mariners, and as for the discharging of those fouldiers, agreed it was, that it should be moved in the Council-chamber, when the Lieutenants were arrived and come from L. Amylius the Consul: for they had dispatch'd a courier with letters before them. Now these messengers aforesaid enter'd the City the 25th of September: about the second hour of the day, and drew after them a mighty train of those who encountered them upon the way wherefover they went, accompanied them to Rome: and so directly went to the market-place and tribunal seat. In forlorned that the Senators sat then in the ordinary Curia, or Council-house, and thither the Consul brought the Embassadors, where they were received and held to long only as they might declare these points. How great the Kings forces were, as well in foot as horse: how many thousand were slain: how many taken prisoners: what small loss of Roman soldiers that great defeat of enemies collo: how few they were in number that the King fled with: that it was supposed he would pass into Some: that he was in readiness to make way after them in chief: and that it was not possible for him to escape either by Land or Sea. And then anon they were brought forth before the general assembly of the people, where tem made relation of the same. And then the joy was renewed upon proclamation made by the Consul, That all the facted temples and churches should be let open: and that every man should depart out of the assembly to render thanks unto the Gods: in such sort, that all the temples of the Gods throughout the whole City were replenished with mighty multitudes and congregations of men only, but also of women. Then the Senate met again in the ordinary Curia, and ordain’d that publick processions and thanksgiving should be made for five days together in all Churches and Chappells and at every Altar for the happy and fortunate issue of L. Emilius, and that greater head of beasts should be killed for sacrifice. Also that the ships which had ready rigged and well appointed in the river Tyberis for to be sent into Macedonia, in case it had to fail out, that the King had been able to have refit, should be retired and drawn to land, and to laid up dry in their docks and arsenals: also that the mariners should be called, after the receipt of a whole years pay, I and together with all those who had sworn to serve the Consul, should have their consig and passport to be gone,

And, "he, that all the founders of Carthage, Blundisham, about the Adriatic sea, or in the territory of the Larnats (for in all these there was an army set in readiness, wherewith C. Licinius if need required should have succour’d his colleague) should have their discharge. All processions were published in the still assembly of the people, to begin * from the tenth day of October, and to hold on five days after.

Out of Illyricum, all two lieutenants of messengers, to wit, L. Lucinius Nerone and P. Decius, brought word that the army of the Illyrians was defeated: that King Geminus was taken prisoner, & that all Illyricum was reduced under the obedience of the people of Rome. For whics exploits achieved by the leading and conduct of L. Amendus the Pretor, they declared a solemn procession to be holden for three days, like as also the Latinfeal & holy- days were observed by the Consul for to be holden the * ninth, tenth, and eleventh days of November. Some have recorded, that the Rhodian Embassadors had not yet their dispatch, nor were sent away, but after the news of this victory, were called into the town in many and of such foritn, insolence and pride of their own, And then Agrippa the principal person of them spake in this manner, “That the Romans had sent them to death in securely, and that was necessary, and of that foritn, insolence and pride of their own."

And the Senate made answer again, “That the Rhodians had sent that embassy not regarding the good and profit of Greece, nor yet for any care they had of the expenses defrayed by the Romans but only in love and favor of King Perseus. For if they had been respective unto them (as they would make semblance and have the world to think) should they have addressed their Embassadors when as Perseus invaded Thessaly with an army, & for two years space perficated and plagued the cities of Greece, bejeging some, & frighten’ others with menaces of war yet all that while, nor a word with the Rhodians as touching peace. But after that they heard once that the Romans were mounted over the frontiers and passed through into Macedonia, that King Perseus was shut up and enclosed sure enough for starting any way, then and not before, they could send M an embassage for no other reason in the world but to rid and deliver Perseus out of that imminent danger which threatened him so near hand. With which answer the Embass, were sent away, about the very same time M. Marcellus being departed out of his government in the province of Spain, after he had forced and won Marcidona a renowned and famous City in those parts, brought home with him and bestowed in the publick treasury ten pound weight of gold, and about a million of Selleres in silver coin."

Paulus Emilius the Consul lying encamped (as is beforeaid) near Syra in the Odomandian territory, when he saw the letters from King Perseus brought unto him by three Embassadors of base condition, went (by report) himself; to consider the lability of this world, and the fickle state of mankind: to see (I say) that he who ere while could not rest content with the royalty of Macedonia, N but would needs war upon the Dardanians and Illyrians and levy the aid of the Baltharmans, was now after the loss of his army, as one exiled out of his own Kingdom, driven into a small land, where, like a poor suppliant he remained in foarte, not by means of his own forces, but through the religious protection of a sanctuary & priviledged place, But when he read the supercription of the letter with this title, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus, greating, he could no more pity him, for thinking of his blockish folly, in that he had no sense and feeling of the calamity and misery wherein he stood. And therefore albeit the contents of the letter otherwise were praisers of demis and abject, as little favored of a princely mind, yet was that embassage dismissed without answer and without letters. Perseus soon perceived what title it was that he must lay down and forget now that he was vanquished: whereupon he addres’d other letters in quality of a private person without any other addition at all: and by those he craved, so obtained he likewise, that certain agents should be sent unto him, with whom he might parley and comminie as touching the state and condition of his present fortune. So three delegat Embassadors were sent unto him, namely, P. Lentulus, A. Polibium Albinus and A. Antonius. But nothing was effected in this agency of Embassage; whiles Perseus stuck hard and labour’d all he could to hold still and keep the royal name of King, and Paulus endeavoured contrary wise, that he should submit himself and all that he had A to the protection and clemency of the people of Rome. During these debates and affairs between them, the fleet of Cr. Otho was arrived at Samothrace, who also presenting before their eyes fearful objects of terror, went about to force him as well by threats and menaces, as to win him by hope of fair integrity and good usage to yield and submit; and herein he found some help by means of an occurring, either happen'd by chance and meer adventure, or contrived by mans desire of Set purpose. L. Artius a noble young Gentleman, perceiving that the people of the Samothracians, who met in a general assembly, requed of the Magis tos that he might be permitted to make a short speech unto the people. Good leave he had, and then he began in this wise: "My masters and friends of Samothracia, I would gladly know, whether it be a false table or a true tale which we have heard, That this is a sacred land, and the soil thereof holy and altogether inviolable? When they all accorded in one consent, that the land was as holy and sacred as it was reported: How is it then (eq. he) that a murtherer hath violated and polluted it with the blood of King Eumenes? And considering that in all preambles and prefaces of sacred and divine service promised, they are commanded precisely to avoit from the ministreries thereof, who have not pure and innocent hands; will you suffer in deed your most sacred sanctuaries and devout tabernacles to be tainted with the bloody body of a thief and fallen? Nothing was a rite report and common built in every City of Greece, That K. Eumenes had like to have been murdered at Delphi by Eunander, the Samothracians, besides that they law their whole land and the said Temple to be in the power and possession of the Romans, took these reproofs and reproaches to touch them neer, and not without just cause: whereupon they lent Theodas, the sovereign magistrate (whom they call Cither K. Junto King Perfens: giving him to understand, That Eunander the Cretencian was charged with murder: also that by usage and tradition from their ancestors, they had full power and authority to proceed by order of law, against all those that were present and eddited for entrenching within the liberties and sacred prefiged of the Temple, with unclean and impure hands. Now if Eunander stand upon his innocency, and know that he is as clear and guileless of the capital crime laid to his charge; let him come to his anwer and plead his cause for his own defence, and shall be heard: but if he dare not hazard the just trial of the same, retire he and depart, that he pollute not the Temple; let him shift for himself and escape away. Perfens called forth Eunander unto him, willing him in no case to try the process of justice; for neither would his cause justify him, nor any favour bear him out. He much feared withall, left being call and condemned, he would bewray Perfens himself and appeal him for the former and author of that so horrible a fact: and no way then but one, even with patience and resolution to take his death. Eunander gained nought in outward appearance, but pretending in words, that he had rather dye by a cup of poison than upon the swords point, fought no mans means to live and be gone. The King upon severall occasion of this, fearing lest the Samothracians would discharge their anger upon him, as if he hade wrought his own evil, and out of due punishment, commanded Eunander to be made away and killed. After which murder committed thus rashly without al adviment, he be thought himself, and considered, that he should be touched deeply with the same frowt of guilt that Eunander was noted withal, namely, that as Eumenes was by Eunander wounded at Delphi, so Eunander by him was murdered and polluted with mans blood: and who but he the cause and contriver thereof? But the blame of this foul act of his, was by the corruption of Theodas quite ascribed another way: and he for a sum of money bare the people in hand, that Eunander was his own hangman. But Perfens by this lawful and delectable act, committed upon the person of the only friend whom he had alive, (to well approved and tryed by him in many adventures, and now berated for his labour by him, whom un to the refractory, was by a traitor estranged the hearts and affections of all men from him; so as now every man ranged with the Romans, Thus abandoned as he was and left to himself, they forced him to cast about and devise how to escape and be gone. Whereupon he called unto him Oreador the Cretencian, a man that knew well the coasts of Thrace (because he had negociated and traded in those parts) and with him he dealt to embark him in some small vessel and condene him into Cery. Now there was a certain bay under a promontory of Truce, whereina pinnace found in readiness; thither after fun-setting were all things brought for necessary use: and monst withal, as closely as could be conveyed. The King himself at midnight accompanied with three persons (for no more were privy to this his flight) went out at a postern or back door of the house, into a garden near his bed-chamber, and so with much ado having clambered over a wall, passed to the water side. Now was Oreador already loode from the foresaid creek, for so soon as the money was once brought thither into the vessel, he lashed into the deep and set his course for Cery. Perfens, after that the bark was not to be found in the bay, walked and wandred a good while along the strand: and fearing at last the day-light approaching (yet not so hardy as to adventure back again to his lodging) lurked behind in one side of the temple close into a blind corner and nook thereof. Among the Macedonians they called those the Kings pages, who were the Princes and noble mens sons chosen to serve and wait upon the person of the King. That company yet followed after the K. In his flight and as hard as the world went, departed not from him until such time as by the commandment of Cr. Otho, the public cry pronounced with a loud voice, That the Kings pages and all other Macedonians besides in Samothrace, if they would turn to the Romans, should enjoy with safety of life their estate entire, their liberty free, and all that even they either had about them, or was left in Macedon At which proclamation. Nunn; on e. once published, they all immediately revolted to the Romans, and entered their names with C. Publ. lumen, a martial colonel. Likewise Ion of Thessalonica, delivered into the hands of Octavius the young infants of the King, and not one of them was left with Perses, but Philip his eldest son: and then he yeilded both himself and that Ion into the hands of Octavius, crying out upon fortune, and blaming the Gods in whole Temple they were, for that he received no aid and succour from them, notwithstanding he humbly craved and besought the same. Then commandment was given, that he should be embarked in the admiral ship: and thither also was brought aboard all the money that remained, and then forthwith with the fleet retired to Amphipolis: from whence Octavius sent the King to the camp unto the confil, but first he had dispatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was sure enough under his hand, and that he was at the point to be brought unto him. Paulus, repeating this as a second victory, (so it was no less indeed to be esteemed) I presently upon the receipt of the message, killed beasts for sacrifice: and when he had called his counsel about him, and read the letters of the Pretor before them, he sent Q. Elimi Theris to meet the K. upon the way, and commanded the rest in good frequency to remain in his capital pavilion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there seen before, to great a multitude to run out or to feen solemn fight or pageant. In their fathers days King Syphax was taken prisoner and brought into the Roman camp, who bef데d that there was no comparison between him and Perses, either in regard of his own name or the renown of his nation, was then also but an unnecessary as it were to the Punk war, like as Cannus now to the Macedonian. Perses was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandfate only (whom he nearly touch'd in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the repugnent glory of Philip and Alexander, K. of the Great, who brought the sovereign empire and monarchy of the whole world to the Macedonian nation. Well, Perses entered the camp arrayed in a black cloath, without any of his own train to accompany him, who partaking his misery, might cause more compassion to behold of him. The influence of the people was so great who went about him to see him that for the very prece he could not march forward, until such time as the conflent his fergeants and freedmen to void the thronging of the multitude, and make way for him to go to the conflent his pavilion. The conflent arose, and (giving commandment to the rest for to fillly advanced forward a little, and rought out his hand to the King as he entered into the pavilion, and when he bowed and debaup him self to his very feet, he took him up again and would not suffer him once to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and caufed him to sit down right over against those whom he called other to concile. The firft question that he demanded of him was this: What wrong had afflicted the hands of the people of Rome that he should be constrained to encamp and bide in the war against them with so malicious a mind as he did, and to reduce himself and his whole state and Kingdom, in such extremity of danger? And when every man attended what answer he would make, he flied a good while without utterance of one word, casting his eyes withly upward, and shedding tears withal, "Then take this our final answer: If you had been young (eq. he) when you came to the crown, I would verify for your part many of the lies, that you should be ignorant as yet to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome either for a friend or an enemy: but now, since you both had your hands in that war which your father and you were against us and could not chuse but remember the peace afterwards made with him, and which we observed most faithfully, What policy was it for you to entertain war rather than peace, with them, whose whole you had tried in war and whose fidelity you had found in peace? Whens he would yet make no answcr at all either to question or accusation, the confil went on and faid: Well, however these things are thus fain out and come to passe, be it through the error and folly of man by adventure of fortune and hard hap, or fatal necessity of the defections, be of good cheer yet, and take a mans heart unto you: the gracious clemency and mercy of the people of Rome, well known and proved in the misfortunes of many Princes and States, aloud unto you not only hope but certain assurance of safety. Thus much spake he to Perses in the Greek tongue: then, turning to his own affiduus and company about him, he directed his speech to them in Latin as followeth. A notable example and rare miracle you fee (eq. he) of the changeable variety of this world: to you I speak especially, my masters here that are free and youthful gallants in the heat of your yong blood. And therefore let no man in time of his prosperity, carry himself proud and violent against another, nor yet confidently to trust upon the present state wherein he is, for who knoweth what may hap yet before midnight? But him alone I hold for a man of valour indeed, whose heart neither the gentle gale of that flattering and flattering world is able to life aloft nor yet the flattering garbs of crowning fortune call down or dash upon the rocks. After the confil was riten and departed, he committed the charge and custody of keeping the King to Quintus Flines, But after that day Perses was not only invited courteously to fip with the confil, but refpeited also in all kind of honor, as possibly might be done unto him in that state and condition of his. After this the army was divided here and there into garrisons for the winter time. The greatest part thereof was received into Ampipolis, and the other cities near adjoyning entertained the reft. This was the end of the war between Perses and the Romans, which had endured four years one after another continually: and here an end withal of the most flourishing Kingdom of the greatest part of Europe and of all Asia. Perses was counted the twentieth King after Coroons, who was the first that reigned there, This Perses began his reign that year wherein Q. Fabius and A and L. Matius were Consulls. In the time of M. Junius and A. Matius Consulls of Rome, the Senator entitled and honoured him with the name of King, and eleven years his reign continued. The name of these Macedonians was very obscure and bale, until the days of Philip the fon of Amyntas. From that time and by his means he began to grow and wax great, howbeit, contained it was within the compass and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greece, and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Afterwards it spread into Asia, and in thirteen years space, during the reign of Alexander, it subdued and brought under subjection, first all those parts whereunto the empire of the Persians extended, which was an infinite dominion in circuit: afterwards it reached to Arkhes and Indus, even to the end of the earth bounding and confining all about upon the red sea. At that time the monarchy and name of the Macedonians the greatest in the whole world, but upon the death of Alexander, distracted it was and divided into many and sundry Kingdoms. And whilst each one endeavoured and strove by force to draw unto him more and more plenitude, they dismembered and rent the whole; & so from the highest top & pitch of prosperity, brought it down to a most base and low condition, after it had continued in good effate a hundred and fifty years.

When the bruit of the Romans victory was blazed and blown as far as to Asia, Antenor who with a fleet of ships and pinnaces rode in the harbour of Phasis, failed from thence to Cassandra, C. Popilius, who was in D. Cesar to guard and watch those ships which were bound for Macedonia, after he heard say that the war in Macedonia was brought to an end, and the enemies vessels removed out of their rode, dismissed all for his part the Athenian ships intending to go forward in his voyage for Egypt, to accomplish that embassage which he had taken in hand: to the end that he might encounter Antiochus before he approached the walls of Alexandria. As these Embassadors coasted along the river of Asia, and were arrived at Loryma (a port somewhat more than twenty miles distant from Rhodes, and situate just over against the city) the principal States of Rhodians, met him in the way (for now by this time was the fame of this victory blown far) requesting him to seat fall their ships and there to land: for that it concerned their city much in fame and reputation, yea, and was expedient for their good and safety, that they should be acquainted with all that either had been done or was now in hand at Rhodes, so to make report thereof to Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit. They refused a long time, but in the end they were so importuned, that content they were to sail a little farther, and spend some in all time for to gratify and benefit a city affection unto them. When they were come to Rhodes, the fame principal citizens aforesaid urged them instantly with much prayer and entreaty to come into their general assembly of the people. The arrival of those Embassadors rather augmented than empaired the fear of the city. For Popilius made application there in open audience of all which had been done or spoken (founding any way to hostility) either in particular or in general by them, during the late war. And being as he was a grim man, rough and fierce by nature, he aggrandised all that he spake, with his four vantage and sharp language, like an accuser at the bar: infomuch as they might well conjecture and guess, how the whole body of the Senate would affect them, by the bitterness of one only Senator, who otherwise for himself had no occasion of particular ill will and malice against the city. But the speech of Decimus was more temperate, who said, that the blame of those imputations for the most part which were objected by Popilius was not to be laid upon the people, but upon a few persons, who had collud'd and stirred the multitude: for those having their tongue at hire, and using to speak for gain, had made decrees full of flattery to please the King, and sent such embassages, as the Rhodians at all times were no less ashamed than repented of. All which praefices of theirs would fall upon their heads who were faulty in case the people had the government and rule in their own hands. Audience he had with great affect and applause: not more for elevating the fault and trespass of the common people, than for laying the weight upon those that were the authors culpable. And therefore when the chiefmen among them made answer to the Romans, their words, who went about to excuse and flave in some so far as they could the articles objected by Popilius, were not so well taken as their speech which accorded to Decimus, in delivering the guilty persons and offenders to be punished according to their demerits. Whereupon there passed presently a decree, That all those who might be convicted of any deed done or word spoken in favour of Perseus against the Romans, should be condemned and have sentence to lose their heads. Some of those persons were departed out of the city upon the coming of the Romans, others laid violent hands upon themselves. These Embassadors or delegates having sojourned no longer than five days at Rhodes, departed and made sail for Alexandria. And notwithstanding their absence, the execution of judicial proceeding was not less hotly followed at Rhodes, according to the decree made in their presence. For the moderation and gentle carriage of Decimus was the very cause that they persisted resolute, and gave not over untill they had gone through with it, and dispatched all.

Whereas these affairs were thus managed, Antiochus after he had affaid in vain to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the city, & having possessed himself of all Egypt besides, and left the elder Ptolemaus at Memphis, (for while he beheld he pretended by his own forces to reconquer the Kingdom, so the end that soon after the conquest obtained, he might set upon him like) withdrew his army away into Sinis. Ptolemaus for his part was nothing ignorant of his desigment and intention, making full account, that while he kept his younger brother affrighted with the fear of siege, by the help of his sister he might be received into Alexandria: considering withal, that his brothers friends were not opposed against him, first he sent unto his sister, after-afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and send, before he had concluded and established a peace with them, The thing that made him suspect Antiochus was this, for that when he had made over all the rest of Egypt into him, he left yet a strong garrison behind at Philippi: and well he knew, that he held still the frontier Towns as the very keys of Egypt, to the end that he might with an army enter and invade again, whenever he would. And thus he conceived of it, that this would be the issue of the civil and domestical war between brethren, That the victor wearied with war, should not be able to make head against Antiochus. These things wily foretold and seen by the elder brother, were received with silent of the young and those that were affiant about him: and the sifter between flood in very good head, not by her good advice and counsel only, but also by her effectual prayers. And therefore by a general accord of all, a peace was concluded, and the elder Ptolemy received into Alexandria, without any gain lying or resistance at all so much as of the very multitude; notwithstanding that during the war they were much decayed and weakened (not only by the siege, but also after it was raised and the army gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reason that no provisions were brought thither from out of Egypt. Now, where as Antiochus should have taken great contentment and rejoiced much for this, in case he had brought his forces into Egypt to restore Ptolemy into his own estate (which was the goodly pretence and colourable shew that he made to all the States of Asia and Greece, when he received their embassages and sent forth his letters to all parts) so it fell out, that he was so highly offended and displeased hereof, that he went in hand and prepared to make war now against them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before against one alone. Freely he gathered and sent out his navy at sea to Cyprus himself in person at the beginning of the spring minding to invade Egypt, marched forward with his army as far as into Calab-Syrus. The Embassadors of Ptolemy encountered him in his journey about Rhodocleamon, and gave him thanks in behalf of their K. and mather, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: requiring withal to maintain that benefit and good deed of his, to declare rather by word of mouth what he would have done, than by deal in word and force of arms, and not of a friend and ally to become a mortal enemy. His answer was, that he would neither call back his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unless he quit unto his life as well the whole Isle of Cyprus, as the City Ptolemy, together with the territory about the mouth of Nile, called Ptolemaicus. And there with he let him down a day, before which he expedited to receive his answer as touching the accomplishment of the said conditions. After the day prefixed for the truce was past, as they fell in the mouth of Nile near Pelusium the fleets along the deltes of Arabus yeilded, Then being received of them that inhabit about Memphis, and the rest of the Egyptians partly with favor and good will and partly for fear and constraint, by small journies he departed toward Alexandria. When he was passed over the river at Leontia a place about 4 miles distant from Alexandria the Roman Embassadors met him upon the way. After greetings and salutations at their first coming, he put forth his right hand to Popilius: but he delivered him a scroll written, and willed him before he did any thing else to read that script. After he had read the writing through he answered that he would devise with his friends and consider what was best to be done, But Popilius according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech which he had by nature made a rule, spake to the King with the rod that he had in his hand, speake to him, says he, as a friend, and advise you such a thing as may report to the Senate, before you pass the compass of this circle. The King answered this for sake and violent a commandment, after he had fasted and paudent a while: I will be contented to do whatsoever the Senate shall ordain. Then and not before. Popilius gave the King his hand as to a friend and ally. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Egypt, by the day prefixed, the said Embassiers or delegates having by their authority established council alo inter the two brethren (who as yet were not thoroughly agreed) some of them failed to Cyprus, and from thence they sent away the fleet of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battle to the Egyptian ships. This was a noble embassage and much renowned among those nations, for that thereby Egypt was undoubtedly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as poxelled thereof already, and the inheritance of the King restored against the rage of Ptolemy.

Of the two Confils that year, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victory, so the other was little or nothing spoken of, by reason he had not matter of any great exploit to be employed in. And first of all when he was assigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entered into the temple without the lucky approbation of the augurs. And when the Augurs were moved and their advice required therein, they declared that there was no error committed in the appointment of the said day. In his voyage for France he kept his land leguer for the summer time about the mountains Scenim and Popigus near the plains called Maito. And afterwards he sore about the plaines with the allies of the Latinnation. For the Roman legions, because the day was not rightly appointed for the assembly of the forces at the Roder-sons remained behind at Rome. Also the Pretors, save only C. Popilius Camillus with whom the Senatus in a fall went forth into their Provinces: and him the LL. of the Senate had ordained to attend upon his civil jurisdiction at Rome between citizens and forainers, Popilius likewise that embassage which was sent to Antiochus returned to Rome: where he made relation that the controversies between the two Kings were decided, the army of Antiochus retired out of Egypt into Syria. After this came the Embass, also of the Kings themselves, Thoife of Antiochus made report that the King their matter
A matter esteemed more of the peace approved by the Senate, than of any victory whatsoever; and obeyed the orders set down by the Roman Emassadors, no less than the very messengers coming with commands directly from the Gods: and finally they testified their own contentment, and wished them good joy of their victory obtained, saying that the King himself would have been with all his power at the achieving thereof, if in case he had been joined to perform any service.

The Emassadors of Ptolemy in the name jointly of their King and of Cleopatra, rendered thanks unto them, acknowledging themselves more bound & beholden to the Senate and people of Rome, than to their own parents, yea & more than to the immortal Gods: for their good means they were first delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a siege, and had recovered their father’s Kingdom, which they were at the point of losing forever. The Senate returned this answer to them:

Gain, That whereas Antoine had been ruled by the Emassadors, therein he did well and as it seemed him, and in doing he highly contented and pleased the Senate and people of Rome. Again, if Ptolemy and Cleopatra the King and Queen of Egypt, had found any goodness and commodity by them, the Senate was very glad and rejoiced therein, and would endeavor and work it so, that they might be persuaded that the greatest assistance and safeguard of their realm resided at all times most in the faithful protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretexts of Pappus had in charge to see that presents and gifts were sent to these Emassadors according to the ancient custom. Then were letters brought out of Macedonia to redouble the joy of the victory, importing that Ptolemy was fute enough in the hands of the Conuls.

When those Emassadors were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was betwixt the Emassadors of the Pisans and Lunicnes. They of Pisa complained that they were detained and driven out of their territory by the Roman colonists: contrary wise those of Luni plainly averred that the Land in controversy had been set out and assigned for them by the Tribunals. The Senate hereupon sent five men as commissioners to make inquisition into the limits of the said territory and to determine accordingly, and there were Q. Fabius Buteo, P. Cornelius Blasio, T. Serponius Mylactus, L. Nebius Balbus, and C. Apulius Saturninus. There came likewise a solemn embaillage sent in common from Empuries, Astihas, and Alboxus; all three brethren to notify the joy and contentment which they took for the Roman victory. Moreover, L. M. G. the treasurer was ready at Putetoli to receive and welcome Magotha the son of K. Mafianes, as he should disembark and set on land: for he was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct him also and bring him to Rome at the cities charge. He was no sooner come, but immediately audience was given him in the Senate. This young Prince spoke in such sort, as the things which of them selves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced and made more worthy of acceptance by his good words. He rehearsed what forces of foot and horse both, how many Elephants, what quantity of corn for that four years space (during the war) his father had sent over into Macedonia. But two things there were for which he was displeased and could not chuse but blush the one, that the Senate by their Embass had made requite unto him, and not commanded rather to furnish them with necessaries for the war the other, that they had sent them many to pay for their corn, For Mafianes was not forgetful, but bare well in mind that he held his Kingdom as first consecrated for him, afterwards augmented and simplified many waies unto him by the people of Rome: and for his own part he could content himself with the use and occupation thereof, as a tenant in fee-farm: acknowledging the propriety and possession thereof to be in them who as Lords of the fee possessed them therein. Good reason therefore and meet it was that they also should be bold with their own, to take and not to ask, to have and not to crave, much less then to buy the commodities & fruits issuing out of the lands by them demised given & granted. As for Mafianes sufficed he was, and moreover would rest contented with that overplus with the people of Rome might leave and spare for him. Thus much (saith he) I had in charge and commission from my fathers own mouth, when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards certain bold men riding post overtook me, to let me understand that Macedon was subdued, and to charge me, that after I had signified our joy in your behalf I should shew unto the Senate that my father took such contentment therein, that he would gladly come to Rome, to offer sacrifice and render thanks to Sup. op. Max. in the Capitol: which to do he requested leave of the Senate, for it might stand with their good liking, and be no trouble unto them. The Prince received this answer from the Senate That his father Mafianes did as becommended a good man and thankful person for doing giving such a grace and honor over & above, to benefit of duty required, moreover, that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great help at his hands in the Punic war by his valiant and loyal service, as well as he obtained his Kingdom through the favour of the people of Rome, and afterwards according to equity and justice had both himself and his family right worshiply in all sorts of devoirs and duties during the wars of three Kings one after another. Neither was it any marvel at all that he rejoiced at the victory of the people of Rome, because a King who had engaged, hazard'd and entangled all his own fortunes and the whole estate of his Kingdom with the Roman affairs. As for rending thanks to the Gods for the victory of the people of Rome, let him do that himself in his own house at home: for it should suffice, that his son for him performed that duty at Rome. That and his father both had sufficiently for their parts testified their joy. As for Mafianes in proper person to leave his realm and depart over of Africk, over and besides that it was in no wise profitable to himself, the Senate deemed it not expedient for the weal-publick of the people of Rome. Mysus further-more excused, that that Hannus the son of Amicitius should be sent hostage in place of another Carthaginian (whose name is not known) but the Senate answered, that they thought it not meet to demand hostages at the pleasure of Masinissa. The treasurer was commanded by order from the Senate to buy certain prefents for to betow upon this song Prince, namely, as much plate as might arise out of an hundred pound weight of silver: also to accompany him as far as Puteolani, to defray all his charges during his stay within Italy; and to hire two ships for to transport and conduct him & his princely train into Africk. To all his retinue as well bond as free there was allowance made of apparel.

Not long after, there were letters brought as concerning Masinissa the second son of Masinissa; who after that Paulinus had vanquished Perenus, was sent home by the said Paulinus into Africk with his Canvass; but as he failed, was driven (luck as he was) upon Brundisium with three ships only, for that the rest of the fleet was dispersed in the Adriatic Sea. Stertinius the treasurer was sent to him at Brundisium, with the like gifts as were betowen upon his brother at Rome, and a charge to give his lodging.

By virtue of an act granted out of the Senate, the Libertins (i.e., the sons of freed men) were enrolled into the four tribes of the City, all save those who had a son above five years old; with especial commandment, That when they were to be enrolled at the review next ensuing, their goods also should be valued, and they accordingly entered into the libellous books: namely, That as many of them as possessed any manor or manors in the country, elected better worth than 30000 Sesterces, should be enrolled and addressed. This ordinance being thus observed, Claudius denied flatly, that the Centor had authority to take from any particular person, and much less from a whole family and degree of men, the right and liberty of enrollments, without the warrant and ordinance of the people: for say, that he has power to cast a man out of his tribe, (which is nothing but to command him to charge his tribe) it followed not then, that he may dispose of and dispulce him out of all the 35 tribes, which is as much as to strike him out of the number of citizens, and deprive him quite of his freedom and career; and is not (I say) to limit and fix down in what rank shall be enrolled, but to exclude him full and wholly out of all enrolment. This dispute and debate passed between them; until at last they grew to this point, that of the four City tribes, they should cast lots openly in the Hall and Clouter of Libertins for one tribe, in which all they should be registred and comprized, who had been villains sometimes and were even bidden. Now this lot fell to the tribe Excedunca. Then Titus Gracianus pronounced, That ordained it was to come in all the Liberrinis. Great honour and reputation with the Senate gained the Centors by this act: Sempronius likewise was much thanks therefore, because he had persisted constantly in that good enterprise so well commenced: and Claudius went not without his due thanks, for that he was no hindrance to this proceeding. In this review and survey taken by the Centors, more Senators were removed and put out of the concel, yea, and more Gentlemen commanded to sell their horses offere, than by other Centors in former time. And all those by both of them joyntly were not only displaced out of their tribes, and made no better than Exerita (i.e., to lose their voice) but also to pay all taxes whatsoever to the utmost, and look who was noted and disgraced by the one, had no relief nor hope to recover his credit and place by the other. Now when the six Centors demanded, That according to a custom and order, they might be allowed a year's space and two months to look into the reparations of the publick edifices, that they were maintained wind-tight and water-tight: as also to see whether they who had undertaken to finish certain works at a price, had performed their bargain accordingly: Con, Tremelicus a Tribune interpreted himself and denied this demand, for anger that he was not chosen and taken into the Senate. The same year C. C. c. cerin dedicated a chappel in the Albane mons, which he had vowed five years before. Also that year was L. Pothinianus Allinus enrolled a Flamine of Mars. The Consuls Q. Eldius and M. Aenius proposed in the Senate, as touching the government of their Provinces: and the LL. ordained, That Spain should be divided again into two Provinces, which had been united in one during the Macedonian war: also that the same L. Paulinus and L. Aenius should defend and keep in obedience as before, Macedony and Illyricum, until such time as they by the advice of certain deputed commissioners, had both compoised all matters and affairs as ordered and troubled by the wars; and also reformed the estate of that realm, by inducning it into a new form. The Provinces assigned unto the Consills were Peste and Gaul, and they had the command of two legions of footmen, and four hundred horsequemen apace. The Prerors had their lots for governement as followeth: The civil jurisdiction over citizens fell to Q. Caiffius, and over strangers to M. Juvenius Tavet; Titus Claudius Nero was L. of Sicily, Cn. Fulvius of the hither Spain; and C. Licinius Nero of the farther: last of all, L. Manlius Torquatus was appointed to the government of Sardinia: but into his province he could not go, by occasion that he was detained at home by virtue of an act of the Senate, to make inquisition into certain rebellions and capital affairs. After this consultation there was in the Senate as touching the prodigies which were reported. The chappel of the Penates (protectors of the City) in Velia was set on fire, and lightning also in the Town Minervum, two gates and a good part of the wall fell the like harm. At Angiinlin it had rained earth, and in Locuvia there appeared in the sky a burning flame. Moreover, M. Volcrinus a citizen of Rome gave knowledge, that in Cadurca within the public territory of that City, for the space of three days and two nights together, blood gushed out in his chimney hearth where he kept fire: and for this strange thing above all the rest, the Deificuts were commanded to have recourse into the books of Sibyls: who pro-
A proclaimed a publick supplication of the people for one day, and sacrificed fifty goats in the common market place of the City. Also in regard of the other prodigies a supplication was held another day, and men did their devotions as ever altar of the Gods: greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, and the City was solemnly cleansed and purged. This done, as touching the honor of the immortal Gods, the Senate ordained, that inasmuch as the two Kings Parthorum and Armenia their enemies were overcome, and now at the devotion of the people of Rome, together with Macedonia and Illyricum, Consuls and Prefects should give order for as great oblations to be offered unto the Gods at every throne and altar, as had been herebefore (when App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls) for the defeat of King Antiochus. Then they ordained certain deacons, by whose advice L. Pallus and L. Anicius the two Generals, might set all affairs in order, namely, ten into Macedonia, and five into Illyricum. For Macedonia were nominated A. Pollio, Zenoius Lifecus and C. Claudius, (who both had been Centurors) C. Licinius Crassus, late companion to Pallus in the Consulship, and who at that pretence had the government of Gaul continued him. To these deacons above-mentioned, men of Consular dignity all by their calling, were adjoin'd in comminution Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sulla, L. Munius, C. Antistius Laberio, T. Numistius Taurgentinus, and Aulus Terentius Varo. For Illyricum were thefe named, P. Ennius Light, one that had been Consul, C. Ciceretius and Cn. Babinus Tampilus, (this Babinus had been Prefect, but the former year, and Ciceretius many years past) P. Terentius TCornovius, and P. Marcius. Then the Consuls being advertised by the LL. of the Senate, (that inasmuch as one of them must succeed C. Licinius in Gaul, who was nominated one of the deacons) they shou'd part their Province between them either by accord and agreement, or by lot make choice of the fortune of the lottery. So Py. fell to M. Junius (but before he went into his province, he had in charge to bring into the Senate, those embassies which from all parts were come to Rome for to declare their joy in the behalfe of the people of Rome) and Gaul to Q. Elatus.

Albeit such personages were lent, as by whose sage counsel good hope there was, that the chief commanders of the Roman armies would ease no degree unbecomming either the clemency of Majesty of the people of Rome, yet debated it was in the Senate about the sum and principal points of all their counsels and designs; to the end that the said Legats might carry unto the Generals all things plotted already and begun to their hands at home in the City. In the first place ordained it was, that the Macedonians and Illyrians might remain free and enjoy their liberties, that all nations of the earth might see, that the drift of the Roman armies and forces was not to bring free states into servitude, but contrary wise to reduce those that were in bondage to liberty, to the end that those nations which now enjoyed freedom, might be secured under their safeguard and protection both of surety and of perpetuity, and such as lived in subjection under the Kings, might both for the present time find their government more mild and righteous, than the Kings have of the people of Rome; and also, if it fortuned hereafter, that there should be war between the people of Rome and their Kings, they might be assured, that if the issue of those wars would bring victory to the Romans, and procure liberty to themselves. Also agreed it was, that there should be no more farming out of the metal mines in Macedonia, albeit they yeilded a great revenue; not yet of publick lands and possessions in the country: for possible it was not that these matters should be practis'd and followed without publicans and where those intermediate &c. have ought to do, then it must needs follow, that either the publick right and prerogative of the State be annulled, or the liberty of allies come to nothing. Neither were the Macedonians themselves able to exercise the same: for look where the ministers and managers of any thing see a bootie presented before their eyes, there, occasions of sedition and contention will never be wanting. Moreover, it was concluded, that there should be no common and general council of the whole nation, for fear lest at any time the few vulgar people having by the Senate liberty granted unto them tending into a good and wholesome moderation and equality of the State, should abuse the same and draw it to a mischievous and pestilent licentiousness. But they thought it good policy to divide Macedonia into four quarters and counties, that each one might have their several council; likewise in F you may behold with good reason and equity, that they should pay the one moiety of that tribute which they were wont to yield unto their KK. Similable comminution and like directions they had for Illyricum. As for all other matters, referred they were to the discretion of the Generals and the Delegates commissioners, who might be better able to determine more certainly of particulars, according to the occurrences presented unto them in the managing of their affairs.

Among many and sundry Embassadors of Kings, nations, and states, Attius the brother of Eumenes, the noblest of all others anointed mens minds, and drew their eyes upon him; for by them who had born arms together with him in that war, welcomed he was much more hearty, and received with greater countrey than Eumenes the K. himself had come. Two occasions there were outwardly pretended, and those carrying a good shew of honesty and credit, which brought him G to Rome the one a gratulation or testimony of joy (as meet it was) for that victory wherein himself lent his helping hand: the other a complaint of French tumultuous wars and the bloody hostility of Adurna their King, by which means his brothers Kingdom was in great jeopardy. But there lay another thing hidden underneath, namely, an inward and secret hope that he conceived of honors and rewards from the Senate, which hardly he could seem to aim & reach unto, without some unkindness and violence offered to brotherly duty and affection. For some there were seen of the Romans also, who did him no good, but gave him bad counsel, drew on his appetite with fair hopes, hopes, and let him a longing; feeding him with those and such like conceits, That in Rome this was the opinion entertained of Attalus and Eumenes, as if the one of them were a friend last and sure to the Romans: the other an ally, found and faithful neither to the Romans nor yet to Perseus: and therefore held hard it were to let down and say, Whether of the twain would be more easily obtained at the Senate's hands, namely, a suit made in his own name for his preferment, or a demand of some hard course against his brothers: so bent were all men in general to grant any thing to Attalus; and to deny every thing to Eumenes, Attalus (as the sequel and proof shewed) was pliant to those persons whose desires reach at all that hope promissely, had not the sage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, ravished and transported so as they were with the amiable aspect and fawning flattery of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Sicelius, a Physician, sent by Eumenes (who resteth not secure of his brothers loyalty) to Rome, of purpose for to lie in eipial and observe all that Attalus did and to advise him faithfully if he saw him tread awry and prattle ought against his duty and allegiance. When he came unto him he found his ears already postfixed, and his spirit tempted and solicitated beforehand: howbeit taking his times and waiting opportunities he went roundly to work and stuck to it close until he had set all up again which was at the point to run on end and fall to the ground, He allieded and laid these remonstrances before his eyes, saying, "That Kingdoms have grown mighty, some by one means, some by others: but as for theirs, being but newly erected, & grounded upon no strength of ancient foundations, it stood upright only by the mutual concord of him and his brethren:* in that one of them beareth the name and title of King, wearing the diadem and crown alone upon his head, but in effect all three brethren be KK. As for you Attalus (as he) who are the eldest, if your brother be a one, who is it that reprieth you for less than a King, not only for that he feeth you so mighty at this present, but also the next heir apprant, and without all doubt like shortly to reign indeed? considering the feeble body and crazy age of Eumenes, who hath besides no issue of children to succeed him in the royal throne? (for as yet he took no knowledge of him that reign'd afterwards.) What need then is there to use violence, and to force that which of its one accord will shortly be devolved upon you & fall into your hands? Moreover, a new tempelt and form is risen of French wars, threatening peril unto the realm, which it will be hard for you Princes to withstand, agree as well as you can in all brotherly love, unity and concord. But if to war be brought, there should arise a domestical and civil dissent between you at home, what remedy then but utter ruin and destruction? Neither shall you Attalus purchase any good for this, but this, shall prevent that your brother benor Perseus; and then be able to dissemble and disappoint you all of that neer and affluted hope you have to be K. But say, that to preserve a Kingdom for a brother, and to wrest a Kingdom from a brother, were honorable and glorious deeds both the one and the other: yet surely, of the twain, to have saved a Kingdom deferred greater commen- dation and praise, in that it forth it fowell with piety and kindness, And certainly seeing the other is a curied and dethetable part even next neighbor to particulars what Eumenes and don't remaineth now which needed any farther deliberation? For tell me, I beteech you it is one parcel of the Kingdom that you reach at, or shoot you at the whole? If you aim at a part only and then upon the dimmbering and distraction of your puissance, you shall be both twain much weakned and exposed to the danger of all injuries: if you would have all, what shall become of your M brother? Would you with him being your elder, to live a privet person: or to fare better in years as he is a banished man: and namely, with those infirmities of body which he carrieth about him? or would you command to take his life away and rid him out of this world at once? Now truly to say nothing of the unhappy and mischievous issue of such gracelesse and wicked brethren deliver'd unto us in fained fables you see what a goodly fair and Perseus is come unto, who being in the Temple of Samothrace was constrained lying prostrate upon the ground to prostrate himself at the feet of the enemy his conqueror, the crown and diadem which he came unjustly by, even with the unnatural murder of his own brother: as if the Gods in heaven had been there present, to require due punishment for his horrible fact. To conclude, they also themselves, who in no friendly love and affection to you, but in rancor and hatred to your brother Eumenes, have put th'eir designs into your head, and prick you on to execute the same even they. I say, will praise your kindness, your piety and conftancy, in case you persevere true and truly to your brother, to the very end. The and such like important pertinacities prevailed with Attalus and feared deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senate, after he had wished joy unto them, and profetled his own for the late victory, he laid abroad and declared his own demerits and good service in that war, the favors also (such as they were) done by his brother, and left of all, the revolt of the Gauls lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His petition to the Senate was, for to lend their Embassadors unto them, by whom counsenesse and authority they might be reclaimed, and to lay arms aside. Having declared this message which concerned the profit in general of the realm, he made a special suit for himself, and demanded to have Eumenes and Mendes given unto him. And thus, when he had put them besides their hope, who thought verily, that after he had accrue his brother he would have required the kingdom to be divided pecesmal & diffimulated, he departed out of the Council house, Seldom had been known at any time before any man whatsoever, King or subject to have had the like audience with so great favour and apphance of all men, as he: received and entertained he was right honourably with gifts & pre- tents of all sorts whiles he was at Rome, and with the like they accompanied him at his departure.

Among many Embassies of Asia and Greece, the Rhodian Embassadors were most marked and looked upon throughout all the City: for whereas at first they were all trim and gaudily to be seen in their white and bright apparel, as decent it was for them that would seem to congratulate for the victory (for if they had worn black or been poorly arrayed, it might have been confined, that they mourned for the misfortune and calamity of Persia) after that M. Junius the Consul brake with the LL. of the Senat (and all that while the said Embassadors stood without in the common place Comitium) to consider and advise, whether they would allow lodging, presents and give audience in the Senat unto them: they resolved and were of opinion to observe no rights but customs of hospitality with them. Then went the Consil out of the Senat unto whom when the Rhodians said that they were come to rejoice in their behalf for the late victory, and withal, to answer in the name of their City to certain crimes wherewith they were charged, replying, that they might speak before the Senat and be heard with indifference: the Consil pronounced alone unto them, That the custome indeed of the Romans was to entreat their allies and friends graciously, and among other matters of courtly and hospitality which they afforded unto them, to grant them also a day of hearing in the Senat: but the Rhodians had not demeaned themselves during the war, in such sort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers and associates, At the hearing of these words, they called themselves all prophet on the ground, beseeching the Consil and all those that were present, not to suffer that base imputations of late unfurmed should against a nation pre-judge the Rhodians more, than their good defects of old (whereof themselves were sufficiently witnesseth) fland them in head. And presentlie after they had put on simple apparel and mourning weeds, they went about from house to house visiting the principal persons of the City, humbly beseeching them with tears, to hear their cause before they were condemned. M. Aurelius I aded the Pretor or E. chief justice for the pleases between citizens and strangers, was the only agent that provoked and incited the people against the Rhodians: nay, he had promulgated and published a bill to this effect, That war might be denounced against the Rhodians; also, that out of the Magistrates for that year they would make choice of some one to be sent as Admiral with a fleet for the managing of that war: hoping that himself should be the man. But this action and proceeding of his was crossed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribuns of the common. Over and besides, the Pretor, to say a truth, had broached this matter after a new and strange fashion, and to the evil example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his own head alone, without asking the advice of the Senat, or making the Consil acquainted therewith; and that in this manner and form. Pleaseth it you, and is it your will that war be proclaimed against the Rhodians? whereas always before-time, in question of war, the Senat's advice was first taken, and then the thing was proposed unto the people. Likewise the Tribuns of the commons for their part did more than they might, and acting not warrantable by any precedent. For it was a custom and tradition observed ever of old, that no person should interpole his negative to cross any bill, before that private men in particular had their course and item granted, both to perpetuate or diffwade the same, by which means many a time it fell out, that even they who never pretended nor meant to oppose themselves, being moved and induced by the reasons of those that stood up to diffwade, and perceiving also by them the inconveniences of such a bill, would step between and interpose. D. E adad all ye, and contrary wise, such as came of purpose to cross and nip the same, being convinced by the authority and borne down by the important arguments alleged by those that enforced the said bill, would desist and forswear. Thus the Pretors and Tribuns strove much who should do everything more uneasibly than others. The Tribuns impeached and said the names of the Pretor, interfering his negative before the time, and delaying the matter until the coming of the L. General. E. Whether we have transgressed and offended ye, or no, that yet remaineth doubtful: but sure we are of this, that we suffer all punishments and shameful ignominy already that can be devised. Heretofore, when the Carthaginians were vanquished, when Philip, when Antochus was overthrown, we came to Rome: from our publick lodging provided for us at the charges of the City, we preened our selves (my LL.) into your Counsel-house, to tell you our great concernment for your conquests: from the Counsel-house we went directly to the capitol, carrying with us presents and obligations to the honor of your gods. But now we the same Rhodians are come unto your Senat, clothed in this poor habit and array, as you see, from out of a base lodging and common inn, where hardly we could have lodging for our money; being commanded in manner of enemies to make our abode without the City walls: we Rhodians (I say) whom but lately ye fenced with the grant of two Provinces, Licia and Caria, and whom ye grace with all kind of honors, and enriched with all manner of gifts and rewards. You ordain as we hear say that the Macedonians and Ilyrians should live free, notwithstanding they were in servitude before they levied war against you. Neither speak we this in envy or repine for any mans welfare and good estate. For we acknowledge therein the rare clemency of the people of Rome, and will ye then make the Rhodians of friends, enemies, who during this war did no more but as and meddle with neither part? Now surely ye Romans are the men that pretend and give out ordinarily, that your wars have good success and speed well, because they are just and righteous; neither do you glory so much in the event and issue thereof, whereby ye are revengers and conquerors, as for the beginning and first enterprises in that ye undertake them not without good cause. The beheading of Messina in Sicily by the Carthaginians, was the cause that the people of Rome reputed them enemies.
enemies, The assaulting of Athens by Philip, his intent and purpose to bring Greece into servitude, by his relieving of Aetna with men and money, caused him likewise to be holden for their enemy. Thus Antiochos brought upon his own head the Roman war, for that he being solicited by the Etruscans, your enemies came willingly out of Asia, and with a fleet sailed over to Greece, and when he had seized upon Demartrz, Choletis, and the isles of Thermopylae, went about to diplomats you of the empire. And last of all, Perseus by levying arms against your allies, by killing some of their petty kings and princes, by murdering other chief persons of sunny nations and cities, gave you full occasion to make war upon him. But what colourable cause can there be pretended of our calamity, if we needs must indite and peril? All this while I make no difference between our cities and that of Polygnotus and Dion our citizens, even those persons whom we have brought to deliver into your hand. For suppose that the cause I were all one, and that we Rhodians were all faulty and culpable alike, what might that crime be for which we are touched in this war? We favoured Perseus and that side (you will say) and ourselves, and the Rhodians have used evermore to succour their confederates. And for the better proof thereof, after the defeat of Philip and Antiochos we received at your hands right great rewards and a commission for our service. In case the fortune of Perseus had been so happy as yours is at this present (praised be the Gods for their grace and goodness & thanked be your own valour withal) we had come into Macedonia to the King upon his victory to require & demand rewards, what could we allege therefore? Might we lay that he had bin maintained by our money, or relieved with our corn, with land forces, or strength at sea? Was there any place by us kept and held with a garrison for his use, we able to tell where we fought, either under the conduct of his Captains or upon our own leading and direction? If haply he should demand in what quarters our soldiers kept, in what coast our ships lay in guard for his defence, what could we answer? Whereat we venture might plead our cause & estiue our selves in the presence of him, supposing conqueror, as we now do before you here in place. For by lending our Embassadors to and from you as well as to him about a treaty of peace, this is all the good we have got, that in deed of winning the love & favor of both parts, we incur the heavy displeasure of the one; being thus charged with crimes and wrapped in dangers. And yet my good LL. and honorable Senators of Rome, Perseus might truly object that to us, which you in no wise can, namely that we in the beginning of the war forgetting Embassadors to you making promise in our name of whatsoever was needful thereunto: also that we would be ready at all times to furnish you with ships strongly rigm with our youth well appointed like as in the wars aforesaid. That we performed not these promises of ours, you only were the let and hindrance, who (whatsoever the cause was) relined our offered service & rejected all our succours. Well then neither have we attempted ought as examples, nor failed in the duty of good friends and allies; but imprecated have we been by you for effecting that which we intended. How now? may some man say Hath there been nothing done or laid in your City (O ye Rhodians) that you with unaid or undone, & whereas the people of Rome may justly take exceptions and be offended with you for it? Undertake to justify and make good whatsoever hath been done, I will not, nor neither have I litle wit I tro; but I will the public cause of the whole state from the privit offences committed by particular persons: for no City is there under the sun, but many otherwheres have lewd and naughty citizens some or other and evermore rude and stormy multitude. I have heard say, that even amongst you here at Rome some have fought to advance and let themselves aloof by carrying favor and flattering the common people: and that the time was when the commons reigned and despoted from among you as the rule of the common-wealth and people of Rome was out of your hands, as in a very Anarchy. If such a thing as this might chance in this your City, so well qualified & ordered is it, how can any man make a wonder that among us there have been some, who (affecting and seeking for the amity and friendship of the K.) might haply corrupt and introduce our commons with their naughty counsell? And yet when all is said, they prevailed no more than that we sat still and failed in doing our devoir to you: for I will not over-pass in this place the greatest and most grievous crime of all other wherewith our City is charged during this war, and that is this. At one and the same time we sent Embass, both to you and Perseus about a peace. This deignment so unto ward and unlucky as it was, a furious and brainick orator and agent of ours (as afterwards we understand) handled as foolishly: who (as it is for certain known) framed his language in that manner, as if he had been C. Pepilus the Roman Embassador, whom ye lent to the two KK, Antiochus and Perseus, to warn them both to lay down arms & succes before you than it was to K. Perseus. Every City hath their conditions and qualities by them| selves, like as particular and several persons: and eminently it is in whole nations; some are ex| cellent, and cholerick, bold and audacious others again be fearful and timorous: some are given to | wine and drunkenness, others to women and wantonness. The people of Aetna (by reports) are too | haufy, hot, and forward to entreprize any thing even beyond their power. The Lacedemonians | again, be as slow and backward, calling many doubts & difficulties to enter upon the very things

| which they are assured of. I cannot deny, but that all the country of Africa in general bredeth | many a mad brain and vain spirit: and I will not say, that but our people are jolly fellows of their | tongue and can speak big, for that we seem (among other cities and states bordering upon us)
| to excel and surpass, and that to no much in the confidence we have of our own forces, is the | honorable regard ye have had of us, and the great testimonies and judgments ye have given out
| of us. But that foolish embassage of ours even then at the very time had punishment sufficient;
| being sent away (as it was) with heavy an answer of yours: and if we were not then disgraced | and blamed enough, now truly this present embassage to humble and pittiful, were able to make | full satisfaction for a more insolent embassage than it was. All pride (and arrogancy of words espe| cially) cholerick pertons indeed hate, wise men deride, and namely, from an inferior to his bet| ter; but no man ever judged it a moral sin and worthy of death: many here was all the danger, | left haply the Rhodians might seem thereby to despise the Romans. How then be there not some | also that cannot rule their tongue, but will be raising & uttering blasphemies words against the | Gods; yet we never heard of any that have been therefore smitten dead with a thundr bolt.

What remaineth then for us wherein we should purge and clear our selves, if we neither can be charged in fault with hostility, and if our Embassial hath used some proud and preposterous words more than became him, which deserve not the total ruin of our City but some sharp checks and hard rebukes on both sides of our ears? But these (my good LL) that in your ordinary talk among your selves when ye are together, we are centred for our inward affliction only & forget thoughts, and condemned no less than for some deed, namely, That in heart we favoured the N, and wished him rather than you to obtain the victory; and therefore they deem us worthy to be perfectly with fire and sword. Some there be again of you, who think verily that thus indeed we would affect howbeit they would not have us for it to be warred upon as enemies; for that it standeth not with the custom or law of any City in the world, That it a man with a mischief to his enemy, he should be straightways condemned therefore to die, so long as he hath not entered into any action tending thereto. And verily these men we have to thank, who free & quit us yet from punishment, although they cleer us not of guilt; howbeit this contention we pass against our own selves, That if it can be proved, that we were all of us so minded and defiled in affection as we are burdened, (for content we are that all go under one heart and hand will and deed, without distinction) then let us all be punished for it, and feel the smart. But if of the great men and chief among us, some affected you & others the King, we require not, that for the love of us who sided with you the Kings suppots should fare the better and escape cleare; but we request and beleech rather that for their fakes we perish not and be quit undone. And certainly, your own selves are not worse affected and more let against them than our very City is: which they knowing well enough, most of them either fled away, or else killed themselves: others of them (such as we have condemned and passed judgement against) shall be at your pleasure (my LL) to do with them what you will. All the rest of us Rhodians, as thanks we have merited none in this war, so we have deferred as little punishment. Lay the over-deal and unsparing of our former good deeds and demerits to this want of duty now, and let the heap of the one make up the scant measure of the other. With three Kings of late years ye have maintained war; let not our slacknesses and sitting still in this one, endamage and hurt us more, than our devote and em-plomient in the other twain may seem to satisfy and counterbalance. Set Phil."

of the fountains at home, * What all ye my masters (q.d.) and fellow citizens, what rage and madness haunteth you; to unwrap and interest the whole City in the fault and folly of thee
* two persons? Certainly, I have often heard of men that for their country have willingly left their lives, but to think it meet, that their country should perish for them, these are the exit that ever were known. Why rather open we not our gates and submit our selves to that empire, * into which the whole world besides is subject? As he spake these words, the multitude followed him toward the gates: which when Antinous & the thearcs saw, they made no more ado, but brake upon the first corp de guard of the enemies which they came unto, and exposing their bodies to the swords point, were soon killed, and the Town was yielded into the hands of the Romans. Eumenes also, upon the willful obstinacy of Prince Phisgale, had shut their gates, but after that he was plain the Town was taken by surrender. And neither Phylae nor Horrea was spared the affult.
Having thus quieted Epirus, and bestowed his forces by garrisons in divers commodious towns for the winter time, he returned into Illyricum: where he held a general assembly at Scodra, to which he had summoned the principal states of the whole nation, and whither also there were arnived five delegates from Rome. And there in this frequent and solemn session, he pronounced from the tribunal, by the advice of the counsel affiant unto him. That the Senate and people of Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy liberty; and that himself would withdraw the garrisons out of their towns. Forrezzes and Caffes. As for the Illices, Taulantians, Turritians in the Dacitanians country, Rhetzons and Oldiaca: (for that whiles Gentius his fortune (food upright, they had ranged with the Romans) he declared them not only free, but also exempt and pri-Cedged from all tributes. The Dacians also, for leaving Cæsareum, and passing with their armies to side with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunity. They of Scodra, Daffar, and Selepitas, with the rest of the Illyrians, were paid the one moiety of the tribute which they had yielded to the King. After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons: the one of them he made of those before named: the second, all the Labaeus: and the third, of the Agronovites, Rhetzons, Oldiaca: and those that bound and border upon them. Having set down this order in Illyricum, he returned to Pafas, City in Epirus, there to lie for the winter time.

Whilesthesethings happened in Illyricum, Pellas before the coming of the ten Legats, sent Q.
Maximus his son (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the laccage of Eginum and A-gest. The quarrel against Ateste was, for that they having delivered the Town once to Marinus the Confl, and therewith of their own accord creaved the alliance of the people of Rome, revolted notwithstanding afterwards to Persius. As for the Eginians, they had committed a late and irrefer piar for giving no credit to the same that was voiced of the Romans victory: they cruelly hand-certain Roman soldiers, who were entred into their City. Moreover, he sent L. Poffius likewise to snuff in hostile manner the City of the Eginians, for that they had perished in arms more tillly than the other neighbour Cities. Now was it about that session of the year which men call Autumn: in the beginning whereof, so soon as he had determined to ride a circuit and visit all Greens round, and to see thole places whereof there went a great name, and which were more renowned by hear-say than known by sight of eye: he left C. Sulpius Gallus for the command and guard of the camp and posted in his progress, accompanied with no great train, And being guaragede hand of the one hand with his own son Scribon, and on the other, with Alcbea: the brother of King Eumener. he passed through Thessaly toward the famous Oracle at Delphi. Where, after he had facticed to Apollo he delined and appointed those Column & Pillars, which were begun in the porch of that Temple, and wherupon the statues of King Persius should have been erected (for to fulfill and bear the statues of himself with the title Victorious, He visited also the temples of Jop.
Tempos in Lebada: where, after he had seen the mouth of that peakith cave into which they use to descend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, and know the will of the God: after sacrifcice also done to Jupiter and Hercules, whole temple there is to be seen he went down to Chalcis, to behold the fifth of Euripus; and that Island which in times past was united & joined to the firm continents by a bridge. From Chalcis he crossed over to Antia three miles distant thence, a port noble for the rode: some time there of Agamenon fleet, consisting of a thousand sail. Being there, he went to the Temple of Diana, where that King of Kings (Agamenon) offered his own daughter in sacrifice upon her altar, to have a prosperous voyage for his fleet intending to fail to Troy. After this he came to Oropus, Town of Attica, where Ambipollus the Prophet is worshipped as a God. There, was to be seen an ancient Temple, most pleasant to behold for the goody Fountains and Rivers round about it. Then went he forward to Athens, a City likewise for antiquity of fame much spoken of, and highly renowned time out of mind: wherein were many mouments also worth the seeing: namely, the citadel, the havens, the walls that reach from the City to Pyramids, the arsenals made by great Captains and Commanders, the images of the Gods, and of men likewise, so rare & excellent, as well for the artificial workmanship, as the matter whereof they were made. When he had sacrificed within the City to Minerva the goddess and patroness of the said citadel, he kept on his journey, and the next day following arrived at Corinth. A fair & beautiful City this was in those days, before it was destroyed, the forretire there and the Issus were things of especial mark, and worth the sight: for the said forrest notwithstanding it be mounted up to an exceeding height above all, yet is it full of fountains; and the Issus by a narrow ridge of land divideth two less neer together, the one lying East, and the other West. From thence he went to Sestos and Arges, two noble Cities and so forward to Pergamus, nothing in wealth comparable to the rest yet of great name for the famous temple of AEtolium, which standeth 5 miles from the City, where at this day are but few signs and tokens of the empty places from whence the obligations have been packed away: but then a rich place it was and full of those offerings and gifts, which did not pertain to that God in remembrance and reward for those sovereign fables and wretched remedies which they there found. From thence he came to Lacedemon: a City memorable not for any magnificence of there works and buildings, but for good discipline and orders there observed. From whence passing through Megalopolis, he ascended up to Olympia; where among other things there to be seen, he beheld Jupiter as it were represented even before his eyes, where he was much moved in spirit. And therefore as if he had been to sacrifice in the capitol, he commanded a sacrifice to be prepared with more state and magnificence than ordinary. Thus having visited all Greece over without any search and enquiry made, how men either in general or particular flowed affected in the war against Persia, (because he would not trouble and disquiet the minds of the allies with any fearful occurrence) as he returned toward Demetrius, he was encountered by the way with a number of AEtolians all clad in double & mourning array. And when he wondered and asked what the matter might be, he was given to understand that 350 of their principal men of name, were by Lenaeus and Tlepmon slain; who with the help of certain Roman soldiers sent from the Governor, had before their Senate that the reds were driven into exile: and the goods as well of those who were murdered, as also of the banished perions, were now possessed by their accusers. He commanded them to attend upon him at Amphipolis, and when himself had commanded & conterred at Demetrius with Cr. Olibrunus, after he once heard that the ten legs had paased the seas, he left aside all other affairs, and went directly to Amphipolis there to meet with them. To which place when Perseus came to meet him, for he having over-large liberty of poison, was come from Amphipolis & that was a daies journey off from his place, he the wed good counterance and gave him good and gracious words, but after he was receiv'd to the camp at Amphipolis, he sharply chid and rebuk'd, as men lay, Conspirators, first for suffering Perseus to range so long and so far off from him, and after the prince; secondly, for giving his soldiers false liberty and to pluck the titles from off the walls and houses of the City to cut the places of their winter harbour and therewith he commanded that the tiles should be carried thither again where they had them, and the houses to be repaired as sufficiently as before. As for Perseus and his elder son Philp, he delivered unto A. Paphburnus to be kept in safe custody: but his daughter and younger son, he sent for to Amphipolis from Samothrace and used them all courteously and kind entertainment as possibly he could. When the day was come, on which he appointed that the principal burgesses of every City should repair to Amphipolis: and that all the Kings letters and writings in what place ever to be read, should be wrote up & represented there together with all his money; he let him down upon the tribunal seat together with the ten legs from Rome, and the whole multitude of the Macedonians were gathered round about him. Albeit they had been not used to subjection under the King yet this new Tribunal carried with it a form and show of a terrible government, namely, when they saw the tiptops & highness to keep the doors and places of entry, the public crier and the sergeant: strange matters all unto their eyes and ears & whereunto they had not been accustomed, able to strike a terror to allies much more then to conquered enemies. After silence made by the crier, Polybus pronounced in the Latin tongue what the Scenat pleasure was to be done, and what himself with the advice of his Concellor & assistant about him that he had thought upon and set down: all which points Cr. Olibrunus the Pretor (or he was in place) interpreted and related again in the Greek language. Improbly they ordained the Lacedemonians to be free, to have and enjoy the same Cities and territories, to use and exercise their own Laws to create yearly Magnifies, and to pay half of that tribute to the people of Rome: which they used to pay unto their Kings. Item, to divide Macedonia into 4 quarters: The one, and that the principal for to contain all the country between the 2 rivers Strymon and Nestus; to which part there should be laid the tract on the farther side of the river Nestus Eastward (where Persius held Towns, Cities and Islands: excepting Axios, Mrenus, and Abdon; also beyond Strymus Westward, all the Bilisitque territory together with Heraclea, which they call Syntica. For the second, all those parts which on the East side the river Strymon enclosed except Syntica, Heraclea, and the Bisaltes: also on the West, whatsoever is bounded with the river Axios, together with the Peoniants lying to it, which inhabit upon the river Axios Eastward. The third quarter was that, which Axios from the east and Peneus the river from the west do compass and to the north-side is limited with the mountain Bona, and to this portion was ceded the tract of Pomia, which coasteth along the river Axios toward the west: Edfessalo & Berbae were annexed there. The fourth was beyond the mountain Bona, confining on the one side upon Illyricum, and on the other upon Epirus. The head cities of every quarter where they should hold their sessions and consults, he appointed these: For the first Amphipolis: The Galatae for the second: in the third Pella, & Pelagonia in the fourth. To these places he ordained that they should then sessions and consults and hold the assemblies of each quarter thither the money to be brought there and the magistrates to be created, Item, he declared and pronounced that it should not be lawful for any person to contract marriage, neither to have commerce & traffic together in buying or selling of lands or tenements without the limits of their own division, Item, that in their mines they should no more dig for tin and gold: but for Iron and brass they had permission, And those that had the profit thereof were to pay the one half of the old rent, which they were wont to yeeld and grant unto the King, Item, he forbade...

A had them to use any more forrain fall brought from out of other parts, when the Dardanians put in their claim for Paonia, for that it had sometime been their appurtenance and also confined upon their country; he pronounced freedom to all those who had been subjects to S. Perseus. But afterwards, when they could not obtain Paonia, he granted unto them the commodity of the traffic for fat; and he charged the inhabitants of the said country to carry it to Stobi in Paonia, and he fet them down a certain price. In he debarr them from selling any ship-timber themselves; and from suffering any others. Unto those countries which bordered upon the Barbarians (and except the third quarter all the rest confined upon them) he granted that they might keep armed garrisons upon their frontiers and marches. These Acts and ordinances thus published the first day of the session, wrought diversly in the minds of men. Freedom granted beyond their expectation, and the easement in the yearly tribute, comforted their spirits and made them look up. But by the interruption of the commerce & traffic one region with another, they seemed like creatures dismembered and prickled aunder joint-meal; so as having need one of another, yet they had no mutual & reciprocal use and intercourse. In so much as the Macedonians themselves knew full little how big and large Macedonia was, and how commodiously it was divided, so as each part was sufficient in itself without the help of others. The first region contained the Bifalke who inhabit beyond the river Nefum and about Smyron, the most valiant men of all the rest: besides, it hath many proper commodities by itself, as well fruits of the earth as mines of metals, together with the opportunity and commodious situation of Amphipolis, which as a frontier-barriopeth all avenues on the eait side into Macedonia. The second quarter hath in it two most famous and frequented cities, Thessalonica and Chizipolis, and Pallens, a fertile and fruitful land. Besides, the maritime commodities which the havens at Torone and the head of Abydos (and it they call the port or rode of Euboea) yeeld; to say nothing of other bays lying handomely, some toward the land Enos, others toward Hellepont. The third contry contains the famous cities Edessa, Beroea and Phila, the warlike nation of the Vcteis, and many Gauls and Illyrians besides who there inhabit, notable men all of action & execution. The fourth region is peopleed with the Eordians, Linceans, and Pelagonians; unto whom, the provinces Attana, Sympholia, and Elimiote are adjoined. All this quarter is cold, rough and hard to dwell in. The nature of the inhabitants is likewise suitabe to the soil: & the fiercer they be by reason of the barbarous nations their neighbours, who one whole find them occupied with war, and otherwheres mingle their rites and fashions with theirs in time of peace.

B When Macedonia was thus divided and each part distinguished by their severall times & commodities, he appointed a general review to be made and enrolment of all the Macedonians: having declared unto them before, that he purpose to give laws unto them.

This done, the Etolians were cited and called next: and in the whole course of the commission as touching them and their affairs, more inquisition there was, who favoured the Romans, and who afflicted the King than of any that either had done or suffered wrong. The murderers were found unguily and aboved and the banishment of the exiled was as much avowed, as their destitute justified who were massacred: A Babus only was convicted and condemned, for that he had sent Roman foouldiers to execute the said butchery. This issue of the Etolians caus'd puffed up the spirits of all those who had sided with the Romans, through all the nations and cities of Greece, in such sort as they grew to a pride intolerable: but contrarywise put down & abased under their fea, as many as were suspected any wayes to have ca'd a favor and born good will to the King. The principal states-men of their cities were of three sort two of them were skillful in the art of foothing, & either by submitting and subjecting under the Roman Empire, or Winding within the favor and friendship of the KK, grew infinitely rich and mighty themselves in privit, with the publick oppression and undoing of their country; the third between, being a mean, and was cros to the othersmen that lived for the defence of their liberties and maintenance of laws, who as they were more dearly beloved of their neighbours at home, so were less gracious and of credit with strangers abroad. The favorit's and uppots only of the Romans, were advanced by their propriety: they alone far in place of government, they were employed in all embassages, and none but they, Thee being there present in great number coming out of Pelopponese, Beatia, and from other frequent assemblies of Greece, filled the heads of the ten delegats and high commissioners; buzzing into their ears, that not they alone who openly were seen in their bravery and vanity of spirit, vanit themselves for the hoists and friends of King Perseus, but many more besides under-hand rook part with him and favoured his proceedings: as for the rest (under a colour of maintaining liberty) praished in all their connells and compleated against the Romans what they could: and never would the Greek Nations abide long in their allegiance, unless the hearts of that side were taken down and broken: and their authority only cherished, confirmed, and strengthened, who regarded nothing else but the empire and sovereignty of the Romans. When these had informed and preferred divers by name: fenc for they were by the letters mifive of the General, out of Aetia, Accarnania, Epirus, and Beatia, to give their attendance and follow him to Rome, there to answer the caufe. But into Aetia two of the high Commissioner were fent. namely, C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius, who personally should summon them by vertue of their edict. And this was done for two consideratons: the one, because they thought verily that the Achaians were more confident and courages, and therefore would not obey the summons by letters, and per-adventure also. Calvilli and other the informers and acculers who made prementment of their names, should be in some danger of their lives: the other caus why they would be present to give them summons was this, that amongst the Kings records and rolls they had found the letters of the principal State-men of other nations: but of the Achæans there appeared no writing at all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them, were nothing evident.

After the Etolians were dismissed, the nation of the Achæans was cited and called into place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration: only Lacedaemon was exempt from doing service to the high court and general assembly of the Achæans. As they followed the inquisition still farther and farther, making enquiry who either in publick or private had taken part with the King, they extended their condemnation as far as into Aetias, and sent Lacedaemon and the city of Athena, in the Ille Lesbo, to translate the inhabitants thereof to Methymna: the pretence was, for that they had given harbor to their haven to the provisions of Antiochus the Kings Admiral, at what time as he hove and ranged about Lesbos with his pinasses. Two there were that I loot their headsmen of quality and great worth, to wit, Andronicus the Etonian of Andonicus, for that he followed his father and bare arms against the people of Rome: and Nicer a Theban, by whose advice and persuasion they had contracted a league with Perseus.

After this enquet of foreign canties interpolated and coming between the assembly of the Macedonians was called again: wherein as touching the state of Macedonia, pronounced and published it was, That there should be certain Senators chosen, whom they called Synodiki, by whom counsel the common-weal should be managed and governed. After this, were the names read of the principal Macedonians, whom he appointed (together with their children as many as were above fifteen years of age) to go before into Italy, This at first was thought to be an hard and cruel course, but an it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians that it was all done for their liberty. For nominated there were, the Kings friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies the Admirals of the fleets and the Captains of the garrisons who were wont to lev. the King baily, but to over-rule others proudly and imperiously: some exceeding rich and wealthy others spending above the proportion of their revenues and living; all faring at their table, and arrayed in apparel as KK, not one caring with him the civil mind of a good citizen, not one that could abide to hear of laws or of equality. All thefe therefore who had been employed in any ministry or service about the King even in the alo who had been used in the least embassages that were had commandment to depart out of Macedonia and to go into Italy: and look who obeyed not this edict, were threatened with death. Unto Macedonia he gave laws, with such diligent care and good regard, as if he had reckoned them not for enemies vanquished, but for allies of good defer: ich laws (I say) as the very præfide and trial of long time (the only corrector of all statutes) was not able upon that occasion, to check and control.

After these tedious affairs were finished, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a solemnity of games and diptop at Amphipolis, which long before he had intended, and for the intimation whereof he had both sent out his messengers to the States of Asia and to the KK, and also himself in his circuit and visitation of the Greek Cities, had given warning to the great men and principal citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cunning, dextrous, and artificial actors, that made profefion of such plaies and pallimes: besides a fort of wretellers, champions, and brave horites of the best kind & breed. Also divers embassages with their beasts for sacrifices, and whatsoever else was usually done of course, at the great and solemn gamings in Greece. Thus it came to pass, that men admired not only his magnificence, but his wives also in exhibiting these shews and fights wherein the Romans at that time were altogether rude and ignorant. Moreover, he feast and banketted the Embass in the same summptuous manfe and respective consideration. And this(by report) was an epiphany and common thing of his,
That none could make feasts and let forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field.
Having represented these solemnities of all sorts and bestowed all the brazen shields on shipboard; alio other armor and weapons of this kind, he piled upon a mighty heap: and after his prayers made to Mars, Mercury, dame Lut and other Gods and Goddesses into whom of right and duty apportioned to consecrate and dedicate the ipoils of enemies himself the General with his own hands put under a burning torch, and kind the fire. and after him all the martial-colonels flan-ding round about cast every man his fire-brand, and for all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great assembly of Europe & Asia where there was such a confluence of people from all parts, as well to testify their joy in his behalf as to see the shews and diptop: in that meeting, I say, of so great armies of sea-servitors and land-soldiers, there was that plenty of all things and demand of vixuhs, that Amphiboli the General, of that exceeding store and abundance, gave much away freely to private persons to cities and nations, not for their present use, but also to carry home with them into their countries. And this multitude there assembled took not more pleasure either in beholding the stage-plaies acted, or seeing men prudent feats of bodily strength and activity, or the running of horses in the race, as in viewing the Macedonian boot and pillage laid all abroad to be seen; namely, of Statues, and painted tables, of rich cloth of taffey, of vessels in gold, in ver, in copper, and ivory made so curiously wrought in that teoil plac and city of Pella, not only to serve for a present view and no more (like those that the Kings Palace of * Alexandrias was reple-nified with) but also for continual and everlasting use. These were all embarked, and committed to the charge of Cu. Obliasius to be transporte to Rome. Punish after he had given the Embasdors a gracious and courteous farewell, passed over the River Strymon, and lodged within a mile of Amphiboli. From thence he disdolged and journeyed until he came on the fifth day as far as Pella.
A Pelus. And palling by the City, he abode two daies at a place which they call Spelunca, and then he sent P. Nasiem, and Q. Maximus his own for with part of the forces in an expedition, to give the wall unto those Illyrians, who had luccoured Perseus in his wars, but hecommanded them to meet him at Oriens. Himself marching toward Epirus, at the fifteenth remore arrived at Paffaron. Not far from thence lay Ammia encamp'd : unto whom he dispatched his letters, to the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution signifying therein, that the Senat granted to the army the pillage of all the Cities of Epirus, which had revolted unto Perseus: which done, he tuborned certain Centurions, and sent them into all the Towns with instructions, to give out that his coming was to withdraw all the garrisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirots should enjoy their freedom as well as the Macedonians.

B So to be hummouned out of every City ten of the chief to repair unto him. And when he had charged & commanded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and silver which they had, he sent out certain cohorts and companies of fouldiers to every of the said Cities: they who were assigned for the places farther remote went before them which were appointed to the nearer; and this was ordered so, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once. Now the Colonels and Centurions had their errand, delivered them what to do. In the morning twice all the gold and silver was brought forth together accordingly, and that at the fourth hour of the day a signal was given to the fouldiers to fall to the attack, and the Cities, Wherein they found the great store of plate that every horizan had made for his part 400 Denari, and the toomter 200 apiece, and a hundred and fifty thousand poles were led away into captivity. Then the walls were razed of the said Cities thus spoil'd, and those were to the number of seventieth. All the booty and prizes were fold, and out of that mafs of money were the fouldiers paid. From thence Paulus went down to the Sea side, unto Oriens, But the fouldiers minds were nothing to well satisfied, as he supposed they had been, for discontented mighty they were and angry, that they had no share at all in the Kings pillage and storehouse, as if they had made no war in Macedonia. At Oriens he found those forces which he had sent under the command of S. Nasiem and Maximus his son; there he equipped his whole army, and sailed over into Italy, in like manner a few daies after, Arrided, when the feffion and general meeting of the other Epirots and Acarnians was ended, having given commandment, that their principal persons should follow him into Italy (the knowledge and deciding of whole caues he reserved and referred thither) himself attended the ships which the army had used in Macedonia, and passed over likewise into Italy.

D At what time these affairs were thus managed in Macedonia and Epirus, the Embassadors who had been sent with Attalus to end the war between the Galls and King Eumenes arriv'd at Asia. A faire safe of arms for the winter time, was agreed upon between both parties, during which cessation the Galls departed home, and Eumenes was retir'd to Pergamus there to winter, where also he lay grievously sick. The spring was no sooner come, but the Galls began to flee and look abroad; but by that time they were come as far as the Synada, Eumenes had assembled his forces from all parts to Sardis. There at Synada, the Romans parleyd with Scheltemius the General of the Galls. Attalus also went with them; but thought good it was not, that he should enter within the Galls camp, for fear of stirring caues in heat of argument, and raising cholera of the one side or other. So P. Licinius commen'ded with the Duke of the Galls aforaid: and when he had done, he brought word back, that the more he was entreated, the worse he was and left straftable: no more as much as it might be supposed, that the words of the Roman Embassadors were of powerfull and effectual with Antiochus and Ptolomeus (two mighty and puissant Kings) as to make peace to presently between them, since they prevailed so little or nothing at all among the Galls.

To return again to Rome. First, the two captive Kings, Perseus and Geminus were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children after them, the multitude besides of prisoners, then confederately those Macedonians, as also the other chief peers of Greece, who were warn'd to repair unto Rome. For not they only were hummouned to make appearance there, who had been seen present in place, but also all those were sent for by letters missive peremptorily, who were but reported to have been with the Kings. Then Paulus himself a few daies after embarked in a ship of the Kings, a Galeae of a mighty bigness, making way with fifteen banks and rows of oars to a side, and the same set out and adorned with the Macedonian spoils, not only of brave gorgeous armoure, but also of rich hangings, ruffle & cloth of gold out of the Kings wardrobe, came up the Tyber against the stream: where great numbers of people went forth to meet him, and filled the banks on both sides of the river. Some few daies after Antiochus and Othoitus arrived also with their fleet. And to all three, by an act of the Senat was triumph granted, Q. Caflus the Precitor had commandment to deal with the Tribunes of the Commons by warrant from the Senat, that they should prefer a bill unto the common people, that those three should be in full communion of command and government that day when they were to ride triumphant into the City, See, how mean things escape the touch of envy, but the highest commonly are met with. No doubt was made at all of the triumph of Antiochus, nor yet of Othoitus. But Paulus, with whom even they themselves would have been ashamed to compare, could not avoid the backbiting of flanderous & malicious tongues. His fouldiers according to the ancient discipline of war, he had held hard to their service. And to them he had given a donative indeed out of the booty, but more ingrally & with a lighter hand than they hoped for, from out of so great wealth and riches of the Kings; and yet in good faith to lay a truth, full well he knew that if he had satisfied their greedy demands, and dealt.
still amongst them till they had cried Hœ, he should have left himself just nothing to have brought H into the common treasury. So that all this Macedonian army gave a shew by this time, as if they had but cold devotion to their General, either to appear, or to give their voices for the setting forward of the bill aforesaid, as touching his triumph and plenary power of command, when the day of assembly should come. Over and besides, Ser. Sulpisius Galba, who had been a martial Colonel in the second legion in Macedon, and in private enmity with the General; both himself and person was in hand with him, and by the foddiers alofhis own legion conciliated and fuborned on the reit to appear in sufficient number, there for to give their turrages against him, and check the bill saying, "That as he was an impetuous and Lordly commander, so he was as miserable a pinch, a peny withal, and a good deed it were to deny his grace and to crols the law proposed for his triumph, & for to be revenge of him throughly: for no doubt the commons of the City would I go that way that they should fee the foddiers to lead before. He could not forfith (say they) to give money among their foddiers liberally: well, he shall fairly know, that his foddiers yet can give him honour: but never let him look for the fruit of favor and grace, where he hath deterved none. These words set them ago, and when Trib. Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons read over and published the foresaid bill in the Capitol, and that by permission of law any private person might have spoken thereof, and no man came forth, as being a matter whereof no double question to be made: then Ser. Sulpisius Galba suddenly kept forth, and required of the Tribune, That (forasmuch as it was to far forth days, as being the eight hour thereof, so that he had not time enough to declare and flew at large, what allegations he had why they should not grant L. Asinius a triumph) they would adjourn the assembly to the next day, and betimes in the morning let the matter on foot again: for that he had need of a whole day and no less, to plead that cause to the full as he should do. But when the Tribune willed him again to speak his mind that day, if he had ought to say, he made a speech, and with his long oration held the court until it was within night: putting them in mind and alluding, "How precisely and rigorously he had exacted at their hands all military duties: how he had imposed upon the foddiers more painful and dangerous labour than need was: but contrary-wife in dealing rewards and bestowing honourable recompenses for good service, he was over-straight-laced & too short in every point and verily foddiersy and warfare it is continued still under such Captains, will be more hard, trai-vellome and rough to foddiers and warriors: but when al is done and victory obtained, rewarded it shall be with bare poverty and neglect of honour. Certainly, the Macedonians are in better cafe yet than the Roman foddiers, But it they would be present in great frequency the next morrow to deny and revoke this bill, then these tith and mighty men shall know full well, That all liceth not in the hands of the Captain and Commander, but that the foddiers also can do what the foddiers animated and induced with these serious words, reforted the day following in to great multitudes, and pelted the whole Capitol so full, as none but they could come in to give their voice. The fifth tribes that were called in, clearly called the grace: which when the principal and chief men of the City law they ran all into the Capitol with open mouth crying out upon this indignity offered, That L. Paulus a conqueror in so great and dangerous a war, should be deprived of his due triumph; and the grand Commanders and Generals of the field were now subj ected and enthralled to the commons, which gave a voice to their foddiers. In this one thing (say they) have we too too much faulted, such hath been our favour and partiality, and foolishly have we been to displease any: but what will become of us in the end if foddiers once may come to be Lords and matters, and thus to row over their Generals? And every man raised and cried out upon G iba. In the end after this garbilo was appeased, M. Serrius who sometime had been Conful and great master of the horse under the Dictator, requized the tribunes that they would begin all in annulling that which was pass, and give him leave withal to make a speech before the people. The Tribunes went aside to consult of this matter and in fine, over-ruled with the authority and comtenance of the nobles and peers of the City, began to treat afore and go in hand with all matters anew, making it known openly that they would recall back those fifth foddiers, in case M. Serrius and other privit men who were willing to utter their mind to the cause had once spoken. Then said Servilius as followeth. "Matters and friends, citizens here of Rome: it and by nothing else it might be judged, how singular & how excellent a Commander L. Emilius was in the field, this only (if there were no more) may suffice, that having in his camp such seditious and light headed persons for his foddiers, and an adversary of his own among them, so noble of birth, so rash of action, and withal so arrogant and self-conceited, ready to indire and fite up, so multitude to commotion, yet troubled he never was with any mutiny at all in his whole army. The fame severity it was in government & condud, that held them in awe and good order, which now at this present they hate & detest, And so long as they were managed by ancient discipline, so did not quench nor give offence. As for Servilius Galba if (like a new barrister, who is to flow the firit proof, & to give the aflay and handle of his eloquence) he would have made choice of L. Paulus to begin withal and accuse him at the bar, he should not yet have hindered his triumph which (if there were nothing else to diffuade and draw him back) the Senate had judged to be just & due; but the morrow after his triumph (when he had been him a privat man again) he might have given presentment of his name, & by order of law minified interrogatories unto him and forthent proces: or rather he might have fiad a little longer, namely, until himself had been a Magistrat in place, and then have gone roundly to work, referred him upon an action to answer at a day, and so accused him judicially before the people. This should L.X. my lion have had his triumph for reward and recompence of his well doing in that nobly & valiantly he had conducted this war: this likewise he should have suffered condign punishment, if he had committed ought unworthy either of his ancient glory or this new honor. But will you have the truth? when he could find no matter of crime to reproach him with, he bought by waives and indirect means to detract his well deserved praise. He demanded yesterday, one full day to accuse L.Paulus: and * four hours, even all the day that was left he spent in making an invective against him. What prisoner was there ever brought to the bar so culpable and iniquitous but all the faults of his whole life might be ripped up, deciphered, and painted forth in to many hours space? But what objected he all that while, that L.Paulus if he were to fame his defence, would will to deny? O! that some man would procure me here for the while two allegories and contests, the one of Roman soldiers employed lately in Macedonia the other more pure and uncorrupt of the twelve, namely, of citizens founder in judgement, void of all favor & clear from hatred. And the people of Rome I would have to be the judge. First, let Paulus be accused in the grand assembly & court of these citizens. Tell me O S. Galba, what would you say against him before those Quirites of Rome. For there you should have been cut off and lost all this discourse & special part of your oration, carrying theses terms, You looked too strictly & precisely to the corps designed in their dispositions: you held the soldiers too hard to their watch and ward the fetensines were neerly and narrowly looked unto: & you were over curious about going the rounds & relieving the watch in the night: for about the works and fabrick, you put the soldiers to more toiling & mole- sting than heretofore: whereas, my L. General, their inverior, over-seer, and task-master, rode all about to exact the utmost with all extremity; in one & the same day when you had the army on foot, presently from a journey you led them forth to battle; when the victory was got, you would not suffer the soldier to breathe and take repos; but caused him to march immediately & to follow the enemy in chace, whereas the booty to be parted & shar'd out might have enriched your self: yet will you carry the Kings treasur in show of triumph & then lay it up in the chamber of the city. As their be shrewd matters, like sharp goals to prick those soldiers & get them on, who think they have not scope enough to serve their disflaut looses, or too small allowance to content their covetous appetits: so, with the people of Rome they would have nothing at all prevailing: who if they should not call to mind examples & stories of old, which they have heard their fathers talk of, namely, what overthrows have been received through the indulgence and popularity of Generals; and contrary wise what victories have been acquired by their severe discipline and government: yet at last wise they cannot chuse but remember what odds & difference there was in the late Punick war between M. Minuus General of the hoste, & Q. Fabius Max. his Dictator. And therefore since the accuser might know all this, the defense of Paulus in this behalf was altogether needles & unnecessary. Let us go now to the other audience and assembly of the Macedonian soldiers. But now me thinks, I must not call you Quirites any more but soldiers: if haply there be to much grace in you, as that this name yet may cause you to blush, & be abashed for very shame of the world, to offer abuse unto your General, and vary for mine own part, I find a great change in my self, & am otherwise affected in my mind, now that I seem to speak unto an army of soldiers, that here whiles I was, when my Oration was accommodate and framed to the commons of a City. Now soldiers, what say you to the matter? Is there any one at Rome, but Perseus again that would not have a triumph over the Macedonians? are you not ready to pull such a one in pieces with those very hands, wherewith you vanquished the Macedonians? He, whosoever he is, that impeacheth you for entering into the City in triumph, trust me truly, would have denied of your victory if it had bin in his power. Lo, how foully are ye deceived, (soldiers) and far out of the way, if ye think that the triumph is the honor only of the General, and not of the soldiers likewise and consequently of the whole people of Rome. This is not Paulus his case alone. Many others likewise have been, who when they could not obtain a triumph at the hands of the Senats, triumphed nevertheless upon the Albine mountain. As impossible it is for any man to bereave L. Paulus of the honor due for the finishing of the Macedonian war, as it was to disappoint C. Lucilius of his glory for ending the first Punick war. P. Cornelius for the second or others besides who after them triumphed. It is not a triumph that can make L. Paulus better or worse, either the greater captain or the left. Herein consisteth the credit, renown & reputation of the soldiers and of all the people of Rome more than his: for fear left they be reputed & noted either for envious & malicious, else unthankful for their belt members & noble citizens, & therein seem to imitate the people of Athens, who ever more perfecte and humane with envy their belt men that live amongst them. Your eyes and all others when time was faulted this waives enough I wish in the person of Camillus, whom they offered abuse unto, before the City by his means was recovered out of the Gauls hands. Much you were to blame your selves here & overmuch too in P. Africannus. That in Literature, his manion, house and habitation (who was the conqueror of Africa) should be thundered: that in Literatures (if I say) the epulochire of P. Africannus should be seen. Let us blush for very shame that L.Paulus, as he is equal to them in glory and honor, should like wise go with them and have his part of your hard and wrong dealing. The first thing that ye do then, let he this: Out with this spot & stain of any which ye have caught so reprehens in regard of other nations, so hurtful to your selves. For who will ever hereafter with to be like Africannus who will endeavor to

Ibeifite, beaHs, neither praiies men alone; and the Eprius like wise and the Cathaginians: even to nei ther M. Curtius alone, nor P. Cornelius, but the Romans also have triumphed. True it is, and I must needs say, that the foul diers have a proper interest and part by themselves, in that they alone (dight with branches and chaplets of laurel, and every one bravely to be seen and adorned with the gifts that have been gi ven them) did round Triumphi: Triumphi: and as they pass along the City sing and chant the praises of themselves and of their Captain-Generals. And if it fortune at any time that the foul diers be not brought home out of the province to the triumph, they grumble & are discontented: yet not withstanding, absent though they be, they think it is their due: and long as their General and leader triumpheth, they triumph also; because the victory was achieved by the strength of their arms. Good fouliiers, it is a man should ask you, for what intent you were recon ducted into Italy? and whereto so soon as the service was performed and the war brought to an end, ye had not presently your congy of discharget, moreover to what purpose ye came by companies and squadrons under your enigns and colors: for what cause ye stay and remain here, and go not every man his waite to his home? what answer would ye make elles, but, That ye would be seen in triumph? And to say a truth since ye have won the victor ye are conquerors, I cannot blame you nay, ye ought to deire for to be seen and seen again. It is not long since we triumphed over Philip (this mans father) and over Autosius likewise: and reigned both they did as KK, when the triumph was: and shall there be no solemnity of triumph over Per fix, taken prisoner, and brought captive with his children into the City? L. Paulus standing hence as a private person, one amongst the company of ownded citizens seeing L. Anicius and Cr.Olca vus arrayed sumptuously in cloth of gold, and in their rich purple robes and mantles of edific, mounting up the Capitol in their triumphant chariots, should ask them the question and say in this manner: Tell me, O Lucius Anicius and you Cr. Olivius, judge ye in your own conceit that you are more worthy or a triumph than if they would no doubt come down each one out of his chariot and yeild him their place yes, and for very shame deliver up all their enigns and or naments unto him. And you Quitties, had you rather see Centurion than Per fix led in triumph? would you with indeed to triumph for an accidental appendix only of the war, rather than for the main subsittance of the war? Shall the legions coming out of Scipio's, and the mariners at sea, enter the City crowned with laurel garlands; and the legions out of Macedon, being denied their own triumph stand still and behold others too triumph? Moreover, what shall become of that rich booty? what shall be done with the spoils of that great and wealthy victory? where shall be bellowed and laid up so many thousand coslets and armors plucked from the bodies of enemies slain: shall they be lent back again into Macedon? Tho you costly images of gold, of mar ble, of every thing soe goodly fair pictures: those precious clothes and hangings of purple, scarlet, and taffeta: those mighty quantity of gold and silver brought into vesseis chafed and engraved: that huge masts of the Romans' ships: the great and coin, what shall we do with it? What shall it be carried all by night as well goods into the publick treasury and City Chamber? The goldleaf fight on all the rest, what shall you to it? A most noble & puifant King is taken prisoner, where shall be shewed the people of Rome his conqueror? What running what concourse there was of people to see K. Syphax captive (& yet he was hur a necessary to the m哽c war) most of us do well remem ber, Shall K. Per fix then, a prisoner and captive: shall Philip and Alexander his forefathers of great name be hidden and kept from the sight and eyes of the City? And there were no more but L. Aurelius himself: twice Consil, the conqueror & subduer of Greece all men would desire to see him enter the City in his triumphant chariot, we created him Co, for this intend that he should finish, and determin this war, which to your disonor and great shame had hung for the space of 4 years. To him then who (at what time as the war of that province fell unto him) and when he departed on his voyage from Rome had all our hearts to desire victory and triumph shall we now deny triumph when he hath the victory? And verily in so doing, we shall not only defend men but rob the gods also of their honor; for due it is to the very gods also and not to men alone. Have not your ancestors ever used to enterprise all great affairs in the name of the gods first & therein also to end laf? The Co for Per fix when he is to take his journey into his province to levy war, with his Lictors before him clad in their coslets of arms is ever wont to make, his solemn vows in the Capitol: after he hath acquit himself of his charge and obtained victory, when he is the triumphe, he transferreth in pomp the rich presents of the people of Rome to well deservd and offereth them to the same gods in the said Capitol, unto whom there first he pronou nced his vows, and the beasts for sacrifice going before the pomp of triumph, are not the least part of this solemnity: that it may appear how the General in his return is mindful of the gods, &rendeth thanks unto them for the happy managing of the affairs of Commonwel. As for these beasts for sacrifice which he hath appointed to be fowed in the pomp of triumph, say them: neither makes it matter whole hand dot is done one & one another, but those sacred viands of the Senat, which are not to be eaten in any priv houe, nor in publick place unhallowed, "bec

A "but only in the Capitol; and there, not for the pleasure of men, but of Gods and men together, will ye trouble and impeach at the suggestion of Servius Galba? Shall the gates be shut against the triumph of L. P. shall P. win the King of the Macedonians, with his children and the multitude besides of captives, with the spoils of the Macedonians, be left behind at the river side? shall L. P. go directly from the city gate home to his house as a private person, like one that hath been abroad in the country to see his farm and is newly returned? But then Centurion and thou, lictor, begar, I advise thee, to the ordinance which the Senates hath decreed as touching the general P. rather than to the vain speech of Servius Galba: be honest to this I say the world, rather than he. As for him, he hath learned nought else but to prate and talk, and that to the depraving of others full maliciously. I tell thee thou hast Wolfe mine enemies, even upon the defence given twenty times and three; done I have my devoir, and from them all that were in combat with me, I never failed but carried away their spoils. I bear the marks about me of many a wound, and the honorable scars thereof to be seen, all of them in the breast and for part of my body. At which word, they say, he bared his naked skin, and related what in what battle he had received this or that wound. Now as he showed these scars, and chanced to discover some parts that better I was, and more honorably had been unseen, and therewith, a burst or swelling of a rupture that he had in his groin, whereof some of them that stood next unto him took up laughter, then (ed, he even this that you have eplied hereof make much game as, I caught with a strain, riding continually as I did, and never from my horseback day nor night: and no more ashamed I am and displeased with my self for that intemperance, than for their fear which you here see; since that it never was any impediment unto me in performing my service to the Common-wealth either in civil affairs of the world, or in warfare abroad. Well, I am old servitor, have been constant here to shew unto young men and raw houdiers, my body, many a time and often hacked, pierced and flashed with the sword. Let Galba now lay bare that whole skin of his own to tickle and affright. Now my masters, you that are Tribunes, call the tribes again to the scrutiny, and take their voices. As for me [down I will, and go after the Ioudiers hand at heels, Know I will which is the sole good and unthinkful companions that had rather he footed up and slurred in the wars by mutinous persons, than lie under the martial discipline of their General.]

Vol. xiii. Antias reporteth, That the sum of all the gold and silver taken in pillage and carried in the pomp of this triumph, amounted to the worth of 150 millions of sesterces. Which was, no doubt, as much greater by the proportion of the number of wars, and the pothes both of gold and silver by the fame author set down in general sums. And as some have recorded, the other spent in the war next before, or else scattered and laid in his flight when he made it to Som- thines, as much again as that came to. And the more wonder it was, that to mighty a mass of money had been gathered and heaped up within thirty years after the war between P. and the Romans, raised part out of the spoils, and in omm. of his metal mines, and part out of other profits and tributes. Thus P. very bare of money, and P. contrary-wise exceeding rich, began to make war with the Romans. Last of all, P. himself rode in his chariot, carrying a great port and majesty with both for his comely and comfitable body and also for his reverent old age. After his chariot, among other honorable personages rode his two sons, Q. Maximus and P. Scipio. Then followed the horsemens by troops, and the footmen by their cohorts and companies, every one keeping their ranks full decently. The footmen had given them a hundred Sesterces apiece, the Centurions double, and the horsemens triple so much. And it is thought, that he meant by this to give the footmen almost as much as the horse, and to set the footmen in comparison. In case they either had not denied his honour by their votes, or in token of thankfulness, they had done willingly and cheerfully crowned, what is true, which received was pronounced and related to them. And not P. alone (as he was through the enemies City in chains before the triumphant chariot of the conqueror) but also P. himself the conqueror glittering gloriously in his cloth of gold and costly purple, was a mirror to the word in those few dates, of the triumphs and mortal state of mankind. For of those two sons, whom after he had given the other two by way of adoption from himself he kept alone at home as his heir to bear his name, to maintain the sacred rites and sacrifices of his family, and to uphold the house he left, the younger, a stripling under twelve years of age, six days before his triumph died, and the elder fell fourteen years old, and more departed within three years after the triumph. Which two youths indeed ought to have been arrived in their embroidered robes of purple, and so to have ridden in the chariot with their father, predestining and aiming to themselves the like triumphs another day.

Some few days after, M. Antonius, the Tribune of the Commons assembled a solemn audience of the people for his sake, wherein when after the manner and custom of other Generals he should discourse of his own warlike and martial deeds, he made unto them a favorable Oration and well becoming a noble Roman Prince, to his effect. "Albeit I suppose (nothohe) to my neighbors and friends, the citizens of this noble City, ye be not ignorant, both how happily I have: ministrat the weal publick, and also how unprofitably within these few days two thunderbolts have staken my private house, as having one while beheld the bloody flow and pomp of my triumph retrenching the one, and then another while the wofull funerals and obsequies of my two sons declaring the other: yet I teach you suffer me with that agenlesness of heart and affection, as I ought, to make a brief comparison between mine own particular priviit fortune, and the publick

"public felicity of the City, At my departure from Italy, I looked from Brundisium, and set up sail; but the second day after I came to Delphi, where I sacrificed to Apollo, for my self, for your armies, and your navy. From Delphi I departed, and within five days was in the sea. Where, after I had received the charge of the army, and altered some things which might greatly have hindered the victory, I marched forward, for that the enemies camp was insupportable, and the King could not be forced by any means to fight: and piercing through his guards that kept the passage, I went as far as Peraet: so as this means having perfected the King to fight, I vanquished him in plain field and ranged battle, Macedony subdued, and brought it in subjection to the people of Rome. Finally, that war which for four years together other Consuls began, was done by me to managed, as each one left it ever to his successor worse than he found it, I achieved it and brought to a finish in fifteen days. I followed then in this train other prosperous affairs, as the fruits ensuing of that victory. For all the Cities of Macedon yielded unto me. The Kings treasure I seized upon: the King in person (as if the very Gods themselves had delivered and put him into my hands) I took prisoner, with his sons in the Temple of the Samothracians. But then my heart misgave me; and even then I suspected the surfeiting favour of my good fortune, and called my doubts, and began to fear the dangers at last, having so mighty a mass of the kings treasure to transport, and my victorious army to reconduct back into Italy. But seeing all things fell out to hearts desire, a prosperous voyage, a safe arrival, and whatsoever I could pray for, the Gods hands: this I wished in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune, when five is at the highest pitch, to turn back again, and come as fall down: that mine own house, that I was much more than the Common-weal, might feel that change and alteration whereof it came. And therefore I hope that this notable calamity of mine own shall call the King to manhood: for having any other misfortune, since that my hapless (if it were to check and shuck the changes of this world) hath fall to just between the limits of my two sons. So see how I and the Perfus are represented about all others for two notable examples of the frail and unstable condition of man. Lo how he, who being a prisoner himself, saw his sons likewise delivered captives before his face, hath them yet living bound and safe: and I, who have triumphed over him, came from the battles of one of my sons to ride in my chariot up to the Capitol, and from thence descended again to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair issue that I had, one left to bear the name of L. Paullus Emilius. For two of them the house of the Cornelii and the Fabii have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as of a great race and breed of children: so now, in the family of Paullus there is not one left but himself. Howbeit for this calamity and ruin of my house, your felicity and the happy estate of the City is a great comfort and consolation again. These words delivered with such a magnanimity, troubled the spirits of the auditors, and astonished them more, than if he had lamentably monied himself into them with piteous tears, for his childrens state and desolator condition.

C. Olibron solemnized his naval triumph over King Perseus the fifth day of December: in which solemnity, he neither had prisoners led in shew, nor spoils carried in pomp. He gave to his mariners and sailors revenue and five Denarii a piece: to every pilot double, and to the ship-masters four times as much. After this the Senate assembled, and the L. L. ordained, That Q. Caffius should M. lead King Perseus with his son Alexander, together with his train that accompanied him, as also bring all his money and goods, silver, or what moveables and furniture forever he had to Ab in the city of Samothrace and there to be kept in sure custody. But the King son of Thrace, with the hostages was sent to Carthage, there to lie in safe ward. As for the rest of the captives that had been led in triumph, though good it was they should be clapt up in prison.

Some few days after these things, there arrived Embassadors from Carthage King of the Thracians, bringing with them money for the ransom of his son and the other hostages. Into the Senate they were brought: where, by way of preamble they laid this for the ground of their speech. That Carthage had not sided with King Perseus in the war, upon his own motive and accord, but was compelled to give hostages: then they besought the L. L. of the Senate to suffer them be redeemed at N. what price ever they would let down, were it never so high. Unto whom this answer was returned by authority of the Senate. "That the people of Rome are well in mind the amity which they had with Carthage, with his progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the giving of the hostages, it was rather an evidence to prove, than an argument to excite their trepitude and fault: considering that when Perseus was quiet, the Thracian nation stood in no fear and awe of him, much less then, when he was troubled and occupied in war with the Romans, Howbeit although Carthage preferred the favour of Perseus before the friendship of the people of Rome, yet they would consider of the matter, and respect more his quality and what was meet for his estate, than his defert and what he was worthy to have regard thereon they would relese his son and the hostages, and send them home again. As for the people of Rome, their man of war is to belowe their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompence the worth and esteem whereof they had rather leave to the consideration and minds of the receivers, than require and demand the same presently. So there were Embassadors nominated to reconduct the hostages into Thrace to wits, T. Quintius Flamininus, C. Licinius Nerus, and M. Cononius Rebutus. And to those Thracian Embassadors were given by way of present 1000 asses a piece. So Bithia the rest of the hostages was sent for from Carthage, and with the forenamed Embassadors returned again to his father.
A The Kings ships taken from the Macedonians, of an extraordinary and monstrous bignes before time, were landed upon Merc field and there laid up drie. While the late remembrance of the Macedonian triumph, remained full not in the minds only, but as it were in the very eyes of men. L. Annius triumphed over King Gentius and the Ligrians upon the very day of the feast Carinaria: it was generally thought that all things therein rather resembled home likenes in show, then otherwise countervailed in substance the former triumph. This himself Annius was inferior to Ennio both in ability and also in quality of person: and letting together their places of command, the one being but Pretor, and the other Consul; neither was Gentius equal to Persius nor the Ligrians to the Macedonians. Spoil for spoilmoney for money gits for gits, there was no proportion nor companying between them. And therefore as that insth late triumph was more replentive and glorious than this, being considered in it fell without other respect, it was not to be found rank withal and delphed. Annius within few dates had vanquished and throughly nam'd the nation of the Ligrians: both by sea and land proud and mighty, bearing themselves flour and bold, and the General was praiyed and exclay'd in many a ditty and ballad. Annius wra'the, That of his booty there was raised as much money as came to twenty millions of Sevettii, over and above the gold and silver that went into the common treasure. But because I could not see how possibly such a sum should be made, I have set down mine author for the thing, now, chuse you whether you will believe him. King Gentius with his wife, children, and brother, was by offer from the Senate led to Spurius, there to be kept in ward: all the captives besides were Rome cast into prison and there lay. But when the Spoiles refused to take the charge and custody of him and the rest, their Princes were translated from thence to Isaurium. There remained besides of the Ligrian prizes two hundred and twenty ships, which being taken from King Gentius, Q. Caffius by the ordinance of the Senate gave and distributed among the citizens of Corpos, Apollus, and Derrhisabon.

The Consols this year after they had only walled the territories of the Ligrians, because they could not vanquish the enemies forces to fight, having done no memorable levies, returned to Rome for the choice of new Magistrates in the room of the old. And so the first comitia of court day that came, they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Sulpitius Gallus. The morrow after were elected for Pretors L. Livius, L. Apollus Saturinus, A. Leucus Nero, P. Rutilius Cilicus, P. Quintullius Vorns, and Marcus Fontius. These Pretors had their government in this mann'r; two for the jurisdiction within the City, two for the Sea, the other two Sicy and Euboea. This year leapt, and the leap day was the morrow after the feast Terminola. That year died C. Claudius the Augur, and in his place the collegy of the Augurs chose T. Quintus Flaminian. Also M. Fabius Pretor the Flamin of Quirinus the same year departed this life. This year also came King Prusias to Rome with his son Nicomedes. He entred into the City with a great train attending upon him: from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunal of Q. Caffius the Pretor. And when there was a great concourse of people about him from all parts; he laid that his coming was to worship the Gods which are the presidents of the City of Rome as also to tribute the people of Rome, and withal to shew his own joy and to with their for their happy victory over the two Kings Persius and Gentius, and for that by vanquishing the Macedonians and Ligrians they had enlarged their regno and dominion. And when the Pretor made an offer to call a Senate for him even that present day if he would to himself the desired two sestertis replit to see the temples of the Gods, to view the City, and to visit his good friends and acquaintance, L. Cornilius Seipas the treasurer was appointed to go about with him and shew them all: who also had been sent as far as to Cato to meet him upon the way: also for him and his train about him, there was a sufficient house taken up, where he was kindly and liberally entertained. The third day after he came into the Senate where after he had congratulated in their behalf for their late victory, he recounted his own dementis and good deferts during the war; and then requisted, that he might have leave to pour his vows and namely, to sacrific e at Pomus in the capitol,ten head of greater beasts, and one at Prensius to Fortuna. For that he said those vows were made for the victory of the people of Rome, Alfo that the league and alliance with him might be renewed. Item that the Gland won by conquest from King Annius which being not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gauls notwithstanding held in possession, might be conveyed into him by a deed of gift. Last of all he recommended his son Nicomedes to the Senate. He found much favor among all them who had been Generals of armies in Macedony. And therefore he obtained directly all other things that he made: only as touched the said lands, this answer he had. That they would send certain commissioners to see and view the thing. And if it appeared and fell out, that the foresaid land was appertained to the people of Rome, and was not passed away by gift to any already they would.
repute King Prusias the worthiest man of all other, to receive that donation at their hands. He had no right unto it, or if the Gauls had a grant thereof already, Prusias then must be content and pardon them, if they were unwilling to gratify him with any gifts prejudicial and injurious to another. Neither could a thing never to freely given, be an acceptable gift, which he knew the donor may take away from the donee at his pleasure. As for Nicomedes his son, they would willingly receive him into their protection at his hands so recommended. And how careful and tender the people of Rome was that King children committed under them to keep, may appear by Ptolomaeus the King of Egypt. With this answer was Prusias dismissed. Order was given that he should be presented with a certain volume of letters, and with silver plate to the quantity of so pound weight. Alto also ordained that his son Nicomedes should have gifts proportionable to that sum which was given Masagaba the son of Mefanetas; also that bequests and all other things appertaining to sacrifices, should be allowed unto the king, out of the City-chamber, like as to the magistrates of Rome, whether he would lay and offer them at Rome or Frensete. Alto that out of that fleet which was in the harbor of Brundisium, there should be twenty galleries aligned him to use, until such time as the King were arrived at the fleet which was given him. Finally, that L.Curdius Scipio should accompany him and never depart from him, but bear the charges both of him and his resume about him until they were embarked and on shipboard. It is said, that the king joied wonderfully at this custom and kindness offered him by the people of Rome and that he would needs pay for those presents which were given him; only he commanded his son to take a gift at the hands of the people of Rome. Thus much have our Historians writ ten as touching K. Prusias. But P. Hyginus reporteth, that this King was unworthy the Majesty of so honorable a name, for that he was wont to meet the Embassadors of Rome with his head shaven and a cap upon, it also to acknowledge and call himself the freed villain and valet of the people of Rome, and to tell him much he wore the badge and token of that degree and condition. At Rome likewise when he entered the Council-houfe, he looped down and kissed the very door sill, calling the Senators Gods, his Saviors, yea, and to have used other speeches so honourable to the bearers, as bold and unifiting his owne person. When he had sojournd in and about the City not above thirty days, he took his leave and departed into his owne Realm.

To the Reader.

From the five and fortyeth book forward, all the rest of Livy (to the great main and blemish of the Latin tongue, and no small grief of learned men) is lost, even 100 books wanting five, like as those ten between the tenth and one and twentieth books, commonly called the second Decad. For as it appeared by L. Florus the Epitomist there were in all 140: and the arguments of so many remain at this day, by him collected. But if it be true that Francis Petrarch faith, Levy wrote in all 142: and as Charles Sgonius probably conjectureth, the 36 and 37 Breviaries of L. Florus be wanting of this later number. How all these complete books of T. Livius should miscarry, it is not certainly known. Some hope there is, that they are but mis-cast and laid out of the way. For like as within these hundred years some fragments of the story were discovered in Moguncie: and the last five books now extant, found by Simon Grinaeus in the Library of a monastery over-against the City of Worms, and dedicated by Erasmus of Rotterdam unto Charles the son of William Lord Montjoy, in the reign of Henry the eight of famous memory K. of England, &c. so we are not to depair of the rest. In the mean time, we must make much of these brief summaries left unto us. Even as therefore I have inserted those ten Breviaries in stead of the books: so I thought it not amiss, (in hope that one day the very books of themselves will come to light) to proceed in the rest following: and the rather, for that neither he that translated Livy into the Tuscan language, nor they who have done him into French (as far as I could ever see) have taken that pains.

Of the XLVI. Book.

Eumenes came towards Rome. Now because in the Macedonian war he had carried himself indifferent between Pericles and the Romans, there passed a law in general terms, That no King might repair to Rome; to the end, that if he were excluded, he should not be reputed an enemy; nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleared of all fault. Cl. Marcellus the Conful subdued the Gauls inhabiting the Alps; and C. Sulpitius Gallus the Lignians. The Embassadors of King Prusias complained of Eumenes, for that he invaded and robbed their borders; and they informed besides, that he had confounded with Antiochus against the people of Rome. At the current suit and entreaty of the Rhodians, a league was contrived with them. The Confuls took a review and survey of the City, wherein were enrolled and levied 327022 citizens of Rome. M. Aeminius Lepidus was elected President of the Senate. Ptolemaus the King of the Egyptians was by his younger brother expelled of his realm, but by the means of Embassadors (sent from Rome) he was restored to his kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, his son Ariarathes came to the crown and by intercourse and mediation of Embassadors, renewed amity with the people of Rome. This book continues besides the wars against the Lignians, Corcyrenians, and Lusitaniens, fought with various fortune: the troubles also in Syria after the death of Antiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his son a very child. This young Prince (together with his guardian Lyctus) Demetrios the son of Seleucus (who had been sent in hostage to Rome) murdered privately, because he was not set at large and dismissed by the Romans; and so himself entered upon the kingdom. L. Aeminius Paulinus who had conquered Pericles, departed this life; whose inscription and diligence from the publick treasure was such, that notwithstanding he had brought both one of Spain and Macedonia so great store of wealth a dividend, yet when his goods were prized and sold, there would be hardly raised thereof sufficient to repay his wife her dowry. The Pompeian marches were drawn drizzled Cor, Cethegus the Consul (unto whom that charge was by lot fall) and the same turned into firm ground.

Of the XLVII. Book.

Cneus Tremellius a Tribune of the Commons had a fine set on his head, for that he had contended in a wrongfull case with M. Aeminius Lepidus the soveraigne Pontiffe. The power and authority of the clerige Magistrates was greater and mightier than before. A law was enacted to confine the overordinate suit for offices. In the survey of the City, there were taxed in the fifted book, 328314 Roman citizens. L. Aeminius Lepidus was chosen again President of the Senate. Between the two brethren Ptolomeus, who were in variance, there was sent this accord and agreement, That the one should reign in Egypt and the other in Cyrene. Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, by the publick plot and forcible power of Demetrios King of Syria dispossessed of his kingdom, was by the Senate set into it again. Certain Embassadors were sent at delegats from the Senate to determine of the lutigious ground between Mafamitas and the Carthaginians, C. Mattius the Consul fought against the Dalmatians, at the first unfortunately but afterwards achieved the victory. The occasion of the war with them was this: that they had made war upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The same nation Cornelius Natusis the Consul brought in sujectiion. Q. Opinius the Consul subdued the Lignians beyond the Alps, who had spoil'd Antipolis and Nicæa, two towns belonging to the seignors of the Scarifinis. Moreover, here are contained the adventures of many Captains in Spain, with no good success. In the 508 year from the foundation of the City, the Consuls so soon as the assembly for election was past, and other Consuls chosen for the year following, began their office. The cause of this alteration was, because the Spanish were entered into rebellion. The Embassadors afforded that had been sent to take up and decide the controversy between Mafamitas and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great store of ship-timber and other matters for a navy at Carthage. Certain Pretors accused by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII. Book.

The Confuls took a review and tax of the city, wherein were reckoned three hundred four and twenty thousand polls of citizens. The census of a third Punic war was here recorded. Upon a report that there was a rightfull army of Numidians upon the borders of the Carthaginians, conducted by Archobazantes the nephew of Syphax. M. Porcius Cato perused in an election to provost war against the Carthaginians, for that they intimated such a power within their frontiers under a colour against Mafamita, but in truth raised against the Romans; he sent Publius Cornelius Natusis to observe what they did, and whereabout they went. Who after they had given the Carthaginians;

Senat a check and rebuke, for that against the covenant of the league they maintained forces, and were provided of timber and other stuff for a navy, they were willing to conclude a peace between Malaunia and them; so Malaunia would part with the land in question. But Gigno the son of Amilcar, a chief and seditionous man, whom they had forsaken Agesipate (now residing in their seas as promised to be voted by the award of the said Embassadors) assisted them so by his perfidious remonstrances to war upon the Romans, that the Embassadors made shift to see and save themselves, or else they had come to a mischief. When they received these news at Rome, the Senat accordingly met and bent against the Carthaginians, were now by his words provoked much more. M. Porcius Caton performed the funerals of his son, defeated in his Pretorship, with exceeding small charges, according to his ability, for he was put poor. One Andronicus, who solely made the world believe, that he was the son of Pericles the King of Macedonia, was sent to Rome. M. Eumylus Lepidus, now six times chosen President of the Senate by the Conforts, gave his son in strict charge before he died, to carry him forth tobird in a coach without linen clothes and purple pall, and not to bellow in other oaths upon one another saying, that the feuds and enmity of the greatest and best persons are wont to be embittered and blazoned with the terms of images and titles, and not with some private expenses. An insipion there was about the price of poisoning and fetjoy, Pulvilia and Licinia were enticed for making away their husbands put in fretties before the Pretor, to be bound in goods, lands, and body for them; and after judicial process polled and their cause heard, by a degree of their kinsfolk suffered death. Gululfa the son of Malaunia gave intelligence, that at Carthag there was a matter of keeping and levying of soldiers, aggregating and providing of an army, all preparations to defend for war; and Publicius Cornelius Natacis replied again that nothing was to be done inconsiderably, without advice. Though good it was to send three Embassadors, to see the truth of all, and upon their knowledge to certify, L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Pothismus Albinus the Consuls, when they took matters with severity and vigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but press all, were committed by the Tribunes of the commons, who for their friends could obtain at their hands no release and immunity of soldiers. By occasion of the war in Spain, which many times had been undertaken and unfortunately managed, when the City of Rome was so dilated and deserted, that there could not (if found one who would as much as accept of a martial Tribuus) was willing to go in quality of Lieutenant: P. Cornelius Eumylus Septimus, made officer and professed, that he would undertake any kind of military service whatsoever should be laid upon him: and by his own example stirred up all the west to the love of war and peace. L. Liciniius the Consul, when Claudius Marcellus (after whom he succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the states and nations of Celtiberia, subdued the Vacocio, Cantabrians, and other regions and nations as yet unknown in Spain, P. Cornelius Scipio Africenus Eumylus, the son of L. Pothismus, and the nephew of Africenus by adoption, being there a martial Colonel, followed a barbarian challenger that defied him. But in the winning of the City Icturitica, he adventured a more dangerous enterprise: For he was the first of all, that he said and mounted over the wall. Scipio Sulpinus Calbo the Pretor fled but boldly in a battalia against the Portugals. When the Embassadors were returned out of Africa, together with the Carthaginian Orators, and Gululfa the son of Malaunia, bringing word, That they found at Carthag both an army and also an armado thought good it was to put to question and debate the matter in the Senate: where Cato and other principal Senators were of opinion and gave advice, to transport an army presently into Africa: but because C. Natacis opined and said, That he saw no just and sufficient cause of war, agreed it was to forbear all hostility enface of arms; in case the Carthaginians would burn their towns and defounce their army: yet, then agreed it was that the Consuls next following in place of government should propose as touching the Parthian war. When the Theatre was built, which the Consuls had been put forth and known to frame, and set up a price, through the means of Pub. Cornelius Natacis, who inferred, that it was a piece of work unprofitable, yet, and hurtful to the manners generally of the citizens; by vertue of an edict, of Senate decreed, it was taken down; so that the people for a long time food on their feet to behold the publick play. The Carthaginians at that time took arms contrary to the league, and warred upon Malaunia. But as dignified they were in field by him (who not withstanding he now was five or six years old, and twelve, yet be of did effect his meat simply without any dainty since yet, and to chew his bare bread stiff) and over and besides they desired to draw upon their head the Roman war.

Of the XLIX. Book.

The beginning of the third Parthian war, in the six hundred and one year from the Citys foundation, which within 5 years after it began, came to a full and small end. Much diversity there was in opinion between M. Porcius Caton whom they respected for the west, and Scipio Natacis, who by the Senate was Ereigned the chief and house of seat in the City. Cato was altogether for the war, and to demand Carthage quite: Natacis contrarywise diffudged what he could. Nor perhapes, in the end decided it was. That because against covenant and accord they kept a noisy at feast, and had led forth an army out of their borders; also for that they entered into arms and pressed war upon Malaunia, a friend and confederate to the people of Rome; and received not into their town Gululfa his son who was in the company of the Roman Embassadors: nor should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forces were embarked and taken the feast, the Embassadors of Utica repented to Rome, yielding themselves and all that they had. That embassage, as a special preface to the issue and event of the war was acceptable and pleasing to the Lords of the Senate, but heavy and grievous to the Carthaginians. In Territum (a place it was in Campus Martius, wherupon the parthenes Terentins took their name) were places exhibited visited to Father Dis the infernal God, according to the direction of the books of Sibylla. These had been set out one hundred years before in the first Panwick war, and in the five hundred years and one year, after the City was founded, Thirty Embassadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their submission. But the sentence of Cato importuned and prevailed, to hold full their former determinations, and that the Consuls with all speed should set forward in their journey to the war. Who having passed the seas and arrived in Africa, received of them three hundred hostages, whom they had required and demanded; and also took into their hands all their armor and weapons, and what furniture of war formerly they found at Carthage. They proceeded moreover after all this to command them by warrant and authority from the LL. of the Senate to build them a new Town for to inhabit in some other place, so that it were ten miles at least remote from the Sea, by which indignity offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to rise and take arms against L. Martius and M. Manlius the Consuls, began to besiege and assail Carthage: during which siege and assault it astonished that two Colonels madly and boldly adventured to break into the City with their cohorts, at one part thereof where the walls were neglected, and when by the Romans they were sore beaten and killed, by the means of Scipio Africanus they were restored: by whom also a certain seneque and part of the Roman, which the enemies by night affailed, with the help of a few horsemen was delivered. Moreover, he saved the camp, against which the Carthaginians rallied forth of their City, and gave the siege at once upon it with all their forces; by which service he above the rest was great honor. Over and besides, when at the Consul (for the other was gone to Rome to hold the election of Magistrates) seeing the siege and assault of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the army against Alcadrubal, who with another power of men kept the narrow confines of a certain passage; and compell'd him to retire, and gave battle to the enemy; and so brought them away to safety, though quarter of his, even Cato, (a man otherwise more ready of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the Senate, that in these premises he gave out and said, * That all the rest who were employed in the war of Africa, serv'd as shadows and dead men, but Cato had true vigour and spirit indeed. The people of Rome before can't such an honour and goodwill to him, that at the next election, most of the tribes procured him to be Consul, notwithstanding he was by law under age. When L. Scribonius a Tribune of the Common had promis'd a law, That all the Portugals (who according to custom and composition, yielded to the people of Rome, and by S. Galba were sold in France) should be restored to their freedom: M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalf of that law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be seen, included with his Annals, Q. Fulvius Nobilior, when he was by himself taken up and well checked in the Senate, answered in the behalf of Galba, Teo and Galba also, saying himself at the point to be condemned, took in his arms and embraced his own two sons; being * Praetextati, and a son of C. Sulpitius whose Guardian he was, and made such piteous and fruitful move, all the while he spoke in his own case that the foresaid law was retracted and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be sects against Libo Censor of the Commons and his proposed laws, as touching the Portugals; and one against L. Cornelius Cethegus, in which he confesseth and avoweth the killing of the Portugals encompass'd more into him; for that he knew certainly that they after their manner had sacrificed on horse and man, and under a colour of peace, intended to set upon and change his army. Andrius one of his birth and the most abject lowest condition, who made the world believe that he was King Pericus his son, and thereupon chang'd his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and fled secretly from Rome (whether Demetrius King of Syria had sent him in regard of this he notorious lie had many men condescended upon him, embracing a forged and counter feit able of his, if it had been a true name and report; by which means he gathered an army together, and either with the good will of the inhabitants, or by force of arms, seiz'd all Macedonia and held it in his hands. Now had he devolved and framed the pagan in his wife, That Pericus the King had begotten him (forsooth) of a confederate: that he was committed to * one Cytheria to be fostered and brought up: to the end that if ought should fall out but well unto the K., in that war which he waged with the Romans, there might be sent some seed as it were and issue remaining of the Kings blood and race race, when Pericus was deceased, let his education be at Acardium until he was 13 year old, fupposing him to be his natural father who fostered and kept him, and will not at all from what stock he was defended. Now if fell out (faith he) that the said foster father of mine was very sick: and being at the point of death being at length his birth and parentage. Moreover, that there was little book given to my supposed mother, fett with the sermon of King Pericus which was to deliver unto me when I came once to ripe age, and to be 14 years old: charging her most freely and all love, to conceal the whole matter until that time were come: and when I was grown to that age next day, then the book was given me, wherein mention was made of two chiefs of treasure left for me by my foster father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of her, but only foster, be warned my birth unto me, who was the origin of mine own descent: also the woman laid great care upon me to depart out of these quarters before that Eumenes, a professed enemy to Persicus, came to the knowledge thereof; for fear to be murdered. In which respect I being affrighted, and keeping with to find some hidden at the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria and there first I took heart unto me, and dared openly to profess who I was, and never before. Hefally at what time as the said counterfeft Philip would have invaded and kept it by force of arms, was by the means of the Roman Embassadors, together with the aid of the Achaeans defended, Prutias King of Sichymia, a favourer of the bleft person and lowest vices was by his own Niconedes murdered with the help of Attalus King of Pergamus. Another son he had who in stead of the upper rowe and course of齿 teeth, is reported to have done entire hole for all, growing out at his gums. When the Romans had sent their Embassadors to conclude a peace between Niconedes and Prutias, of which Embassadors, the one had his head full of many fears and was troubled with the greatest kind of pains, the other was troubled with the very terrible kind of pains and the third reported that Hieyfle of forts by nature, and none of the wisest: Catu said, That there was an embassage between left and heart-lefts. In Syria, which at that time had for their King, one indeed of the line and race of Pericles K. of Macedon, but another Prutias up and down, for cowardie, idleness, and base mind; it fell out, that whiles he haunted taverns, spoke, and brother- houses, and lay there altogether, Anomius said the Seper and ragued as King: by whose prattifis the Kings friends, also Lacedice the Queen, and Antigonus the son of Demetrius came to their end and were killed, Maiinisia King of Numidia, a man above thirty and ten years old, a famous Prince and every way excellent, yielded to nature and died. Among other useful parts which he performed to his dying day, this is one, That in this old age of his he was so lusty, that after the fourth and fifth year of his life he got a boy, Among his three sons, Micypta (the eldest) Guttula and ManLatabai, who also had many in the Greek tongue, Publius Scipio Aemilianus devised the administration of the kingdom: for in those three years, it is in common for them all and had given order not to dispose of the states except to relations of the same Scipio, Lukinmhe, persuaded Phatias the commander under Himikle of the Carthaginian Constabulary, (a valiant warrior, and when the Carthaginians employed most of all others in service) to revolt with his men of arms and to turn Roman, Of these three Embassadors above said who were sent to Maiinisia, Claudia Marcellus was cast away in a tempest upon the sea, and swallowed up of the wear in a gulf. The Carthaginians murdered in their Council chamber Alcyrbath nephew of Maiinisia, and their Pretor for the time being, upon suspicion of treason. This jealousy of theirs arose hereupon, for that he was more in mankind and blood to Guttula, who friend and succoured the Roman, Publius Scipio Aemilianus, when he freed to be male. was by the people propounded and nominated for Consul; and when as low he might not for his four years he created Consul, bold bond was there among him whilst the common advised with might and main for him, and the nobles and Lords of the Senate gain said in a good while; but in fine, he was disfavow'd, but not in the means of the law that himself, and created Consul Marcus Manilius (Pro concul) forced certain Cities to quit about Carthage. * Counterfeit Philip, after he had slain M.Juventius the Pretor and Q. Calcius, and together with them defeated the army, was in Macedon vanquished himself and taken prisoner, and so Macedonia was recovered again which had been lost before.

Achates, which took up in circuit the compass of four and twenty miles, was with exceeding pain and crowed besieged and won by peace-ment: first, under the conduct of Mancius the Lieutenant: afterwards of Scipio the Consul, unto whom where upon the province of Attick was extraordinarily granted. The Carthaginians having made a new pere, (for that the old bawn was choked and stopped up by Scipio) and, therewith secretly in a small time went the great fleet, burned a batallion at Sea unfortunately. Moreover, the camp of Alcyrbath their General, pitched in a place of most difficult access near the Town Nephetis, was forced, and in his army defeated by Scipio; whereby the end the city was the very City of Carthage, in the seven hundred and one year after it was first founded. The greatest part of the spoil and pillage there found, was restored to the Sicilians, from whom it had been taken. In the utmost extremity and final destruction of that city, when Alcyrbath had yielded and submitted to Scipio: his wife (who some days before could not obtain at her husband hand to abandon the Town and fly to the conqueror) cast her self with her two children headlong from the Castle into the midst of the flaming fire, where with the City burned, Scipio, following the example of his father Eumylus Paulus who had conquered Macedonia, set forth certain solemn places and pintimes; wherein the enemy and fugitives were presented and obliged toa fawning beast. The costs of the Achaeans were here reported. The Roman Embassadors who had been beaten and ill treated by the Achaeans, were sent unto Corinth to sever and disfrat those cities (which had been under the swayg of Philip) from the general diet and parliament of the Achaeans.

Q. Unius Metellus fought a battall at Thermopylae with the Achaeans, that had to aid them the Boeotians and Chelidians who being overcome, Ceolus their chief Captain burnt his own life by fire: and in his place *Dracaus the first author of the troubles in Achaea was by the Achaeans chosen General of the field; and by L., Mummirus the Consul vaunquished Philip of Illyricus: who having received all Achaea by surrender, razed and destroyed utterly Corinth, by an Act and commission directed of the Senate; because the Roman Embassadors were there abused, Thebes also and Calcis which had aided the Achaeans, were overthrown and pulled down. himself most abstinent and incorrupt: for of all that wealth, and those goods and ornaments wherewith Corinth was mightily enriched, there came not one parcel into his house. Quintus Ceüius Metellus triumphed for the conquest of Andricus, and Publius Cornelius Scipio Africamus Emylaus, his wife, over Carthage and Afridul. Viriatus in Spain, first of a heretick became an heritor, and of a hunter proved to be a very thief and robber; and within a while after was chosen General of a complete and main army, and set his to his own use at Portugal. He took prisoner M. Vitellus the Pretor, when he had first despoiled his tents in the field. After whom Plautinus the Pretor fled no better in flight. This enemy so terrified the Romans, that to make head against him they found necessary to employ all confederate army, and a Conjular Command. Moreover, in this book, he recorded the troubles of Syria, and the wars between the Kings. Alexander an excellent person and base born, having slain (as it be fore- said) Demetrius the King, reigned in Syria. Him Demetrius (the son of Demetrius) slew for the help of Ptolemaeus King of Egypt, whose daughter Cleopatra he had espoused and married, this Demetrius in times past had been sent out of the way into Gnidus by his fathers, hearing the doubtful chances of the war; and he entered upon this action by occasion of the contemptible flunk and cowardice of the said Alexander. Ptolemaeus was grievously wounded in the head: and in the ears whiles the Cilurmites went about to "remove the bones of his skull died under their Land, And in his stead Ptolemaeus his younger brother who reigned in Cyrene, succeeded and took upon him the crown. Demetrius for his cruelty which he excercised upon his people by raking and other tortures was vanquished in battle by Dio- dorus, one of his own subjects; who made claim to the Kingdom in the right and title of Alexander; so a young child hardly two years old, whereupon he fled Seleucia. Lucius Mummius triumphed over the Achabani, in which famine he carried in pownions show sundry images as well of brass as marble, besides pictures and painted Tables.

A review and numbering of the citizens was taken by the Consuls: wherein were enrolled four hundred twenty eight thousand three hundred forty two polls. At what time as the Macedonian Embassadors came to complain of D. Junius Syllanus, the Lord Deputy over them, for that he took their money, and victuals he made an incursion on the boundaries of the Province, and thereupon the Senate was willing to have the hearing of their complaints. M. Marius Torquetus the father of Syllanus, exhibited an aggrieved, and obtained, that the inquiry and decision of such a matter as this might be referred over and committed unto him. And after he had given upon this commission at home, in his own house, and found his son guilty, he both condemned him and put him away: nor, when afterwards he had hanged himself, for that was his end, he would not be so much as present at his funeral, but according to his ordinary manner and custom, sat in his house, attending all clients and correspondents to him for counsel. Q. Matienus was judicially accused before the Tribunes of the Commons, for that he had abounded and forsook his own army in Spain, whereupon he being comitted, was confined, and feued a long while with rods, carrying a fork or crook upon his shoulders, and in the end tied as a slave for a small piece of flesh of three half pieces of eight. The Tribunes of the Commons, because they might be allowed to exempt from military service ten founders: space, whom it pleased them to chose, commanded the Consul to prefer, Jun. Deius Junius Brutus had good fortunes in the farther Province of Spain, fighting with the Gallicans. But M. Emilius Lepidus, pro-consul, fled for safety to his wars against the Vaceetis, and suffered the like overthrow that he other received from the Numantins. When Marcus, the author and maker of the accord with the Numantins, was delivered up in person to the Numantins for to afford the people of Rome, and discharge them in conference for cancelling the said covenant, they received him not, and would none of him. The people was moved and stirred by the Consuls, in which survey and account of them, there were enticed into their toks 30,000 Roman citizens. Fulvius Flaccus the Consul brought the Vaceetis in Ulycium under subjection. M. Collonius the Praetor fought in Thracia with the Scipionins, and won the better. When by the default and error of the Captains and Commanders, the Numantins war continued still, not without the publick blame and dishonor of the State; the Senate and people of Rome conferred the Consulship upon Scipio Africurus, without any fear or seeking of his part. And when he was unwilling to accept thereof, by reason of a law forbidding expressly, 'that any man should be created C.S. the second time,' he had a dispensation, and was freed from the law in that behalf, like as from the other in his former Consulship. There was an interceptation of bondsmen and slaves in Sicily; and when it could not be suppressed by the Pretors and Lord Governors, Flaccus had the charge of that Province and service. This war began by occasion of one Lutus a bondman, and a Syrian born, who being assembled together a power of rustic prelats and country slaves, broke prisons and houses of correction, came to have a full and complete army. Moreover, Clean also another notable face, raised to the number of 70,000 villains by himself: and they both joining their forces together, waged war many times against the people of Rome and their army in those parts.

Scipio Africurus laid siege to Numantia: and whereas the army was grown to be corrupted through idleness and loose life, he reclaimed the same, and reduced it into a most strict and severe kind of military discipline. For he cut off all the means and occasions of delight and sensual pleasures: he sent packing many two thousand waggons and troops that followed the camp: he held the soldiers hard to work every day: he forced each one to carry on his shoulders corn for thirty days, and seven good stakes besides for a polla sado. If he found any of them to go bare-handed by his lands, he would set them under him. Sulpicia, when you have the skill to employ your self with your swords point, then yest to carry pales, but not before. When he saw another praiseful to wield very thinly a little light buckler, he commanded him to bear a target of a bigger size, and weightier than ordinary, for finding hand that be knew better how to hold his shield for defence of his own body than to handled his sword for offence of the enemy. After he with a soldier out of his rank, enfiled 3. If he were a Roman, up he went and was well armed and fully equipped with one sword by the custom of a stranger, swung and jerked he was with [broad] rods by the Lictors. And whereby all the pack-horses and bell-laboring beasts the consuls did because they would not use the soldiers of their carriage. Willis, many a time be bare himself worthily in fight, and had a very hand against the enemies that failed forth against him. The Vaceetis were frightly befriended: and after they had killed their wives and children, they flung their own felons upon them, Scipio, at that time at Antiochus King of Sythia had sent unto him most rich and heavily presents: whereas other Generals of the field were wont to conceal the gifts of K.K, he adorned the accepting of them in open sight of all men, etc. at the very banquet. And when he bad done, he commanded the treasurer to receive all, and enter in his book of receipts for the blesse promising out of that flock, to reward the hardiest men and most valiant knights. When he bad blocked and invested Numantia on every side, and for the enemies driven to great straits for hunger, he forbade expressly to kill any of them that went forth of the town to forage and procure victuals. Saying, that the more they were in number, the fonder they would confine and food up the corn which they had.
Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, a Tribune of the Commons, who was promoted an Agrarian law, that no man should hold and occupy above "five hundred acres or acres of the City lands, selling the Sena; and order of Gentlemen to form against it, grew into such a heat of choler and furious rage, that presently by an all made, he deprived of Tribunitian power M. Octavius. In Colleagues for maintaining the cause of the adverse party: and withal, created himself, his brother C. Gracchus, and App, Claudius his own wiper father, Tribunors or commissaries for dividing of the said lands. He proposed also and published another Agrarian law, by virtue whereof any man encroached further, and went about that first and proportion, the same Tribunors and none but they should he known and determine, how far for the common grounds and the prorial lands should reach. Afterwards, when these were to be left ground than could be divided, he protested that without the defence of the common people, (because even while he had stirred up their appetite to his for great matters,) he would prefer a law. That amongst all them, who by virtue of the law Sempronia ought to receive lands, the many which belonged sometime to King Attalus should be divided. Now this Attalus the King of Pergamus and son of Eumenes, had left behind him, the people of Rome his full heir of all that he had. The Senate upon these so many inducements offered by Gracchus, was highly pleased, and Pub. Mucius the Consul, about the rest: who after he had inveigled in the Senate against him, was by him hurried forth the same, and accented into the Commons, whereby he declaimed against him over again openly from the Rostrum, When Gracchus would have been chosen Tribune of the Commons a second time, by the advice and procurement of P. Cornelius Naica, the chief peers and nobles flew him in the Capitol. He caught in his first knock with the broken pieces of the Tribunes part. And among all the his in this famous gar- lock, was never committed to the earth, but thrown into the river. Moreover, this book contains the battles in Sicily, fought against the fugitive flows with variable fortune a decade.

The Numantios forced by great extremities, and famine especially murders themcstheselves in course by turns. After the City was won, Scipio Africans raised and defied it rather: and even it triumphed, in the fourteenth year after the ruin of Carthage, P. Atilius the Consul departed, and ended the war in Sicily, with the forfait fugitives. Africannus the son of King Eumenes, invaded Asia and held it to his own use; whereas the left will and testament of King Attalus, it was bequeathed as a legacy unto the people of Rome, and ought to have been freed. Against him P. Licinius Crat- bus the Consul and Archbishop besides (a thing never done or seen before) took a journey with an army out of Italy, and in a battle was overthrown and lost his life. M. Perpenna the Consul forsook Africannus, and received him by surrender. Q. Pomponius and Q. Metellus were elected Censors, the first Commons that ever both together attained to that dignity. A review was taken by the Censors wherein were numbered 36883 citizens, besides orphans and widows. Q. Metellus the Censor gave his advice and opinion that all men should be compelled to take wives for the breeding of children. His Or- tions to this purpose it extended Augustus Cesar, at what time as he went in haste to join marriage in all the three states and degree of the City, as it had been penned to fit these times wherein we now live. C. Atilius Laboe, a Tribune of Commons, commanded Q. Metellus the Censor (who in the review and new choice of the Senators did him that disgrace as to leave him out,) to be pitch'd headlong from the rock Tarpeia but the rest of the Tribune affisted the Cesars till that any could be expected executed by men. A Tribune of the Common, proposed a bill, that it might be lawful to create the same man a trib, of the Commons for any one would; P. Africannus disfranchised this law in a most peace and public Oration wherein he used these words effectually, That he judged Trib, Gracchus to have been partly slain for his defects, Gracchus on the other side maintained the law, and pleaded that it might peace be but Scipio imported and prevailed in the end. In this book are related the wars between Antiochus king of Syria, and Ptolomeus king of the Parthians, as also the troubles of Egypt, which stood as then in no better terms. Ptolomeus fornamed Evergetes, for his exceeding cruelly grew hateful and abus'd to his own subjects, and when the people had set fire on fire, and burned his royal palace, he fled with health into Cyprus; and when the king came to be the people made oath to over to his sister Cleopatta, whom (after he had deformed by force her daughters,) a virgin, and taken her to wife, he had turned away in great displeasure and notice with her; he killed that son he had by her, in Cyprus, and sent unto the mother the head, hands, and feet. Certain seditions were raised by the Tribunors. Fulvius Flaccus C. Gracchus, and L. Carbo, who were created for the decision of land. Against whom P. Scipio Africannus made resistance but being in perfect health, strong and strong, he went home to his house as it might be to day, and being found dead in his bed-chamber the next morrow, His wife Sempronia was deeply perplexed to have given him a cup of poison & poison, especially because he was fitter to the Gracchi, between whom and Africans there was no day and enmity: Howbeit, there was no question and bright enquire how he came to his death. When his body was laid the Tribunors seditions before said, brake forth into a sight but hot fire. C. Semproni- nus the Consul fought against the Iapidex, but unfortunately, but soon after he made advance for his lost received, with auditory achieved by the special order of C. Gracchus: site some men who he first had conquered Portugal.

Of the LX. Book.

Aurelius the Consul subdued the Sardians, Fulvius Flaccus was the first man that vanquished in fight the Ligurians beyond the Alps, being sent to aid the Massilians against the French Salies, who lay sore upon the borders of the Massilians, and foiled them. Lucius Opimius the Pretor received under his jurisdiction the Frejellians who had revolted, and restored the Town Frejelle. Here is reported a pedilude in Africa, by an exceeding multitude of beasts, killed and lying dead afterwards upon the ground. A survey was taken of the City by the Confort, wherein were numbered 330736 citizens.

C. Gracchus, brother of Tiberius, a Tribune of the Commons, but of the twain more eloquent, preferred certain dangerous laws: and among the rest, one attacking teaching, namely, that the Commons should be served in the market, at the rate of one half, and a third part of * Asses, a Modius: another, concerning diversion of lands, the same which his brother before him had published, and a third (whereby he meant to corrupt the order of Gentlemen, which then accorded with the degree of Senator) namely, that from out of the Gentlemen, 600 should be taken into the Senate: and forasmuch as in these days, the re were but 300 Senators, those 600 Gentlemen should be entering into the said thousand; that is to say, that the order of Gentlemen should be double in number to the Senators, and twice as strong. This Gracchus having concluded his Tribunship another year, by proposing still the Agrarian laws proposed, that many Colonies more should be planted in Italy, and one besides, upon the very spot of ground where Carthage lately defired, had been; and there himself (chosen Triumvir therefore) erected a Colony. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits of Q. Metellus against those Baleare Islands, which the Greeks call Gymnikes, because the people go naked all the summer time. But Baleares they be named either off fishing darts, or of Baleus the companion of Hercules, whom he left behind there, at that time, as he failed to Ceryon. Also, the troubles in Syria be here reported, wherein Cleopatta (of her husband, Demetrius and his son Seleucus, taking great indignation, that when his father was by her killed, he without her warrant had taken the doomed upon him.)

Of the LXI. Book.

Caicus Sextius the Pro-consul, after he had conquered the nation of the Salies, built the Colony Agae Sextia, so called of the plentiful abundance of waters, by reason of springs both hot and cold, and of his own name. C. Cominius the Pro-consul fought fortunately against the * Allobroges, near the Town * Vindellum. The cause why he lasted war against them was, that he had received and refNicked by all means they could, Teutoniam the King of the * Salvis, when he mixed them, and had wasted also the territories of the * Hitinians, were the allies of the people of Rome, C. Gracchus, after he had born his Tribunship with much sedition, and kept the Aventine hill with a multitude of the Commons in arms, was by L. Opimius the Consul (who by virtue of all the Senate had put the people in arms), deprived of his bold and plain, and together with him Fulvius Flaccus a Consular men, his officer and companion in this furious outrage. Q. Fabius Maximus the Consul, and nephew of Paulus, won a field of the Allobroges, and Biturias King of the Arverni. Of Biturias his army were slain a hundred and one thousand. And when himself in person was gone to Rome, the Senate was convicted and restored him, he was committed toward in Alesia, for that he fomented danger and hurt to the peace, for to send him back again into France. Also, there passed a decree, that Congestians his son should be apprehended and sent to Rome. The Allobrogis submitted and were received, L. Opimius being accused before the body of the people by Q. Decius a Tribune of the Commons, for imprisoning certain citizens uncondemned, was acquitted.

Caicus Marcus the Consul vanquished the Stobii, a people dwelling upon the Alpes, Micripia, King of the Numidians dead, and left the Kingdom unto his three sons, Adherbal, Hyempsil, and Jugurtha his brothers sons, whom he had adopted for his own child. L. Caecilius Metellus subdued the Damnianas, Jugurtha leved war upon Hyempsil his brother, overcame him in fight, and slew him. Adherbal his third brother, he drove out of the realm, but by the Senate of Rome restored he was again. L. Caecilius Metellus, and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus the Consul, deprived 32 Senators of their place and dignity. Besides, this book containeth the troubles of the Syran Kings.

Of the LXIII. Book.

The Consul took a survey of the City: in which were enrolled 394336 parts of Roman citizens, Amylia Licinia, and Marcia, three central virgins were consulted and condemned for incest. The manner how their fornication was committed, detected, judged, and punished, is here set down. The * Cimbrians, an huge and mighty nation, invaded Illiricum, and put it to the mast: by whom Papirius Carbo the Consul was defeated, both he and his army, Livius Drusus the Consul, warred in Thrace upon the Scordisci, (a people descended from the Gauls) and won much honour.
Of the LXV. Book.

A heral warred uppon by Jugurtha, was within the City Cirta besieged, and by him slain, notwithstanding the commandment of the Senate to the contrary. For which cause war was proclaimed against Jugurtha himself. Caphtanumus Beftia had the commission and charge to manage this war; who made peace with Jugurtha, without warrant from the people and Senate, Jugurtha being cited and called forth under false conduits, to appear and hear at the authors of his plots and designs, for that the once went, that he had bribed and corrupted with sums of money many of the Senate, came to Rome: where he was in trouble and jailprison for a murder committed upon the person of a certain Prince, called Malthius (who seeing him to be hated of the Romans, fought for his kingdom) whom he slew at Rome, Being commanded to answer for his life in regard of this murder, he secretly fled, and as he departed from the City suffered (by report) these words, O corrupt City and set to side; how soon will it perish: if it may meet with a chapman? A Pothinus a Lieutenant General, after his wife fought with unfortunate at battle against Jugurtha, amended the matter still well, by making an ignominious and dishonourable peace with him, which the Senate judged not: to be observed and kept.

Of the LXV. Book.

Quintus Cæcilius Metellus the Coq, in two battles demolished Jugurtha and overran all Numidia, M. Junius Syllanus the Coq, unexpectedly in a battle fought against the Cimbrians, whose envoys demanding of the Senate a place of habit and lands to occupy, were denied, M. Minclunus Pro-coq had great success in fighting against the Thracians, L. Callius the Coq, together with his host, was defeated and cut in pieces in the borders of the Allobrogians by the French Tigurins, a country of the Helveticians, who had divided themselves and were departed from the rest of the State. The soldiers remaining alive after that overthrow, capitulated with the enemies, for safety of their lives, to put in plighted faith to part with the one moiety of all that over they had unto them.

Of the LXVII. Book.

Ugurthia driven out of Numidia by C. Marius, had the help and aid of Bocchus King of the Moors; but when the power of Bocchus also was defeated in battle, and himself unwilling to maintain the war any longer (so unfortunately begin) Jugurtha was overcome, and delivered up to C. Marius, in which exploit the service of L. Cornelius Sulla treasurer unto Marius, was singular above the rest.

Of the LXVIII. Book.

Marcus Antonius the Praetor persecuted the rovers as a and chased them as far as into Cicilia. M. Manlius the Consul manifestly defended the camp. He laid with all force sufficient by the Thebans and Ambrosians. Afterward di in two battles one for another about Aquae Sextiae, the bravest of the Cimbrians were defeated and killed in action, the other part were taken prisoners. Marius in his absence was created Consul now for the third time; and when the triumphs were offered unto him, he declined it and put it off, until he had made full and final conquest also of the Cimbrians. The Cimbrians repulsed and drove from the Alps Q. Catulus the Pro-consul, who had set the narrow gullet of the Alps, and kept a Castle highly over the everer Athenes, which he now alighted: and when their colour they had cleared the passage they pursued the Pro-consul with his army and pass. over to Italy, where they were overthrown by the same Catulus and C. Marius, who had joined their forces together: in which battle 14000 men were slain, and 60000 taken prisoners. Marius was honorably received at his return with a general acclamation of the whole City: and whereas two triumphs were offered unto him, he was content with one. The principal peers and nobles of the City, who along time before had desired him as a mark newly start up in it, and determined to so great honours, conferred now that the common-wealth by him was preserved. Publicius Metellus for murdering his own mother, was the first man joined up in another bag and thrown into the sea. Here is related how the sacred shield Ancilla flared of their enemies with a great rousing noise before the Cimbrians war was finished. Finally, this book comprehendeth the wars between the two Kings of Syria.
The Breviaries of L. Florus.

Of the L XIX. Book.

Cneus Apuleius Saturninus, by the help of C. Marius, and by occasion that A.Nonus his competitor, and concurrent was by his soldiers slain, was by sentence of the tribunal of the commons, and bare the tribunalship violently as he got it. And when he had proposed an agrarian law and passed it by force, he arrested Metellus Numidicus to answer at a day, for that he had written and sworn to the said law: who being maintained and defended by the citizens of the better sort, it was he would give no occasion of unseemly debates and evil contentions, went in voluntary exile to Rhodes: and there he employed his time in reading of books and giving audience to great and famous men. After he was departed, C.Marius the captain and author of that sedition, who now had purchased a freed manship with a large sum of money, assembled amongst the tribes, proclaimed him at common council and interdicted before fire and water like an outlaw. The same Apuleius Saturninus, tribunal of the commons, first, C. Memmius, in his white gown standing to be seiz'd, for that he feared him above all others to craft his proceeding: whereupon the Senate was exceedingly moved in the cause and behalf of C. Memmius: and when C. Marius a man by nature unamiable, and in his own soul variable, one who ever loved to lose on the better side of the bridge, and to hand with the mightier, was not a little to hear him out and protect him, the said Saturninus together with Cauclus the Prator and other his confederates in that outrage, was slain by one Rabinius, Q. Cæcilius Metellus was recalled out of banishment with exceeding great love and favour of the whole City, Manius Aquilius the Pro-cof detached, and ceded the flower-war raised in Sicily.

Of the LXX. Book.

When Manius Aquilius should plead his own defence, or answer in case of extortion, he would not himself but trust in others: the cause of the Jewry. But M.Antonius his advocate who pleaded for him, at the bar, set his hat down along his breast, to show the honourable scars received in the forehead of his body which being by the judges seen, they made no doubt, but acquitted him. Of this thing Cicero is the only author. Didius the Pro-cof. managed his wars against the Celtiberians happily, Ptolemy K. of Cyrene surrendered Apion, when he died, left the people of Rome his heir and the Senate ordained that the cities of his realm should be free, Ariobarzanes was restored to his kingdom of Cappadocia, by L. Cornelius Sylla, the Persian embassadors sent from their K. Attalids came unto Sylla, to treat and sue for amity with the people of Rome, P. Rutilius a man of uncourteous and uncivil life, who (being lieutenant under L. Mucius the Pro-cof.) had defended Nisa from the wrongfull depredations of the Publicans or commoners (his being ado for the order of knights and gentlemen of Rome, who now as judges had the jurisdiction in their hands) was condemned for extortion and banished. C. Garinius the Prator fought magnificently against the Thracians, The Senate would no longer abide the mutinies and tumults committed by the gentlemen in exercising of their jurisdiction, and therefore began by all means possible to endeavour for to reduce and transmute their prerogative again to smallness in which enterprise M. Livius Drusus a tribune of the commons stood in their behalf: who to gain more strength to the cause, prevailed the communal by proposing unto them a pernicious hope of a largess. Moreover in this book are comprised the fires and troubles of the kings in Syria.

Of the LXXI. Book.

Marius Livius Drusus a tribune of the commons, for the better maintenance of the Senat's causes, which he had undertaken, solicited the allies and the nations of Italy, upon hope to be enfranchised citizens of Rome: by whose assistance having gone through by strong hand, with the Agrarian and Frumentarian laws, he obtained also the freed-manhood of the Judicials, in this manner. That all judgments should pass differently and equally by Senat and Gentlemen. After this, when the freedone of Rome promised to the allies could not be performed, or performed; the Italian, in a chief and the cholery began to complete how to make to: whose conventicles, conspiracies, and ordinances delivered in the assemblies and diets of their princes, are in this book reported: In regard whereof, Livius Drusus became hateful even to the Senat, at the author of a social war, and in his own cause was murdered, but by whom God knew.

Of the LXXII. Book.

The Italian fans revolt, namely, the Pictons, Seffins, Marains, Petilignans, Mercurians, Lucains, and Samitans. The Pictons first entered into armament and began the war. Quintus Servilius the Pro-cof. was slain at Alculum, together with all the Roman cities which were in that town: whereupon the whole people of Rome put on arms and soldiers coats, Servius Galba being surprized by the Lucains, escaped captivity by the means of one woman, in whose house he took up his lodging. Eternia and Alba, two colonies were by the Italians besieged, after this, these were reported the aid of the Latins and other foreign nations sent unto the people of Rome: moreover, the expeditions and alternative winning of cities, as well by the one side as the other.

Of the LXXIII. Book.

Lucius Caesat the cof. in a battell against the Sammits went down and had the worse. Nola the colony fell into the hands of the Sammits, together with Pothumius the Prator, who there was slain. Many more nations revolted to the enemy's forces, for that P. Rutilius the Consul had fought against the Marains, and lost his life, and the Marains, under C. Marius his lieutenant, had a better conflict with the enemies in the end and effect, Servius Sulpitius captured the Petilignans. Q. Capio another lieutenant of Rutilius, who having been by the enemies besieg'd, had fallen forth upon the enemies and got the upper hand: for this good success he was made equal in government and command with C. Marius. But hereupon he grew too sooth, and being over-taken by an ambush of the enemies was slain, and the army defeated. L. Caesat: the Consul won a field of the Sammitans, for which valor the soldriers coats were laid off again at Rome. Yet because the forrance of the field would show her self varrable, the colony Effern nia, together with M. Marcellus, was taken by the Samnites. On the other side, Marius in a battle overcame the Bithynians, and the Thracians. Thus the province of Gaul was beyond the Alps.

Of the LXXI V, Book.

Cneus Pompeius defeated the Picton in battle and held them besieged: for which Valerius, the embroiler of purple, and other ornaments and badges of the Mannars were taken up again and put on. Moreover, Marius fought against the Marfians with great effect. The Liburnians took a man, never before been to serve in the wars. Aurelius, the lieutenant, on a battle overcame the Liburnians, and his wife L. Pertici the Praetor vanquished the Marfians, when as both these nations had rebelled, Nicomedes was placed again in the kingdom of Bithynia, and Aretobazanes of Cappadocia. Cn. Pompeius the Cesar overthrew the Marfians in a pitched field. When the city was deeply engaged and plundered in debt, Aretobazanes of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes of Bithynia were driven both out of their kingdoms by Mithridates King of Pontus. Last of all, this book contains of the misfortunes and invasions of the Thracians into Macedonia, together with their routing of those parts.

Of the LXXV, Book.

Aulus Gabinius a lieutenant, having fought fortunate against the Lucania, and from them many towns: as he laid siege to the enemies' legions, was cut off and slain. Sulpicius in quality of lieutenant had the execution of the Marius, and the surrender of that whole nation. Cn. Pompeius the Pro-Congal took the submission of the Veiius and Falegiani. The Marfians likewise having been in certain battles vanquished by L. Murzana and Cencillius Pinnah lieutenant, saved peace. Alcimus was put by Cn. Pompeius: and the Italian people by Mancrufius Aemilius the lieutenant were put to the sword. Silo Poppulas, general of the Marfians, and the author of the villain was slain in battle, Aretobazanes of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes of Bithynia were driven both out of their kingdoms by Mithridates King of Pontus, last of all. This book contains the misfortunes and spots that the Thracians made in Macedonia.

Of the LXXVI, Book.

When P. Sulpicius a Tribune of the Commons, by the advice and inclination of C. Marius had promised certain peculiar favours; that the basest should be restored, and now Citizens together with Libertins be sorted into Tribes: also that Marius should be chosen General against Mithridates King of Pontus: and when he offered violence against Q. Pompeius and L. Sylla the Confals, who contrived his proceedings; and had slain the son of Pompeius the Consul, who had married Sulpicia daughter to the same L. Sylla, they sent to Rome with an army, with which they the city was taken by the besiegers, and all the city was thrown out of the hands of the besiegers, and taken by the army itself and the besiegers. The state of the city, and how it was drawn out from thence inhabitants to their colonies. Q. Pompeius the Consul took the journey to receive the army of Cn. Pompeius the Consul, and by his consent was slain. Mithridates of Pontus seized upon Bithynia and Cappadocia; drew out Aquilus the lieutenant, and with a mighty army invaded Thrace, where the people of Rome.

Of the LXXVIII, Book.

Mithridates held Asia with his garrisons; he cast into prison Q. Oppius the Pro-Congal, and likewise Aquilus the lieutenant. Also by his commandment, all the Roman Citizens to be found in Asiawere in one day massacred. The city Rhodes, which only continued true and kept all seiges, he assaulted, but being in certain battles at sea overcome, he gave over and retired. Archelas the chief governor and commander under the King, entered Greece with an army, seized upon Athens and held it. Moreover, this book contains the lot of the trouble of some cities and islands, whilsts the inhabitants endeavoured to draw their fleets, some to side with the King; others, to take part with the Romans.
Luctius Cornelius Cinna, at what time as by force and arms he published dangerous levies was thereupon by his Colleague Cn. Octavius, driven out of the City with few Tribunals of the common soldiers, and being thus deprived of his rule and authority, he became commander of Ap. Claudius his army by corruption; and joyning with C. Marius and other banished persons, out of Affrict he marched in while he manner against the City of Rome. In which war, it followed but two brothers, the one of Pompeius his army, and the other of Cinna, encountered in fight and knew not one another. Now when the conquest was in designing and spoiling him whom he had slain, he saw what he had done, and took knowledge that it was his brother; whereupon he fell into an exceeding pious fit of lamentation and mourning: made a funeral fire for his brothers corpse, stabbed himself through hereupon, and in the same fire he burned and consumed to ashes. Now whereas these civil wars might have been suppressed in the beginning such was the fraudulent dealing of Cn. Pompeius, who seeming to maintain both parties with strength to Cinna, and set not to his helping hand before that the Nobles side went down; such also was the wantonness and coldness of the Consul, that Cinna and Marius took heart and grew strong; and with four armies, whereof two were committed to the conduct of Q. Sertorius and C. Carbo, they invested the City of Rome. Marius won by force the Colony Olisti, and most cruelly massacred it.

Of the LXXI. Book.

The Italian nations were by the Senate enfranchised, and obtained the freedom of Rome, The Sambucus who only continued in arms baid again with Cinna and Marius; by them was Plancius slain and his army defeated, Cinna and Marius together with Carbo and Sertorius were posted of Janniculum, and being discomfited and repelled by Octavius the Consul, retired and departed. Marius being led and laid defeat Antium, Aricia, and Lavinium three Colonies, When as now the nobility and Lords of the Senate had no hopes at all left to to withstand the contrary faction, by reason of the cowardice and treachery as well of foul-sellers as leaders, who upon corruption either would not fight at all, or else went over to the adverse part; Cinna and Marius were received into Rome: who as it had been an enemy force by assailed had havoc of all with rage and massacres. In this carbo Cn. Octavius the Consul left his life, and all the nobility of the other side were murdered: and among the rest, M. Antonius most elegant Orator, and C. Caesar whose heads were set upon the Pulpit Rostra; and Caesar Catus the for was by the lorfemen of Fimbria killed; and Catus the father, because he would not endure any indignity worthy his virtue, fell upon his own sword; without any assembly or election at all L. Cinna and L. Marius declared themselves Consuls for the next year: and the same day when they entered to their Magnificy, Marius cas'd Sex, Licinius a Senator to be thrown down the rock Tarpeian; and after many wicked and heinous outrages committed upon the Ides of January, he departed out of this world: a man whose virtues (if they were weighed together with his virtues) hardly could be determined whether he were in war a better soldier, or in peace a more dangerous Citizen. For the Commonwealth which he in his armour saved, the same in his long gown he overthrew, first with all manner of cowardice and deceit; and lastly plain hostility and force of arms.

Of the LXXII. Book.

Luctius Sylla straightly beleaguered Athens, which Archelaus a governor under King Mithridates held with a garrison and after much toil and labour won it, To the City he granted their liberty again, and restored into the Citizens all that was their own. Magnific the only City in Asia that remained free and for long was most violently defended against Mithridates, Over beside her, she might read the exploits performed by the Thracians in Macedonia.

Of the LXXIII. Book.

Sylla unjustifiably in fettle the power of King Mithridates, which having kept Macedonia in obedience, was now come into Thracia, He flew one hundred and thousand enemies, and was Master of the Camp. Afterwards when the war was renewed, he discomfited and defeated quite the Kings whole army. Archelaus together with the Kings fleet yielded to Sylla, L. Valerius Flaccus the Consul and companion in government with Cinna being sent to succeed Sylla, was (for his covetousness) so odious unto his army that he was slain by C. Fimbria his own lieutenant, a most audacious and desperate person, and so the conduct and command of the army was transferred to Fimbria. Moreover, here is recorded what Cities in Asia Mithridates won; how cruelly he strove and vexed the Province; and how the Thracians made roader and invasions into Macedonia.

Of the LXXIV. Book.

Caius Fimbria after he had discomfited certain forces of Mithridates won the City Pergamus, besieged the King there, and missed but a little of taking him prisoner. The City Ilium, which stood one and preserved itself in the behalf and devotion of Sylla, he forced and subdued, and the greatest part of Asia he recovered, Sylla in many battles defeated the Thracians, When L. Cinna and C. Pappius Carbo who for two years together were Consuls of their own making) prepared war against Sylla, by the means of L. Valerius Flaccus the President of the Senate (who made an Oration in the Senate-house) and those who loved concord and sought for unity, effected it was in the end, that Embassadors should be sent unto Sylla to treat about a peace. Cinna was murdered by his own soldiers, whom he forced against their wills to be embarked and to take a voyage against Sylla: by which occasion Carbo alone bore the Consulship, Sylla being pested over into Asia, made peace with Mithridates upon his capitulation, That the King should quit these Provinces namely, Asia, Bithynia, and Cappadocia, Fimbria being forsaken of his own army, which revolted into Sylla's gave himself a bare wound, and yielding his neck unto his own bond-servant, obtained this favour at his hands, as to dispatch him outright.
Of the LXXXIV. Book.

SYLLA returned this answer unto the Embassadors sent unto him from the Senate; That he would be ordered by them, in case those Citizens who (upon the hard usage of Cinna,) fled unto him, might be restored. The Senate thought this a reasonable condition and just demand: but by means of Carbo and that faction, who made reckoning that war would be more commodious unto them, there ensued an agreement and accord. The same Carbo when he was minded to exact hostages of all the towns and colonies of Italy, hereby to bind them upon their allegiance against Sylla, was by a general consent of the Senate crossed and inhibited. The new enchanchted Citizens, by virtue of an act by the Senate granted, were allowed the privileges of their suffrages and voices, Q. Metellus Pius, who had sided with the nobility, whilst he left war in Africk, was by C. Fabius the Praetor dismissed: and by the faction of Carbo and those that followed the part of Marius, an act of Senate passed, That all armies and forces wherefo'ever should be caufed and discharged. The Libervins were distributed indifferently throughout the free and thirty tribes. Be sides all this, there is specified the preparation of war which was rased against Sylla.

Of the LXXXV. Book.

SYLLA crossed the seas with an army over into Italy: and when those Embassadors which he sent to treat for peace were by the Consul C. Norbanus well entertained, he overcame the said Norbanus in a battell. And when he was about to all the camp of L. Scipio the other Conful, with whom he had travelled and affai'd all means to conclude peace, and could not compafs it: the whole army of the Conful in general, being followed by soldiers whom Sylla had sent out unbeknown to that purpose, turned his ensigns unto him, and followed his standard. Scipio, when he might have been killed was let go. Cn. Pompeius, the son of that Cneus who won Atcolum, enrolled an army of volunteers, and came unto Sylla with three legions: whom also the nobility all and whole ranged themselves; so as abandoning the City they repaired to the camp. Finally, in this his book report is made of the expeditions performed by Captains of both sides through all Italy.

Of the LXXXVI. Book.

THAT year wherein C. Marius (the son of C. Marius) was by forcible means and strong hand create Conful before he was twenty years of age; C. Fabius in Africk was burnt quick in his own pal- lion for his bloodly cruelty and treedy avarice. L. Philippus, lieutenant unto Sylla, besiezed Sardina, after he had disposed and slain Q. Antonius the Praetor. Sylla contrived a league with the states of Italy, to put them out of fear that he would not bereave them of their freedom of Rome and liberty of suffrages lately granted unto them. In like manner, upon assured confidence (that he had already) of unknown victory, he commanded all those that were in the world and restored unto him for jurisdiction, to adjoin their appearance in camp, and to appear at Rome. Whilst the City yet was divided and disfrailed two ways, L. Damaisipus the Praetor, having according to the will and pleasure of C. Marius the Cos, gathered the Senators together, massacred all the nobility of the City. Out of which number Q. Mutius Scelvola the arch-Pontiff, as he fled, was in the very porch and entry of Vetlans Temple murdered. Besides, this book contains the war renewed by L. Murra against Mithridates in Asia.

Of the LXXXVII. Book.

SYLLA after he had descomfited and overthrown the army of C. Marius, near a place called Sacripitorus, besieged him within the town Prasmeile. The City of Rome he recover'd out of the hands of his ene- mies: and when Marius made an offer to fallily, he repelled him. Moreover, this book contains the exploits achieved by his lieutenant, with the like fortunes of that side in all places.

Of the LXXXVIII. Book.

SYLLA after he had defeated and put to the sword the army of Carbo at Cluentium, Faventia, and Fi- dentia, chased him forth of Italy. With the Samnites, who alone of all the Italian nations had not yet laiddown arms, he fought one final battell, and vanquished them near the City of Rome, even before the gate Collina: and thus having recovered and got into his hands the absolute enaging of the state, he pillag'd and stri'd this most godly and beautiful vict'ry with the foulst cruelty that ever man comitted. He cut the throats of 3000 in the great host called Villa Publica, even those that had yielded themselves. He set up the table of profcription and outlawry. The City of Rome and all Italy throughout filled with massacres. Among th'rest he cauf'd all the Prasmenes, d'armed as they were, to be slain. Marius, a Senator by calling, he killed in this manner, by breaking his arms and legs, by cropping his ears, and digging out his eyes. C. Marius besieged within Prasmeile by Lucretius Alcida and that side with Sylla; when he fought mean's of vict'ry by a mine under the ground, seeing how he was environ'd by the army, new fell within the said mine: for perceiving that he could not escape, he and Pontius Telephus, that accompanied him in this flight, ran one at the other with their drawn mixed swords: and when he had killed him, and was himself hurt, he found so much kindness at his slave hands as to make an end of him quite.

Of the LXXXIX. Book.

LUCIUS Butus sent from Cn. Papius Carbo, who was arrived at Corcyra in a shitter boot to Lily- bium, in efl'ort to see whether Pompey were there: being compos'd and became involved about by those vessels which Pompey had sent out of their swords points to his body, and set the prussell against a seat within the boat: and so bending forward with the pose of his boot was pierced through and cutt'd. Cn. Pompeius sent by the Senate with full commission of rule and command unto Cn. Carbo prisoner, who was arrived in the Islands Collura, and flew him, who kept up his and weeping, like a woman, when he should diu Sylla because Diilleror, and that which never any man had done besides him, he kept his part abroad with 240 livers or Litters going before him with their rodes and axes. He altered the State, and in that innovation established it. The Tribunes of the Commons he abridged of their authority, and wholly deprived them of their power to prefer and establish laws. The College of the Pontiffs and Augurs was augmented and increased to the number of 15. The body of the Senate he supplied out of the order of Gentlemen. The children of these whom he had proscripted and outlawed he restored for being eligible to any honourable office, and of their goods made port-fide, whereat at first he seized much by violence and had it away. A mighty mass of money he raised thereof, amounting to *a hundred and fifty millions of Sesterces. He commanded Q. Lucretius Ocellos to be killed in the very Forum of Rome, for that he profaned without his leave and license to sue for a Consulship; and when the people of Rome were highly offended at this indignity, he assembled them to a publick audience, and before them avowed the fault and took it upon him, Cn. Mithridates likewise one of them that were outlawed and one of protection, being come presently disguised with his head covered to the back door of Bithia his wives house, was not let in, for that he said he was an outlaw; whereupon he took the fish at his own hands, and with his own blood bled himself in the door of his wives house. Sylla recovered and won again Nola in Sammium. He brought seven and forty legions into the lands conquered from the enemies, planted them there, and divided the grounds amongst them. He besieged the town Volaterra, which yet stood out and bare arms, and at length upon surrender got it. Mitylene also, the only City in Aisia, (which after that Mithridates was subdued maintained war) was fired and reduced down to the ground.

Cn. Pompeius reduced the realm of Pontus into the forme of a Province. Pharnaces the son of Mithridates made war upon his own fathers, by whom Mithridates was besieged within his own royal Court and Palace. Whereupon he drank poison, and seeing it was not effectual and strong enough to dispossess him, he was killed by a French souther, named Bitetius, whose helping hand he requested for to rid him of the world. Cn. Pompeius subdued the Jews; their famous Temple of Jerusalem, which until that day never had suffered abuse and violence; he forced and won Catilina, by occasion that he had twice suffered a repulse in trying to take Condis, confederate together with Lentulus the Praetor, Cethegus, and many others, to warfear the Conspirators and the Senate, to set the City on fire, and to subvert and overthrown the State of the Commonwealth, and to this purpose had levied an army in Tuscany. At what time he was in election to be Czad, and went about to invade and make havoc of the C.M. There arose a conspiracy among three of the most principal personages of the City, Cn. Pompeius, M. Crassus, and C. Caesar. The Agrarian laws were by Caesar the Czad, published with great strife and contention the Senate was unwilling thereunto but by the other Czad, M. Bibulus they passed, C. Antonius Pro-Consul at Thracia did but badly in his war-affairs, M. Cicero was banished the City by virtue of an edict promulged by P. At what time as the assembly for election of Magistrates might be holden, by reason of the state and election of C. Cato a Trib. of the Com., the Senat generally in token of sorrow put on mourning needs. M. Cato in his state for a Praetorship suffered a repulse, and Vatinius was preferred before him. The same Vatinius when he would have impeached the laws whereby were granted to the Cisna Provencies for five years, unto Pompey the government of both Spain, unto Caius Syria and the Parthian war, and unto Caius France and Germany, was by C. Trebonius a Tribune of the Comonies, and the first maker of the said law, committed to prison. M. Gabinius the Pro-Consul established Polomaxis again in the kingdom of Egypt, and dispossessed Archelaus whom they had set up for their King. Caius after he had vanquished and put to sword the Germans in France, crossed over the Rhine, and found that part of Germany which is next thereto; which done, he sailed over into Britain with much trouble and damage, by reason of the floor and contrary winds whilst he was at sea; and he stayed little better when he was there: but after he had slain a mighty great number of men, he brought into subjection the rest of the island.

Auruncules the lieutenants of Caius were by an ambuscado surprified and environed, and by means thereof they and the armies whereof they had the command were put to the sword. And at what time as the camp of the other legions was besieged, assaulted, and with difficulty defended, and among them Q. Cicero, who was Lord President of the Treasons: the armies were by Caius himself in person overtaken in sight. M. Caius intending to war upon the Parthians passed over the river Euphrates, and being vanquished in battle, wherein his son was slain, after he had rallied the broken ends of his army, and retired them to a little hill, he was returned forth by the enemies (whose Captain was Surenas) a treaty and truce of peace and thereupon attached: but because he would not suffer any indignity and villany done in that bringing of his was slain, and there an end of him.

Pompeius was sent out of the Senate to suppress such enormatious debates. Created Consul he was the third time in his absence, and which prerogative no man ever had alone without College. A commission was granted forth to sit upon the death of Pub Claudius, by virtue whereof Milo was judicially condemned, and had his judgment to be bound. A bill was proposed that C. Caius not fulfilling he was absent, should be accepted in the election of Consuls, albeit M. Cato was unwilling thereto, and said it. Moreover, this book containeth the warlike acts achieved by C. Caius, put the Parthians to the sword who had passed over into Syria. M. Cato said to be Consul, and had the repulse, and Ser. Sulphurinius with M. Marcellus were created Consuls: C. Caius sold himself the * Bellovaci, was assisted with other States and Cities in France. Also it containeth the strife and debate between the Consuls about sending of a successor to C. Caius. For M. Marcellus the Consul was earthen in the Senetum, that Caius should come to stand for a Consulship, considering that be it a law made in that behalf was to govern his provinces unto that time of his Consulship. Lust of all, the martial deeds of Mar. Bibulus in Syria are here reported.

Charged his forces. Moreover, this book treateth of the actions preferred by C. Curio, a Tribune of the Commons, against Caesar, and afterwards for him. When there passed as all of the Senate, that one or other must fall, should be employed to succeed Caesar, M. Antonius and Qu. Cassius, two of the Tribunes (for that by their negative and inhibitions they seemed to cry and say that all) were expelled the City; and a commission was directed by the Senate to the Consuls, and to Cn. Pompeius, in this form. To see that the Common-meal sustained no damage, C. Caesar intending to persecute his adversary, came with his army into Italy. Continus together with L. Domitius and L. Lentulus he took prisoners, and let them go again; but Cn. Pompeius, and the rest of that side, he utterly chased forth of Italy.

Of the CX, Book.

Caius Caesar besieged Maflius, which had shut the gates against him: who leaving C. Trebonius and D. Brutus at the siege, took a journey into Spain, where he received upon submission Lu. Atranius and C. Petreus, two lieutenants of Pompeius, together with seven legions at Ilerda, and dismissed them all with no harm done unto them. Varro also a lieutenant of Pompeius, together with his army came under his obedience. The Galither he enfranchised and gave the City unto. The Maflians after two overthrows in sea-fights, and a long siege which they had endured, submitted at last and were at the devotion of Caesar. C. Antonius a lieutenant of Caesar fought an unfortunate battle against the Pompeians; and in Alythinum was taken prisoner; where in war the inhabitants of Opitergium, beyond the river of Padus (where the auxiliaries of Caesar) seeing their chained bridge of boats and lighters locked up and fast shut within the enemies ships, rather than they would fall into the hands of their enemies, ran one upon another, and died every one, C. Curio, a lieutenant of Cn. Pompeius, after he had fought against Varus a captain of the Pompeians, was together with his army defeated, and cut in pieces by Juba King of Mauritania, C. Caesar passed the sea over into Greece.

Of the CXI, Book.

Caius Cæcilius Rufus the Praetor going about to raise communions and seditions all the year he could within the City, and having solicited the comitium upon the hope of cancelling all debt-books, was first deposed from his Magnificence, and after driven out of the City. Then he banded with Mulo a barbarous person, who had levied a power of offensive outlaws: but both of them in this preparation of war came short of their purpose and were slain. Cleopatra queen of Egypt was by her brother Ptolomæus expelled out of her kingdom. By reason of the scarcity and cruelty of Q. Catulus the Praetor, the Carthaginians in Spain together with two Varian legions, revolted from Cæsar and his side. Cn. Pompeius was besieged by Caesar at Brundizium: but having won his forces with the guards there to belonging, and that with great loss of the adverse part, he was delivered from the siege. But after the war was transferred into Thrælia, he was at Pharillis in a batted overthrow. There remained still with him the camp Ciceron, a man by nature framed for nothing more trust than war. Cæsar pardoned all those of the adverse part, who after his victory submitted themselves to his mercy.

Of the CXII, Book.

Herein is related the fearful condition of that side which was vanquished, and how they fled in sundry parts of the world. Cn. Pompeius being arrived in Egypt, by the commandment of Ptolomæus the King, as yet an infant under age; and persuasion of Theodorus his teacher and schoolmaster, who might of all other overrule the King; also of one Phætanus, was killed by the hands of Achilla, one who had a warrant to execute that feat, even in the very barge before he was landed. But Corinthus his wife and Sexus Pompeius his son fled back into Cyprus. Cæsar three days after the foresaid victory, pursued Pompeius: and when Theodorus presented unto him his head and signet of his finger, he was displeased in his heart and went withal. He entered Alexandria without any danger, notwithstanding the troubles and burthens therein. Cæsar was created Dictator. He restored Cleopatra unto the kingdom of Egypt: and when Ptolomæus had made way by their advice and counsel who moved him to murder Pompeius, Cæsar vanquished him, with great peril and hazard of himself. As Ptolomæus fled, his vessel, wherein be was embark’d ran upon a ground in Nile, and thereuck fainted. Reference this book through the painful and toilsome journey of Marcus Cæsar with his legions, in Africa through the desert wilderness; and the war which Cn. Domitius unfortunately managed against Phætras the king.

Of the CXIII, Book.

When the side of Pompeius had gathered heart and strength in Africa, the sovereign command thereof was committed to P. Scipio: for Macto, who before had equal power and commission with him, gave place and yielded his right. Now when it was debated in council as to reaching the fleet, and the ruin of Utica, for that the City was so inclined and favourable to Cæsar: while M. Cato stood still in this point; he it should not be destroyed: and Juba the King (for he was known to havevalued the guard and keeping thereof was committed unto Cato. but was soon overcame. At what time as P. Dolabella a Tribune of the com, raised seditions in Rome, by means of a law by him published in the behalf of bankrupts. That the old debts should be strucken off, and no order taken in the creditors, upon which occasion there ensued a commotion of the commons; M. Antonius, General of the cavalry, entered the City with a strength of soldiers: and eight hundred of the commons lost their lives. Cæsar discharged all his old soldiers who in a mutiny demanded the same: and having failed into Africa, he fought against the power of K. Juba with exceeding great jealousy.

Of the CXIV. Book.

Cælius Baifiis a gentleman of Rome, and one of Pompeys side, by war in Syria, Sextus Cæsar was both for by the legion which revolted and went to Baifiis, and also Baifiis, Cæsar vanquished Scipio the Pretor, Afranius, and Juba, near 1 aps, and forced their camp. Cato hearing thereof, wounded himself at Utica: and when his son came between and found his body, he was so strucked, but in the very wound, as the wound was newly lanced at his, he uplifted his scutall bowe, and died, in the 49 year of his age. Petreius killed Juba and himself, P. Scipio in his ship was before wound, and at his death, which he took manfully, beaterd a brave speech: for when the enemies made speech and squary what was become of the General. The General quoth he was well. Paulius and Afranius were slain. Cato's son had his pardon, Brutus, a lieutenant of Caesar vanquished the Belovacini in France, then rebelled.

Of the CXV. Book.

Cæsar rode in four triumphs over France, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa. A solemn feast was made, and exhibited unto the people dishes of all sorts. Both M. Marcellus a man of Consular dignity, at the request of the Senate be granted leave to return, which Marcellus could not enjoy the benefit of his grace and favour: because that he was murdered at Athens by Cn. Magnus Chilo, his own client and so atall. Cæsar also held a review of the City, where in were enrolled 150000 Caesars, whereas before there had been numbered 400000. See the calamity of civil war. He took a voyage into Spain against Sex. Pompeius: and after many roads and expeditions on both sides made, and some cities forced in, the end he attained one final battle for all before the City Munda; but with exceeding peril and danger, Sex. Pompeius escaped and fled.

Of the CXVI. Book.

Cælius Cæsar triumphed a first time over Spain. When many honours and those right excellent, were by the Senate ordained for him, and namely, among the rest, to be called Pater Patriae; to be free-hand, and regarable: and with hold to be Dictator for ever; he gave occasion to be enied and mishandled in that. When the Senate bestowed upon him these honourable titles, at what time as he sat before the Temple of Venus Genetrix, he rose not up nor did reverence unto them: second for that when Mar. Antonius the Cn, his College, and many of the Commons, they did upon his own chair of state the throne was taken away from him, whereas the principal heads, were M. Brutus, C. Trebonius, and C. Cælius, also one of his own sides, D. Brutus; by whom he was massacred in the court of Pompeius, and received 23 wounds: and these murders were the Capitol seized and held. But after that the Senate had published a decree to forget this murder, the conspirators thereof, having receivd their security the children of Antonius and Lepidus, as hostages, came down from the Capitol. By the left will and testament of Cæsar, C. Octavius (his fisters son) was made his half heir, and adopted into his own name. The body of Cæsar being brought into Mars field, was by the Cn, burnt in a funeral fire before the Rotunda. The honour and dignity of Dictatorship was for ever abolished. Chamacce a person of most wise and wise condition, vowed himself to be the son of C. Marius: and while he raised a sedition among the creditors common people, was cut off and killed.

Of the CXVII. Book.

Cælius Octavius from one of Epirus repaired to Rome: for Cæsar had sent him thither before, when he minded to make war in Macedon, where he was received with good tokens and fortunate prefages, and with hold upon him the name of Cæsar. In this confusion of state and tumult was troubled of all things. Lepidus attained by stealth to the highest pontifical dignity. But when M. Antonius the Consul demanded himself mast lords and proud in his place, and by force published a law at touching the exchange of the Provinces and mutual offered much wrong and abuse to Cæsar, when he made request that he would affiz, and stand with him in revenge of those that murdered his uncle: Cæsar, to the end that he might make both himself and the common wealth strong against him, raised and excited the old soldiers whom he had before placed in Colonies. The fourth legion also, and this called Mattius, fell from Antonius and turned their ensigns to Cæsar, after this more besides (by occasion this man through the cruelty of A. Antonius were murdered every where in their tents) because they were once suspected, revoluted from him, and run to Cæsar. D. Brutus purposing to stop Antonius, as he should pass into Lumbardy, seized upon Mutina with an army. Finally, this book declares the running to and fro of these on both parts to be posisffed first of the Provinces, and the preparation for war.
Of the CXVIII. Book.

Marcus Brutus in Greece (under a pretence of maintaining the State, and enterprising war against Antonius, poissed himself of the army, whereof Verrinius had the command, together with the Province. But Cæsar, who first took arms in defence of the C. W. the government and command of a Pro-Prætor was granted, with the Praetorian ornaments and emblems thereto belonging, and withal, he had this addition to be reputed Pro-Prætor. M. Antonius besieged D. Brutus in Mutina. Certain Embassadors were sent unto him from the Senate to concerning peace; but little availed they to the treaty and conclusion thereof. The people of Rome generally took them to arms and soldiers habit. Brutus in Epirus seduced C. Antonius the Prætor together with his army.

Of the CXIX. Book.

Cænas Trebonianus was by the guileful practice of P. Dolabella, slain in Asia: for which fall Dolabella was by the Senate judged an enemy, to the State. When Panutius the Consul was at the point to left the field against Antonius. A. Hirtius the other Consul came with his army to the rescue, discomfited forces of M. Antonius, and so made the fortune of both parts alike and equal. Afterwards, Antonius being conquistéd by Hirtius and Cæsar, fled into France, and joined unto him M. Lepidus: with the legion that were under him. Both he and all they who were within his bands in Garritz, were by the Senate attainted. Aulus Hirtius, who after his victory was slain within the camp of the enemies, and L. Pansa, who died a wounded man, in an unhappiest fight were both buried in Mars field. To C. Cæsar the only Captain of the three now remaining alive, the Senate was not so kind as they ought to have been: for having ordained that D. Brutus (who by Cæsar had been delivered from the siege at Mutina) should triumph, they made no thankful remembrance of Cæsar and his soldiers, as was meet and requisite. For which dishonour C. Cæsar (being reconciled to M. Antonius by the means and mediation of M. Lepidus) came to Rome with an army; and when they were fore dismayed at his coming, he before himself created Consul: he was with Q. Petrus being but nineteen years of age, or not full twenty for he was once a year, as Valerius Paterculus saith.

Of the CX. Book.

Cæsar now Consul, proposed a law for an inquisition to be made of them whose means his father Cæsar was killed, and by virtue of that law M. Brutus, C. Cassius, and D. Brutus were contented, attainted, and condemned in their absence. When together with M. Antonius, Annius Pollio also, and Munatius Plancius had joined their arms, and thereby much strengthened and augmented their forces. D. Brutus whom the Senate had sent with commission to pursue Antonius, being now for his religious and sacred trust at the commandment of Antonius (into whose hands he fell) killed by one Capelles a Burgomaster. Cælius Cæsar contrived a peace with Antonius and Lepidus, wherein it was capitulated between them, that those three should for five years have the sovereignty over all, only to set in order and es- tablish the state of the common-weal, to wit, himself, Lepidus, and Antonius, and each of them preserved, and allowed their own adherents and enemies. In whick prestation were contained the names of very many Gentlemen of Rome, and one hundred and thirty Senators, and amongst the rest were L. Paulus, the brother of M. Lepidus, L. Cæsar the uncle of Antonius by the Mother, and M. Cicero, slain by Popilius Albinus guardian soldier, in the 63 year of his age, whose head and hands was set upon the rostra. Moreover, this book is with the deeds by M. Brutus achieved in Greece.

Of the CXI. Book.

Caesar who had in commission from the Senate to pursue by force of arms Dolabella, judged an enemy to the Common-weal, being born out by the authority and warrant of the State, poissed himself of Syria; and became Master of three armies which were in that Province. He besieged Dolabella within the City of Laodicea, and put him to death. C. Antonius was likewise taken prisoner, and by commandment from M. Brutus slain.
